A review of the record herein, including that of the representation proceeding in Case 17-RC-9112, establishes that on September 20, 1980, Local Lodge No. 31, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, filed a petition seeking certification as the representative of certain employees of Respondent. The Regional Director for Region 17 conducted a hearing on September 24, 1980.[4] On October 10, 1980, the Regional Director issued a Decision and Direction of Election. By telegram dated November 5, 1980, the Board denied Respondent's timely request for review. On November 6, 1980, a secret-ballot election was conducted by the Regional Office in which the Union herein received a majority of the votes cast.[5] Thereafter, Respondent timely filed objections to the election. On December 3, 1980, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Robert A. Fetsch, and on December 11, 1980, the Hearing Officer issued his Report on Objections,[6] recommending that the Union herein be certified as the statutory bargaining representative of Respondent's production and maintenance employees. Respondent thereafter filed exceptions to the Hearing Officer's report, and the Union herein filed a brief in opposition thereto. On April 9, 1981, the Board issued a Decision and Certification of Representative.[7] Respondent then timely filed a motion for reconsideration of the Board's Decision and Certification of Representative, and the Union herein filed a motion to dismiss such motion for reconsideration. On April 30, 1981, the Board issued an order denying Respondent's motion for reconsideration.

With respect to Respondent's contentions in opposition to the Motion for Summary Judgment insofar as it claims that the Board's certification is invalid, it is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances, a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[8]

It is also well settled that there is a general obligation on an employer to provide information requested by the bargaining representative of its employees where such information is necessary and relevant to that bargaining representative's performance of its duties.[9] As alluded to above, the Union, on April 16, 1981, requested the following:

> 1. Names of all current bargaining unit employees, including their seniority dates, ages, sex, current rate of pay and classification.
> 2. Names of all bargaining unit employees on layoff, including their seniority dates, ages, and last rate of pay and classification.
> 3. Names of all bargaining unit employees on layoff, sick or disability leaves, including their seniority dates, ages and last rate of pay and classification.
> 4. Information spelling out any incentive, piecework, bonus, or merit increase plans currently provided or administered by the company, include how these plans are computed.
> 5. A copy of Employee Profit Sharing Plan and/or Employee Stock Purchase Plan.
> 6. A list and description of all fringe benefits (other than Pension and Insurance Plans) and how they are computed.
> 7. A copy of employee retirement or pension plan including company/employee costs of contributions and employee benefits.
> 8. A copy of all insurance plans and benefits provided to active, retired, laid off and disabled bargaining unit employees and their dependents; such as hospital-surgical, major medical, sickness and accident, life, dental and eye care insurances.

[4] The hearing was originally scheduled with respect to Case 17-RC-9112, in which the Charging Party herein sought to represent a unit of Respondent's production and maintenance employees. At the hearing, a representative of the United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC, appeared and presented the Hearing Officer with a petition seeking to represent the same unit of employees. The Steelworkers' petition was docketed as Case 17-RC-9122. Inasmuch as the same issues were raised by both petitions, all parties were present, and no party objected to the consolidation of these cases, the Hearing Officer consolidated the cases for hearing. The United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC, is not, however, a party herein.

[5] The tally of ballots showed that 29 employees cast valid ballots for the Union herein, and that no ballots were cast for the Steelworkers; 13 ballots were cast against the participating labor organizations, and there were no challenged, or void, ballots.

[6] On December 24, 1980, the Hearing Officer issued an addendum to his Report on Objections correcting an inadvertent error as to the Union's name.

[7] 255 NLRB 818. On April 16, 1981, the Board issued a corrected Decision and Certification of Representative. The Board's Decision held, inter alia, that Respondent's exceptions to the Hearing Officer's report were not timely filed.

9. The current company/employee costs or contributions for the respective insurance coverage premiums reflected as an individual hourly, weekly or monthly cost per employee for both employee and dependent coverage. Also include your actual premium and/or rebate provisions.

Any specific information the company has regarding future increase or decrease in the cost of current employee/dependent insurance coverage premiums.

10. All current job descriptions and qualifications for these jobs.

11. All current company work rules and regulations.

12. Any and all other information not specifically requested above that the company has knowledge of and is relative [sic] and vital to "rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment" as provided for under the National Labor Relations Act and defined by the National Labor Relations Board and the courts relating to the mandatory and permissive subjects of bargaining.

13. List of all present jobs, projects and/or work that the company has subcontracted out to other companies and/or any company which may be part of this company, along with the following information:

(a) Name of company and location

(b) Rate per hour the company charges.

(c) Number of employees performing the subcontracted work.

(d) How many man hours involved.

(e) Total cost of subcontracted work.

(f) Reason why the work was subcontracted.

14. Shift schedule and hours of work.

15. All information and data concerning safety programs and safety regulations.

Respondent concedes in its opposition to the Motion for Summary Judgment that "the Union would be entitled to information concerning wages, hours, the age of employees, the sex of employees, lists of employees on temporary layoff, and certain other information which constitute mandatory subjects of bargaining, and which are, therefore, presumptively relevant."[10] A review of the requested information reflects that all of the listed items, with the exception of the items numbered "12" and "13,"[11] fall within the ambit of data which an employer must, upon request, provide to the Union. Thus, for example, insurance and pension plan information,[12] details of profit-sharing plans,[13] and information with respect to job classifications[14] are all presumptively relevant to the Union's duties as bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit. We therefore hold that Respondent must provide the Union with the information requested in items numbered "1" through "11," and "14" and "15," set out above.

The issues raised by Respondent in this proceeding are either without merit or were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, and Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege that any special circumstances exist herein which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, a Wisconsin corporation, with a facility located in Fremont, Nebraska, where it is engaged in the business of the production of hydraulic components. Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, annually purchases goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources located outside the State of Nebraska, and annually sells goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of Nebraska.

[10] Such concession assumes, for the sake of argument, that the Union's certification is valid.

[11] Insofar as item 12, a "catch-all" request, does not delineate particular data, but rather utilizes the sweeping language of legal conclusion in place of specific description, we shall not require Respondent to respond thereto. Thus, the language of item 12 would appear to require Respondent to not only determine what types of information are "vital to 'rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment' under the National Labor Relations Act and defined by the National Labor Relations Board and courts relating to the mandatory and permissive subjects of bargaining," but would also require Respondent to analyze its own business practices and conditions to ascertain whether any facet of its operation falls within the ambit of such determination. We do not believe that Sec. 8(d) of the Act imposes such a requirement. Accordingly, we shall dismiss that portion of the complaint which pertains to Respondent's failure to provide the information requested in item 12.

Item 13 is no longer under consideration. See fn. 3, supra, wherein we granted the General Counsel's motion to amend the complaint so as to delete this portion of the requested information.

[14] Lock Joint Pipe Company, 141 NLRB 943 (1963).

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and we find that Local Lodge No. 31, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees including line leaders employed at its facility located at 700 South Downing Street, Fremont, Nebraska, but excluding the receiving department employees, office clerical employees, ndustrial engineering employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. The certification

On November 6, 1980, a majority of the employees of Respondent in said unit, in a secret-ballot election conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 17, designated the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent.

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit on April 9, 1981, and the Union continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Request To Bargain and Respondent's Refusal

Commencing on or about April 16 and May 4, 1981, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit, and to provide certain requested information necessary for and relevant to its duties as statutory bargaining representative in the above-described unit. Commencing on or about May 15, 1981, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in said unit, and to provide certain requested information necessary for and relevant to its duties as statutory bargaining representative in the above-described unit.

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since May 15, 1981, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and has refused to furnish it with certain requested information relevant and necessary for the purpose of collective bargaining, and that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent, set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. As we have also found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing to provide the Union certain information, we shall order Respondent to furnish the Union with such information.

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of certification as beginning on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Company, Inc., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Commerce Company d/b/a Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817;

Burnett Construction Company, 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Fremont Manufacturing Division, The Oil Gear Company, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Local Lodge No. 31, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees including line leaders employed at Respondent's facility located at 700 South Downing Street, Fremont, Nebraska, but excluding the receiving department employees, office clerical employees, industrial engineering employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since April 9, 1981, the above-named labor organization has been and now is the certified and exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing on or about May 15, 1981, and at all times thereafter, to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees of Respondent in the appropriate unit, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By refusing on or about May 15, 1981, and at all times thereafter, to bargain collectively with the above-named organization by failing and refusing to provide requested information necessary for and relevant to the Union's duties as statutory bargaining representative in the appropriate unit, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

7. By the aforesaid refusals to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

9. Respondent did not violate the Act by refusing to provide the information requested in the item numbered "12" set out above.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Fremont Manufacturing Division, The Oil Gear Company, Inc., Fremont, Nebraska, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with Local Lodge No. 31, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the appropriate unit described below, concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment. The appropriate unit is:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees including line leaders employed at its facility located at 700 South Downing Street, Fremont, Nebraska, but excluding the receiving department employees, office clerical employees, industrial engineering employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Refusing to bargain with Local Lodge No. 31, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent's employees, in the appropriate unit described above, by refusing to furnish requested information relevant and necessary for the purpose of collective bargaining.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Upon request, furnish the above-named Union with the following information: the names of all current bargaining unit employees, including their seniority dates, ages, sex, current rate of pay and classification; the names of all bargaining unit employees on layoff, including their seniority dates, ages, and last rate of pay and classification; names of all bargaining unit employees on layoff, sick or disability leaves, including their seniority dates, ages and last rate of pay and classification; information spelling out any incentive, piecework, bonus, or merit increase plans currently provided or administered by the company, including how these plans are computed; a copy of the employee profit-sharing plan and/or the employee stock purchase plan; a list and description of all fringe benefits other than the pension and insurance plans and how they are computed; a copy of the employee retirement or pension plan including company/employee costs or contributions and employee benefits; a copy of all insurance plans and benefits provided to active, retired, laid-off, and disabled bargaining unit employees and their dependents, such as hospital-surgical, major medical, sickness and accident, life, dental and eye care insurances; the current company/employee costs or contributions for the respective insurance coverage premiums reflected as an individual hourly, weekly, or monthly cost per employee for both employee and dependent coverage, including the company's actual premium and/or rebate provisions and any specific information the company has regarding future increases or decreases in the cost of current employee/dependent insurance coverage premiums; all current job descriptions and qualifications for these jobs; all current company work rules and regulations; the shift schedule and hours of work; and all information and data concerning safety programs and safety regulations.

(c) Post at its Fremont, Nebraska, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[15] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 17, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that copies of said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 17, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint allegations not specifically found herein be, and they hereby are, dismissed.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with Local Lodge No. 31, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with Local Lodge No. 31, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, by refusing to furnish information necessary and relevant for the Union to fulfill its obligation to represent our employees in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain with the above-named Union, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees including line leaders employed at our facility located at 700 South Downing Street, Fremont, Nebraska, but excluding the receiving department employees, office clerical employees, industrial engineering employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL, upon request, furnish the above-named labor organization with the following information: the names of all current bargaining unit employees. including their seniority dates, ages, sex, current rate of pay and classification; the names of all bargaining unit employees on layoff, including their seniority dates, ages, and last rate of pay and classification; names of all bargaining unit employees on layoff, sick or disability leaves, including their seniority dates, ages, and last rate of pay and classification; information spelling out any incentive, piecework, bonus, or merit increase plans currently provided or administered by the company, including how these plans are computed; a copy of the employee profit-sharing plan and/or the employee stock purchase plan; a list and description of all fringe benefits other than the pension and insurance plans and how they are computed; a copy of the employee retirement or pension plan including company/employee costs or contributions and employee benefits; a copy of all insurance plans and benefits provided to active, retired, laid-off, and disabled bargaining unit employees and their dependents; the current company/employee costs or contributions for the respective insurance coverage premiums reflected as an individual hourly, weekly, or monthly cost per employee for both employee and dependent coverage, including the company's actual premium and/or rebate provisions and any specific information the company has regarding future increases or decreases in the cost of current employee/dependent insurance coverage premiums; all current job descriptions and qualifications for these jobs; all current company work rules and regulations; the shift schedule and hours of work; and all information and data concerning safety programs and safety regulations.

FREMONT MANUFACTURING DIVISION, THE OIL GEAR COMPANY, INC.

Community Health Services, Inc. and Federation of Community Health Professionals, a/w Maine Federation of Teachers, Nurses and Health Professionals, AFT–AFL–CIO, Petitioner. Case 1–RC–17139

November 20, 1981

DECISION ON REVIEW AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On April 3, 1981,[1] the Regional Director for Region 1 issued a Supplemental Decision, in which, inter alia, he overruled the challenges to the ballots of the Employer's 12 mental health workers (MHWs) finding them to be professional employees within the meaning of Section 2(12) of the Act.[2] Thereafter, the Employer filed a timely request for review of the Regional Director's Supplemental Decision contending, inter alia, that the 12 MHWs were improperly included in the professional unit as they are technical employees.

By telegraphic order dated June 26, the Employer's request for review was granted solely with respect to the Regional Director's disposition of the challenged ballots.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the entire record in this proceeding and finds the following: The Employer is a provider of community health and home health care services, with offices in various communities in the State of Maine. The Petitioner seeks to represent all full-time and regular part-time professional employees employed by the Employer at its various locations, including MHWs. The Employer asserts that MHWs are technical employees who should be excluded from the unit.

The Employer employs 12 MHWs, who are classified in 4 grade levels, with Grade IV being the highest level. One MHW is classified in Grade IV, four within Grade III, four within Grade II, and three within Grade I. For employment as a Grade I MHW—the entry level position—the Employer prefers, but does not require, that an employee have a bachelor's degree, although any employee lacking a degree must be working actively toward one. To be eligible for classification in Grades II and III, an MHW must possess a bachelor's degree and 1–2 and 2–3 years of paid, related experience, respectively. MHWs eligible for Grade IV must possess a bachelor's degree in the human services field and 3–4 years of paid, related experience. Of the 12 MHWs currently employed, 1 has a master's degree and 10 have bachelor's degrees. Most holders of bachelor's degrees majored in human services disciplines, such as psychology, social work, or sociology, although some MHWs hold degrees in music education, music, or English. MHWs with little or no prior experience or relevant education background receive on-the-job training. Additional in-service training programs are available to MHWs, although attendance is not mandatory.[3] MHWs are not licensed by the State of Maine, nor are they registered or certified by any national or state professional organization.

MHWs (1) provide assistance to clients through counseling in problem solving, (2) determine whether clients may be in need of professional treatment and, if necessary, refer them to psychiatrists or psychologists, (3) plan and participate in group therapy sessions along with other employees of the Employer, and (4) confer with clients' psychiatrists and with public or private agencies with which clients may be involved. MHWs do not provide psychoanalysis or any form of mental health treatment which would be provided by a psychiatrist or psychologist. MHWs spend approximately 65 percent of their working time meeting with clients in their homes, and are not closely supervised through either direct observation of their counseling of clients or review of their reports and client records.

Based on the above facts, and noting in particular the Employer's education requirements for MHWs and their background, the Regional Director found that MHWs are professional employees under Section 2(12) of the Act. In its request for review, the Employer contends that the Regional Director has misapplied the Board's criteria for determining professional status,[4] and that this case is

[2] On February 6, the Acting Regional Director for Region 1 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in this proceeding, directing an election among all of the Employer's professional employees including MHWs. Thereafter, the Employer filed a timely request for review on the grounds, inter alia, that the Acting Regional Director erred in finding that MHWs are professional employees. By telegraphic order dated March 2, the Board denied the Employer's request for review but amended the Decision and Direction of Election to permit MHWs to vote subject to challenge.

On March 6, the election was conducted, and the tally of ballots shows that the Petitioner received 27 votes, 23 votes were cast against the Petitioner, and 12 ballots (cast by MHWs) were challenged. Thereafter, on March 13, the Employer filed timely objections to the election which were overruled by the Regional Director in his Supplemental Decision.

[3] The in-service education programs include periodic lectures, monthly group meetings where employees discuss their work among themselves, and partial tuition reimbursement for job-related courses.

[4] Sec. 2(12)(a) of the Act defines "professional employee" as:

governed by the Board's decision in Butler Hospital,[5] wherein the Board found mental health workers to be technical employees. Here, as in Butler, entry-level mental health workers are only encouraged, not required, to possess a bachelor's degree as a condition of employment, and there is no requirement that mental health workers holding such degrees have had academic training in an employment-related discipline. In fact, a number of the Employer's MHWs possess degrees in subjects totally unrelated to employment duties. New employees here and in Butler receive on-the-job and in-service training; indeed, the 3- to-4-month orientation program required for new employees in Butler appears to be more extensive than that required by the Employer here. In neither case does the Employer require its mental health workers to be licensed or certified. Moreover, the Employer's MHWs perform duties virtually identical to those performed by Butler Hospital's mental health workers. They "observe, report and record the [client's] behavior, activity, and his physical and emotional condition . . . [and] develop therapeutic interpersonal relationships with [clients] by engaging the [client] in therapeutic discussion."[6] In addition, they assist professional staff in obtaining information from the client, but do not engage in psychotherapy or other types of treatment normally performed by professional psychologists or psychiatrists. Therefore, in terms of their academic qualifications, training, lack of licensure or certification, and duties, the Employer's MHWs are indistinguishable from the mental health workers in Butler, whom we found to be technical employees.[7]

Accordingly, we shall exclude MHWs from the unit of professional employees and sustain the challenges to their ballots. As the tally shows that the Petitioner received a majority of the valid ballots cast, we shall issue the following certification.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

It is hereby certified that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Federation of Community Health Professionals, a/w Maine Federation of Teachers, Nurses and Health Professionals, AFT–AFL–CIO, and that, pursuant to Section 9(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the said labor organization is the exclusive representative of all the employees in the following appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment:

> All full-time and regular part-time professional employees employed by the Employer at its various locations within the State of Maine, including registered nurses, graduate nurses, physical therapists and occupational therapists, but excluding all other employees, licensed practical nurses, VD epidemiologists, outreach workers, home health aides, mental health workers, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(a) any employee engaged in work (i) predominantly intellectual and varied in character as opposed to routine mental, manual, mechanical, or physical work; (ii) involving the consistent exercise of discretion and judgment in its performance; (iii) of such a character that the output produced or the result accomplished cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time; (iv) requiring knowledge of an advanced type in a field of science or learning customarily acquired by a prolonged course of specialized intellectual instruction and study in an institution of higher learning or a hospital, as distinguished from a general academic education or from an apprenticeship or from training in the performance of routine mental, manual or physical processes . . . .

[7] The Acting Regional Director, in his Decision and Direction of Election, considered the Employer's contention that Butler was controlling but found it distinguishable in that here, unlike Butler, (1) all MHWs above the entry-level position are required to hold college degrees, (2) most MHWs possessed degrees in the human service field, and (3) MHWs appear to receive less supervision and exercise greater discretion and independent judgment in the performance of their work. However, the record indicates that the duties and jobfunctions of the MHWs here and in Butler and the manner in which they are performed are substantially the same. Moreover, although the Employer requires a bachelor's degree for MHW II, III, and IV, such degree does not have to be specialized. Besides, the possession of a college degree does not necessarily establish professional status (see Binghamton Press Company, Inc., 226 NLRB 808, 809–810 (1976). Accordingly, we find that these factors are insufficient to establish that the Employer's MHWs are professional employees.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On July 30, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Frank H. Itkin issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[3]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Faulkner Hospital, Boston, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge our employees because they have engaged in activities protected in Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate our employees about their activities protected in Section 7, or threaten them with discharge because they have engaged in such protected activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner, interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer employee John Walsh immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if this position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered due to the discrimination practiced against him, with interest.

FAULKNER HOSPITAL

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

FRANK H. ITKIN, Administrative Law Judge: The unfair labor practice charge was filed in this case on August 14 and was amended on September 10, 1980. The complaint issued on September 26, 1980. A hearing was conducted on May 7 and 8, 1981, in Boston, Massachusetts. Briefly, the General Counsel contends that Faulkner Hospital (herein called Respondent or the Hospital) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, by discharging Charging Party John B. Walsh on or about April 4, 1980, "because Walsh gave a written statement to a fellow employee in connection with [the] fellow employee's claim for unemployment compensation and because Respondent believed that Walsh, in giving [this] written statement . . . assisted [the] fellow employee in a grievance pertaining to [the fellow employee's] discharge." The General Counsel also contends that Respondent's representatives, in connection with the above incident, made coercive statements to Walsh, in further violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Respondent denies that it has violated the Act as alleged. Respondent also contends, inter alia, that Walsh was, at all times pertinent to this case, a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] We agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent's discharge of employee Walsh violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. Contrary to the contentions raised by Respondent in its exceptions, the evidence establishes that Walsh's letter on behalf of discharged employee McCarthy was voluntarily undertaken by Walsh in support of and in concert with a statutory employee and, thus, it is clear that Walsh did not act alone or on a matter solely of personal concern. See Little Rock Crate & Basket Co., 227 NLRB 1406 (1977); Schlegel Oklahoma, Inc., 250 NLRB 20, 24 (1980). Accordingly, we reject Respondent's contention that this case must be considered under the principle of Alleluia Cushion Co., Inc., 221 NLRB 999 (1975). While Respondent further contends that Walsh's letter on behalf of McCarthy compromised the integrity of its security system, the evidence in this regard contains no factual basis demonstrating any specific manner in which Walsh's letter actually or potentially compromised the security of Respondent's facility in a manner warranting an intrusion upon Walsh's exercise of concerted activities otherwise protected by the Act. Accordingly, in agreement with the Administrative Law Judge, we find that Respondent's discharge of Walsh was attributable to Walsh's protected concerted activities and, thereby, tended to interfere with the exercise of Section 7 rights in violation of the Act.

259 NLRB No. 52

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by counsel, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

Respondent, with facilities on Centre Street in Boston, is admittedly an employer engaged in commerce. Charging Party John B. Walsh started working for the Hospital as a garage attendant about June 1975. Later, about March 1976, Walsh became a security officer or guard at the Hospital. And about August 1977, Walsh was given the title "security supervisor."[1] Walsh, during the period relevant to this case, worked from midnight to 8 a.m., 5 days a week. In addition, the Hospital employed Gerald McCarthy as a maintenance employee prior to May 1979. At that time, the Hospital contracted with Balco Corporation for the performance of its maintenance work, and McCarthy then became an employee of Balco.

Walsh testified that about 2:20 a.m. on February 28, 1980, while performing guard duties at the Hospital, he and guard Francis O'Brian investigated the unauthorized presence of a motor vehicle on the third floor of the Hospital's garage. Walsh recalled the incident, as follows:

> Mr. McCarthy came out of [the] car, and he said, "Jack, we're not doing anything," and he bumped into his car, and I saw that he was pretty intoxicated. And I said, "Jerry, I didn't say you were doing anything. I said, what are you doing?" He said, "well, we're just having a few beers."[2]
> So, I told Mr. McCarthy ". . . Jerry, this isn't the place for having beers." And I started walking toward the third floor door, and on the way . . . I said, "Jerry, why don't you go some other place." And he asked me to open up the third floor door so that he could go to the bathroom, [and] I said I couldn't do that.

That ended the incident, and Walsh and O'Brian "proceeded down to the Emergency Room."

Walsh, as he further testified, was notified later that morning that "two typewriters were missing" from the Hospital. Consequently, about 10 a.m. that same day, Walsh informed Security Chief Joseph McBrine that McCarthy "had been on the Hospital premises last night." McBrine suspected that McCarthy "stole them [the typewriters], or so he thought," and instructed Walsh to "write up an incident report on the night's activities." General Counsel's Exhibit 2 is that report and recites the McCarthy incident, in pertinent part, as follows:

> [T]he driver of the sedan in question exited and came to the rear of his car immediately. It was Jerry McCarthy (painter-Balco) who was driving and he stated, "Hey Jack we aren't doing anything" . . . "just out having a few beers." At this point I suggested to Jerry that this wasn't the spot to hang around having a beer, and that I was trying to save him some trouble. Jerry agreed and I started to the building with officer O'Brian, when Jerry asked if we could leave the third floor door open so that he could go to the bathroom. It was apparent in Jerry's intoxicated state that I could be talking all night, so I offered to stay while he went to the bathroom. Jerry commented, "No thanks buddy I'm not ready yet."

Walsh next testified that, on the following day, February 29, McBrine stated to Walsh that "McCarthy definitely stole the typewriters," "he was going to be fired" by Balco, and he had a criminal record. Later, on March 3, McBrine again told Walsh that McCarthy "was being fired." McBrine then stated the reasons for McCarthy's firing, as follows: "[H]e broke a Balco corporate policy in drinking on the property and he was intoxicated on the property." Walsh, during this discussion with McBrine, "pointed out to McBrine that my report said that he [McCarthy] was intoxicated, but . . . I didn't see any liquor." McBrine assured Walsh: "[D]on't worry about it—he's being fired for being intoxicated on the property." Walsh expressed concern to McBrine because, as Walsh explained, "I didn't think that was right to use my report like that when he was just trying to investigate about typewriters being stolen." McBrine again assured Walsh: "[N]ot to worry about it."

Thereafter, about March 6, as Walsh further testified, McCarthy telephoned Walsh at the Hospital. McCarthy wanted "to talk" to Walsh and Walsh agreed to meet with McCarthy. Walsh later telephoned his superior, McBrine, and had the following conversation:

> I [Walsh] called Mr. McBrine in his office to tell him that McCarthy had called me and he wanted to speak to me. . . . Mr. McBrine said, why do I even bother getting involved . . . you know he stole the typewriters, but I said, we're not sure who stole them. And that was all he said.

On the following day, March 7, Walsh met with McBrine and again discussed the McCarthy matter. This time, as Walsh recalled, McBrine said, "[Y]ou better drop this thing or you are going to get yourself in a lot of trouble."

Later, on March 12, McCarthy again telephoned Walsh at the Hospital. Walsh recalled:

> He [McCarthy] was pretty drunk. And he started threatening me. He started calling me fucking asshole . . . and he said he was going to get me . .

[1] There is a dispute here as to whether Walsh was in fact a supervisor under Sec. 2(11) of the Act. The evidence pertaining to his status is discussed infra.

[2] There was also an unidentified person in McCarthy's vehicle at the time.

> and he can't believe that I would lie about him in my report.

McCarthy told Walsh, "[Y]ou never saw me in the Hospital with liquor." Walsh agreed. McCarthy asked, "[T]hen why did you say you saw me in the Hospital with liquor." Walsh responded, "I never did." McCarthy stated, "[T]hat's not what I was told when I was questioned by Mr. McBrine and the Boston police officer." Walsh promised to "look into this and get back" to McCarthy.

On March 13, Walsh confronted McBrine at the Hospital, asking McBrine, "[H]ad he used a bluff interrogation on McCarthy." Again, McBrine said, "[W]hat are you worried about"—"he stole the typewriters, right?" Walsh was "upset" and "pretty loud" in this conversation. Walsh asked McBrine:

> [D]id you [McBrine] read off the record and then insinuate that I [Walsh] had also seen him with liquor in the Hospital? Mr. McBrine said, yes . . . but don't you worry about it.

Walsh again expressed his concern and fears to McBrine. McBrine replied, "[S]tay away from him." Walsh explained to McBrine how difficult it was not to receive telephone calls from McCarthy. McBrine ultimately replied, "[D]o what you have to do."[3]

Walsh further testified that about March 16 McCarthy again telephoned him at the Hospital and "threatened" him "because I lied about him [being] on the Hospital property having liquor." Again, Walsh acknowledged to McCarthy: "I never saw you with any liquor." Walsh thereafter spoke to McBrine about this incident. McBrine again warned Walsh: "You are going to get yourself in trouble over it." Walsh, however, insisted "that I [Walsh] was going to go on with this investigation, and he [McBrine] said . . . go ahead." Later, about March 19, Walsh also spoke with Hospital Vice President David Folker about this matter. Walsh expressed to Folker his concern and fear of McCarthy and that "somebody here . . . [was] saying I had seen Mr. McCarthy on the premises with alcohol, and . . . I don't even know if this guy was stealing anyway." Folker told Walsh, "[D]on't worry about the stealing"—"don't worry about it."

Subsequently, about March 23, Walsh again spoke to McBrine. Walsh testified:

> I wanted to know what we could do to straighten this out. I said, "I'm getting put in a real bad position." I said, "This guy has been told a lie to, I have an obligation as a state special police officer to straighten it out." I said, "You know, I didn't ask for this trouble, I don't know what to do."
> And Joe [McBrine] told me not to worry about it. He said, "Just keep your nose out of it, you know." And I said, "but I can't." And he said, "Well, do what you have to do."
> Then he referred to my report again, and he said, there's a lie on my report on the third page, and it says: Jerry returned back to his car to finish his beers, and he said, well, then he had beers with him.
> And, I said, no, that was what I was informed of by Jerry. I said, I didn't see him with any liquor. He said, oh, you didn't? And I said, Mr. McBrine, I said, Joe, that's what I've been yelling about for the last two or three weeks here. I said, and everyone seems to be misunderstanding me and overlooking the damn thing. So, that was pretty much the end of the conversation.

About March 28, 3:40 a.m., McCarthy telephoned Walsh at the Hospital. McCarthy wanted to know if Walsh was "going to tell the truth." Walsh agreed that he would tell the truth about the incident. McCarthy then explained to Walsh, in part as follows:

> I [McCarthy] have an unemployment hearing in the morning at 8 a.m. . . . I need a letter saying that you never saw me with liquor . . . . You know I have a wife and eight kids . . . all they want is what is coming to them from unemployment.

Walsh agreed to write such a "letter."

Walsh prepared a document (G.C. Exh. 3) and handed it to McCarthy later that morning "right outside the Hospital . . . on Centre Street." Walsh's meeting with McCarthy, in front of the Hospital, took about 8 to 10 minutes. Walsh then returned to work.[4] General Counsel's Exhibit 3 states:

> Upon your request for an urgent written reply concerning alcoholic beverages on the night of Feb. 26–27th, my written report makes mention to the fact that I thought you were under the influence of alcohol. But due to the urgency of another call, I didn't recall you having any alcohol in your vehicle or on your person.

Subsequently, about 8 a.m. on March 28, Walsh was instructed to meet with McBrine. McBrine then apprised Walsh that the "head of Balco," Robert Campbell, had telephoned McBrine and informed him "that McCarthy . . . had a letter from "Walsh" contradicting [the] original report"; that McCarthy "had gone to [his] Union"; and that McCarthy was "going to cause some litigation problems for Faulkner." Walsh acknowledged to McBrine that he had given McCarthy a written statement. McBrine faulted Walsh for giving such a statement. Walsh was later taken to Folker's office. Folker was also "real upset" because Walsh had given "a letter like that" to McCarthy. During this discussion, Folker asked Walsh: "[I]f [he] was ordered to stay away from

[3] Walsh then apprised McBrine, in the presence of another security supervisor, John Curtin:

> I [Walsh] had better take care of the situation with McCarthy. Hoping to meet him when he was sober and the most it would become was a push match. And it was left that way. I told them I would keep them informed of the situation.

[4] Walsh previously had shown G.C. Exh. 3 to guards DeVincenzo and O'Brian—"they knew I was going to give [McCarthy] a statement." Also, DeVincenzo went "outside, standing behind a tree," and witnessed Walsh's meeting with McCarthy, "out of concern" for Walsh.

Mr. McCarthy?" Walsh responded, "I was advised to stay away."[5] Folker ultimately told Walsh that he was "fired." Folker explained, inter alia, "It was a dumb thing to do."

Walsh testified that about April 1 he received in the mail a letter from McBrine, dated March 28, 1980 (G.C. Exh. 4). McBrine notified Walsh in this letter that Walsh was "suspended without pay" "pending investigation" of "charges." The enumerated "charges" state: "[H]av[ing] several telephone conversations" with McCarthy "thereby disobeying a lawful command"; "giv[ing] . . . McCarthy a written document"; "hav[ing] a clandestine meeting with" McCarthy "while lawfully on duty"; and "leav[ing] your post . . . without proper authority." (Ibid.)

Thereafter, on or about April 4, Walsh went to the Hospital and spoke with, among others, McBrine and Folker. Walsh recalled that Folker told him that he would be permitted to "resign" for "any reason that [he] decided and . . . they would give [him] recommendations", because Folker, as well as McBrine, regarded him as a "good employee." Walsh, however, wanted "time to talk to [his] advisers." Walsh later received a letter from McBrine, dated April 7, 1980 (G.C. Exh. 5). McBrine notified Walsh in this letter that Walsh was "terminated as of 3:30 p.m. April 4." The cited reasons for this action are: "[H]av[ing] several conversations with . . . McCarthy . . . disobeying a lawful command"; "supply[ing] him with written information"; "leav[ing] your post"; and "exercis[ing] poor judgment." (Ibid.)

Walsh further testified that prior to his meeting with McBrine and Folker on or about April 4, Hospital employees had circulated a petition on his behalf. At the April 4 meeting, as Walsh recalled;

> They [Management] said he [the employee circulating the petition] was out in left field, that he wouldn't be long with the Faulkner, something would be done about him. They wanted a copy of the petition. They wanted to know if it was Union affiliated or . . . had something to do with the Union, and I told them no. . . . They wanted a copy of it and I told them they could not have a copy of it. They wanted to know what it was about; I told them it had something to do with me and the way the situation was handled.

David Folker, vice president of the Hospital, testified, inter alia, that McCarthy worked for the Hospital prior to May 1979 and then became an employee of Balco performing the same or similar duties; that Balco has a collective-bargaining agreement with a union covering its employees and containing a grievance procedure; and that he, Folker, recommended to Balco, in his letter dated March 7, 1980, that McCarthy be given "the fullest disciplinary action." See General Counsel's Exhibit 6.[6] Folker previously had spoken with Robert Campbell, a representative of Balco, about this incident:

> Mr. Campbell then asked me if I [Folker] would give him a letter indicating what the Hospital's posture would be . . . concerning this. There, I think, had also been some discussion with regard to Union support of McCarthy in whatever . . . mechanism would be necessary. I think that the letter or the discussion was a question to ally, for lack of a better word, or to get a clear cut support in terms of what the Hospital's view was.

Folker further testified that—after being apprised that Walsh had given McCarthy a supplemental statement—he spoke to Balco's vice president, Anthony Shaker, and "we . . . generally agreed to wait and see if the note surfaced or whatever." Folker added; "The information concerning the note surfaced immediately thereafter." See General Counsel's Exhibit 8, a letter from the International Brotherhood of Firemen and Oilers, AFL–CIO, to Shaker, dated April 7, referring to McCarthy's "grievance" and Walsh's note to McCarthy. Also, see General Counsel's Exhibit 7, a letter from Folker to Shaker, dated April 10, acknowledging "receipt of the information provided me concerning the letter prepared by Mr. John B. Walsh and delivered by him to Gerald McCarthy." Folker also testified that during his conversation with Shaker, which resulted in the April 10 letter (G.C. Exh. 7), he was told the following:

> The business agent for the Union . . . had told Mr. Shaker that the Union felt that there was a [substantial] grievance, or at least some basis for the grievance, for reinstatement of Mr. McCarthy, because of conflicting representation of events.

Folker generally acknowledged that Walsh had an "exemplary record" while employed at the Hospital; that Walsh was "offered a chance to resign which he declined"; and that "the release of this letter by Mr. Walsh [to McCarthy] was going to cause all kinds of problems for Balco and for Faulkner" and "could raise difficulties between Balco and McCarthy's Union." Folker admittedly referred to a "petition" signed by Hospital employees during his meeting with Walsh on or about April 4. Finally, Folker acknowledged that, previously, he had stated that Walsh "is incapable of lying"—"he had a compulsion to tell the truth."

I credit the testimony of Walsh as detailed above. Walsh's testimony stands in large part uncontradicted by the testimony of Folker or McBrine. Insofar as the above testimony of Walsh differs with the testimony of Folker or McBrine, I am persuaded on this entire record, including the demeanor of the witnesses, that the detailed account of this sequence by Walsh is accurate, reliable, and trustworthy. Indeed, I agree with Folker's earlier acknowledgment to the effect that Walsh "is incapable of lying" and "had a compulsion to tell the truth," qualities which it seems are becoming more difficult to find these days. And, as discussed below, it is this "compulsion" or desire on Walsh's part "to tell the truth" and do the "right thing," which resulted in his discharge.

[5] McBrine explained to Folker: "[H]e [McBrine] guessed it was only advice that he really gave" Walsh.

[6] Folker's March 7 letter to Balco asserts, inter alia, "Mr. McCarthy was consuming the contents of a recognizable can of beer during his discussion with the security" officer.

Discussion

Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act makes it an unfair labor practice "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in section 7." The presentation of employee grievances pursuant to the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement comes within the protection of Section 7. As the Sixth Circuit stated in N.L.R.B. v. Halsey W. Taylor Company, 342 F. 2d 406, 408 (1965):

> We are not concerned in this case with the merit or lack of merit of [the employee's] grievance. But it is clear that Sec. 7 protects his right to utter it as a matter of concerted activity with other employees for mutual aid

Also see N.L.R.B. v. Interboro Contractors, Inc., 388 F.2d 495, 500 (2d Cir. 1967). Equally protected under Section 7 is the pursuit of employee unemployment compensation claims. For, as the Board explained in Self Cycle & Marine Distributor Co., Inc., 237 NLRB 75, 76 (1978):

> It has long been recognized that this Board is required to administer the Act with careful accommodation to the statutory scheme as a whole. It is equally well settled that the matter of unemployment compensation benefits arises out of the employment relationship . . . and is one aspect of the national labor policy.

The Board, in applying these principles, has held that an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) by laying off an employee because he "assisted" and "submitted an affidavit" on behalf of another employee in connection with the latter's complaint before the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination. The Massachusetts Women's Hospital d/b/a Parker Hill Medical Center, 227 NLRB 1289 (1979). Likewise, the Board has held that an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) by discharging an employee because he provided "help" and "support" to another employee in support of the latter's grievance. Theatre Now, Inc. and The Grease Company, 211 NLRB 525, 534 (1974), 221 NLRB 1110 (1975), reversed 567 F.2d 531 (2d Cir. 1977). And, the Board has held that an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) by laying off an individual:

> . . . because he had, pursuant to request, furnished a statement which [the union] proffered shortly thereafter, during a contractual arbitration proceeding, to support a rank-and-file worker's grievance. Rohr Industries, Inc., 220 NLRB 1029 (1975).[7]

In addition, the Board has held that an employer "may violate Section 8(a) of the Act not only with respect to actions taken affecting [his] own employees, but also by actions affecting employees who do not stand in such an immediate employer-employee relationship." Lucky Stores, Inc., 243 NLRB 642, 643 (1979). For, as the Board, in agreement with the Trial Examiner, explained in Fabric Services, Inc., 190 NLRB 540, 541-542 (1971):

> I find no basis, either in the declared policy of the Act or in any delineating provision of it for construing Section 8(a)(1) as safeguarding employees in the exercise of the Section 7 rights only from infringements at the hands of their own employer. To the contrary, the specific language of the Act clearly manifests a legislative purpose to extend the statutory protection of Section 8(a)(1) beyond the immediate employer-employee relationship. Thus Section 8(a)(1) makes it "an unfair labor practice for an employer—to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7." And Section 2(3) declares, "The term employee shall include any employee, and shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer, unless the Act explicity states otherwise. . . ." Moreover, Section 2(9), which defines "labor dispute" as including "any controversy . . . regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relationship of employer and employee" further discloses a statutory aim to give the Act's various prohibitions a broad rather than narrow reading, except, of course, where the prohibition is limited in its internal context or is specifically restricted by other express language of the Act. See Phelps Dodge Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 313 U.S. 177, 192.

Also see A. M. Steigerwald Co., 236 NLRB 1512, 1515 (1978).

Applying these principles to the credited evidence of record here, I find and conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by discharging employee Walsh because Walsh assisted and gave a written statement to employee McCarthy used in support of McCarthy's pending grievance proceeding. Walsh, in furnishing McCarthy with this statement, was acting in good faith and engaging in conduct plainly protected by Section 7 of the Act.

Thus, Walsh was employed by the Hospital as a guard. McCarthy was, prior to May 1979, employed by the Hospital as a maintenance employee. The Hospital, in May 1979, contracted its maintenance work to Balco. McCarthy then became an employee of Balco. Walsh, on February 28, 1980, wrote an incident report concerning McCarthy's presence at the Hospital. See General Counsel's Exhibit 2. Walsh's superiors, McBrine and Folker, were most anxious to recommend to Balco that it fire McCarthy. McBrine and Folker, through design or carelessness, interpreted Walsh's report to state that McCarthy was observed by Walsh at the Hospital with alcoholic beverages on his possession. Folker in fact relayed this false information to Balco in his letter dated March 7, 1980. Walsh, however, repeatedly attempted to correct this mistake. Walsh was ultimately asked by McCarthy to give McCarthy a statement truthfully explaining the incident. Walsh prepared such a statement. See General Counsel's Exhibit 3. McCarthy turned this statement over to his Union and it was used in processing his grievance under the Union's contract with Balco. The Hospital, particularly Folker, had fully collaborated with Balco in causing McCarthy's discharge and considered itself, in effect, an "ally" of Balco in this endeavor. The Hospital therefore became annoyed at Walsh's insistence that his earlier report to the Hospital be limited to show only what he had actually observed.

[7] In Rohr Industries, supra, the laid-off individual was found to be a "supervisor," under the Act. In the instant case, as discussed below, I find Walsh to be an employee and not a supervisor as claimed. Consequently, it is unnecessary for me to reach the question, whether the discharge of a "supervisor," under the circumstances present here, violates Sec. 8(a)(1). See, generally, Rohr Industries, supra; Theatre Now, Inc., supra; and Alfred M. Lewis, Inc., 250 NLRB 496 (1980), and cases cited.

In sum, the Hospital fired Walsh because Walsh had furnished McCarthy with a statement truthfully stating what Walsh had observed. The statement, as noted, was used incidental to McCarthy's grievance proceeding. I regard Walsh's attempt here to furnish McCarthy with a truthful and reliable account of the incident in letter form no less protected than if Walsh had appeared personally at an unemployment compensation hearing or grievance hearing and there explained his earlier incident report.

The Hospital claims, inter alia, that Walsh was fired because, in speaking with McCarthy, he violated a "lawful command." The credible evidence of record makes it clear that Walsh was not in fact given such a "command." The Hospital claims that Walsh was fired because he had a "clandestine meeting" with McCarthy and left his post "without proper authority." The credible evidence of record shows that Walsh's 8- to 10-minute meeting with McCarthy in front of the Hospital was not "clandestine" and did not cause him to leave his post. The credible evidence of record also shows that guard employees would leave their duty stations for personal matters for more substantial periods without being disciplined or fired. In short, Folker, annoyed at and embarrassed by Walsh's "compulsion to tell the truth" about this incident, fired him, in vio lation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

In addition, Folker engaged in conduct which tended to impinge upon employee Section 7 rights when he stated to Walsh on April 4—in connection with a petition then being circulated by Walsh's fellow employees in an attempt to have Walsh reinstated—that the employee circulating the petition "was out in left field" and "he wouldn't be long with" the Hospital. Folker, at the same time, "wanted a copy of the petition" and quizzed Walsh if it "had something to do with the Union." The circulating of such a petition is protected concerted activity and Folker's statements, under the circumstances present here, tended to discourage and inhibit such activity, in violation of Section 8(a)(1). See Kings Terrace Nursing Home and Health Facility, 229 NLRB 1180, 1183 (1977).

The Hospital asserts that Walsh was a "supervisor" beyond the protection of the Act. A "supervisor" is defined in Section 2(11) of the Act, as:

> . . . any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

Actual existence of true supervisory power is to be distinguished from abstract, theoretical, or rule-book authority. It is well settled that a rank-and-file employee cannot be transformed into a supervisor merely by investing him or her with a "title and theoretical power to perform one or more of the enumerated functions." N.L.R.B. v. Southern Bleachery & Print Works, Inc., 257 F.2d 235, 239 (4th Cir. 1958), cert. denied 359 U.S. 911 (1959). What is relevant is the actual authority possessed and not the conclusory assertions of a company's officials. And, while the enumerated powers listed in Section 2(11) of the Act are to be read in the disjunctive, the section also "states the requirement of independence of judgment in the conjunctive with what goes before." Poultry Enterprises, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 216 F.2d 798, 802 (5th Cir. 1954). Thus, the individual must consistently display true independent judgment in performing one of the functions in Section 2(11) of the Act. The exercise of some supervisory tasks in a merely "routine," "clerical," "perfunctory," or "sporadic" manner does not elevate a rank-and-file employee into the supervisory ranks. N.L.R.B. v. Security Guard Service, Inc., 384 F.2d 143, 146–149 (5th Cir. 1967). The existence of independent judgment alone will not suffice; "the decisive question is whether [the individual involved has] been found to possess authority to use [his or her] independent judgment with respect to the exercise by [him or her] of some one or more of the specific authorities listed in § 2(11) of the Act." N.L.R.B. v. Brown & Sharpe Manufacturing Company, 169 F.2d 331, 334 (1st Cir. 1948). In short, "[s]ome kinship to management, some empathetic relationship between employer and employee, must exist before the latter becomes a supervisor for the former." N.L.R.B. v. Security Guard Service, Inc., supra, 384 F.2d at 149.

On this record, I find and conclude that Walsh did not sufficiently possess the authority to use his independent judgment with respect to the exercise by him of one or more of the specific authorities and indicia enumerated in Section 2(11) of the Act. He has not been shown here to have "responsibly" directed the employees or to have "effectively" recommended "such action." Thus, Walsh, as he credibly testified, worked from midnight to 8 a.m. He did not participate in the hiring process. In the past, he had recommended, without success, the hiring of various persons. He had no authority to discipline or discharge employees. He recalled that he had recommended that an employee be disciplined and his recommendation was ignored by Chief McBrine. He did not have the authority to promote or recommend the promotion of employees. All job evaluations, including the evaluation of Walsh, were performed by Chief McBrine. He explained that, in the past, he had attempted to become involved in the evaluation process and was instructed by Chief McBrine that this was not his job. He did not have authority to assign or responsibly direct employees. The performance of chores on the midnight shift was handled by the three to four security employees on a voluntary and "democratic" basis. He did not receive advance requests from employees for time off. Such requests went to Chief McBrine. On occasion, he would be told that an employee was going home early, however, he was once criticized by Chief McBrine for permitting this. He was hourly paid and received overtime. He made about 50 cents more per hour principally because of his grade level. He could not authorize overtime work. His job duties included: riding through the garage, releasing bodies, taking telephone calls, making rounds, pulling medical records, responding to pharmacy calls, collecting patient valuables, dealing with unruly persons, escorting nurses, and relaying messages to medical services or to an administrator or director on call. He spent about 95 percent of his time performing the same chores which his coworkers performed. When he was given the title "supervisor," there was no discussion about his authority and he was given no special instructions. He periodically switched shifts with rank-and-file security officers and "supervisors." This would result, on occasion, in no designated "supervisor" being present on the night shift.[8]

In conclusion, I find Walsh to be an employee. I find that the Hospital, in violation of Section 8(a)(1), fired employee Walsh because he assisted and gave a written statement to employee McCarthy, which was used by McCarthy in his grievance proceeding. Further, I find that the Hospital violated Section 8(a)(1) by coercively questioning employee Walsh about an employee petition being circulated to get Walsh reinstated, and by threatening that the employee circulating that petition would be, in effect, fired.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce as alleged.

2. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging employee Walsh because he assisted and gave a written statement to employee McCarthy, which statement was used by McCarthy in a grievance proceeding pertaining to McCarthy's discharge. Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(1) by coercively interrogating employee Walsh about an employee petition being circulated, seeking the reinstatement of Walsh, and by threatening that the employee circulating the petition would be fired.

3. The unfair labor practices found above affect commerce as alleged.[9]

THE REMEDY

To remedy the unfair labor practices found above, Respondent will be directed to cease and desist from engaging in such conduct, or like or related conduct, and to post the attached notice. Respondent will also be directed to offer to employee Walsh immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of earnings sustained as a result of Respondent's unlawful conduct, by paying him a sum of money equal to that which he normally would have earned from the date of the discrimination to the date of Respondent's offer of reinstatement, less net earnings during such period, with backpay computed as provided in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and with interest computed as provided in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[10]

The Respondent, Faulkner Hospital, Boston, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discharging employees because they have engaged in activities protected under Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

(b) Coercively interrogating employees about their activities protected under Section 7 of the Act, and threatening employees with discharge because they have engaged in such protected activities.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act:

(a) Offer employee John Walsh immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of earnings in the manner set forth in this Decision.

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board, or its agents, all payroll and other records as set forth in this Decision.

(c) Post at its facility in Boston, Massachusetts, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, in conspicuous places, and be maintained for 60 consecutive days. Reasonable steps shall be taken to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[8] I credit the above testimony of Walsh. As noted, he impressed me as a trustworthy and credible witness. His testimony relating his job authority and duties is substantiated in large part by the testimony of O'Brian. Folker and McBrine, in their testimony, cited job descriptions and various memoranda, attempting to attribute to Walsh authority and job duties involving discretion and alleged indicia of supervisory or managerial status. I do not credit these general and conclusory assertions of authority. I am persuaded here that Walsh has truthfully and accurately related his duties and authority.

[9] Respondent moves to correct the transcript (June 26, 1981). The General Counsel opposes some five of the requested corrections (June 30, 1981). Under all the circumstances, the proposed corrections which are undisputed are granted, and those which are disputed will be denied. The transcript, in this limited respect, is sufficiently understandable and no sufficient reason for further change has been demonstrated.

[10] See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Respondent will preserve and make available to the Board, upon request, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary and useful to determine compliance with and the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Decision.

[11] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[12] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 1, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

November 11, 1981

DECISION AND DIRECTION OF ELECTION

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, ZIMMERMAN

Upon a petition duly filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, a hearing was held on July 6, 8, 9, and 10, 1981, before Hearing Officer Wendy M. Bittner. Thereafter, pursuant to Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, the Regional Director for Region 1 transferred this proceeding to the National Labor Relations Board for decision. The Employer and the Petitioner have both filed briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the Hearing Officer's rulings made at the hearing and finds they are free from prejudicial error. They are hereby affirmed.

On the entire record in this proceeding, including the briefs, the Board finds:

1. The parties stipulated and we find that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act and it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

2. The Petitioner is a labor organization claiming to represent certain employees of the Employer.

3. A question affecting commerce exists concerning the representation of employees of the Employer within the meaning of Sections 9(c)(1) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

4. The petition filed sought a unit of all full-time and regular part-time projectionists at the Employer's movie theater. The Union contends that the proposed bargaining unit is comprised of two employees, George Giampietro and Philip Solomon. The Employer contends that Giampietro is a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and that the proposed unit is therefore inappropriate because it is comprised of only one employee. Thus, the sole issue in this proceeding is whether Giampietro is a supervisor.

The theater which was opened on June 12, 1981, has eight screens and normally shows eight different movies to eight separate audiences. The normal operating hours are 1 p.m. to midnight, sometimes with extra midnight shows on the weekends. The theater has a manager who is assisted by three assistant managers. The theater also employs 50 to 60 service employees who sell tickets, refreshments, and perform the various ushering and cleanup functions.

The Employer currently employs only the two aforementioned projectionists. They are responsible for threading the films on the projection equipment and for monitoring and maintaining that equipment. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts requires that all projectionists working in commercial movie theaters obtain a license by passing a combined written and physical examination. The projectionists work in a projection booth which is a large room with two desks. The booth is kept locked when not in operation and only the manager has a key.

Giampietro has worked for the Employer at other theaters for 7-1/2 years. Solomon is a new employee. Giampietro works a half day on Wednesday and all day on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. Solomon works a half day on Wednesday and all day on Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday. Thus, they are never present at the same time. Both are hourly employees. Both are listed on the Employer's payroll printouts as merely "projectionists." Both fill out timesheets which are reviewed for accuracy by the management and submitted to the Employer's main offices. The projectionists receive their paychecks directly from the manager. Both projectionists perform identical functions in the operation of the projection equipment. Giampietro has no special responsibilities and has no special title. The projectionists are both required to fill out the projection booth report form in the same manner and sign it as "operators" and Giampietro's role with respect to these reports is indistinguishable from Solomon's. Both projectionists share the use of two desks in the booth.

The Employer's memorandums of policy go to the manager and not to Giampietro. Giampietro does not attend management meetings. The Employer provides an extensive film and sound presentation course for managers and assistant managers. Giampietro was not invited to attend this course. Only the manager has the authority to call in a service technician to repair the projection equipment.

With respect to the scheduling of hours of work for projectionists, Giampietro has no special authority. Giampietro and Solomon mutually agree on an acceptable schedule. If there is a change in the normal schedule, the projectionists will first inform the manager. If either projectionist is going to be absent from work, he will request the other to cover his shift or he will find another replacement.

Giampietro is not responsible for performing evaluations of Solomon. There is no evidence that he has ever adjusted grievances, or meted out discipline with respect to Solomon.

Prior to the opening of the theater, Giampietro was asked by management whether he knew a skilled person who might want to work as a projectionist at the theater. Giampietro informed management that he had a friend who was interested, and Giampietro suggested Solomon. Giampietro's knowledge of Solomon and his qualifications resulted from his friendship with Solomon as part of a small group of projectionists and film buffs that normally make themselves aware of job openings in the industry. With respect to Solomon's hourly wage, Giampietro did not initiate any suggestions or recommendations with respect to his pay scale. When asked what he thought Solomon's wage should be, he declined to make a suggestion.

In light of the record herein we are not persuaded that Giampietro is a supervisor. Section 2(11) of the Act defines a supervisor as:

> . . . any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

The record reveals Giampietro is merely the Employer's most experienced projectionist. His daily operational routine is identical to that of the other projectionist. It has not been established that he possesses any of the above indicia of supervisory authority. With the exception of the first week that the theater was open, the two employees never work at the same time. Giampietro is an hourly employee, receives overtime, and exercises no special management privileges. The Employer has presented no documentary evidence from its records to indicate that he is a supervisor.

The lynchpin of the Employer's claim that Giampietro is a supervisor is its contention that he had the power to hire and actually hired Solomon. We find that, in referring Solomon, Giampietro functioned only as a skilled craftsman with knowledge of a pool of qualified applicants and that his role was not that of a supervisor invested with the authority of management to hire.[1]

Thus, we find that Giampietro is not a supervisor and properly belongs within the unit. Accordingly, we shall direct an election among the employees in the following appropriate unit, as requested:

> All full-time and regular part-time projectionists employed at the Employer's Assembly Square Cinema, Somerville, Massachusetts but excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Employer contends that Giampietro is a supervisor because he was a supervisor at its Natick theater and his duties at the Somerville theater have remained the same. However his duties at Natick may be characterized, we find that it has not been established that Giampietro possesses supervisory authority, or has excercised such authority, at Somerville.

Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Local Union No. 13, AFL-CIO (Sheet Metal Contractors Association, Hudson & Bergen Counties, New Jersey) and Paul Mirable. Case 22-CB-4378

November 23, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS JENKINS AND HUNTER

On August 20, 1981, Administrative Law Judge D. Barry Morris issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, both Respondent and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and Respondent filed an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.[3]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Local Union No. 13, AFL-CIO, Union, New Jersey, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following paragraph as paragraph 1(c):

"(c) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to refer nonmembers to jobs through our exclusive hiring hall.

WE WILL NOT demand the payment of back dues for periods when dues were not validly required as a condition of employment, as a requirement for reinstatement into membership and referral through our hiring hall.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole Paul Mirable for any loss of earnings, plus interest, he may have suffered as a result of our refusal to refer him to work and WE WILL reimburse him for the back dues, which we required him to pay.

SHEET METAL WORKERS INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION, LOCAL UNION No. 13, AFL-CIO

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

D. BARRY MORRIS, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in Newark, New Jersey, on April 30, May 1, 18, and 19, 1981. The charge was filed on June 27, 1980, and the complaint was issued on September 26, 1980, alleging that Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Local Union No. 13, AFL-CIO (Respondent), violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act). Respondent filed an answer denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

The parties were given full opportunity to participate, produce evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue orally, and file briefs. Briefs were filed by all parties.

Upon the entire record of the case, including my observation of the witnesses, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE ASSOCIATION

Sheet Metal Contractors Association, Hudson & Bergen Counties, New Jersey (the Association), a New Jersey corporation with its principal offices in New Jersey, is an association of employers whose members are engaged in the business of building construction in New Jersey. For many years the employer-members of the Association have delegated to it the authority to conduct collective-bargaining negotiations on their behalf

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

[3] We have modified the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order and notice to conform to the statutory language.

and to enter into a collective-bargaining agreement. During the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint, the employer-members of the Association purchased goods valued in excess of $50,000 from suppliers in other States for delivery within New Jersey.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Association is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The complaint alleges that beginning December 30, 1979,[1] Respondent refused to refer Paul Mirable to work from its exclusive hiring hall because he was not a member of Respondent. The complaint also alleges that on June 24, 1980, Respondent required Mirable, as a condition precedent to reinstatement, to pay back dues for the period following September 24, when Mirable was not a member of Respondent. Respondent denied the allegations. The issues are:

(1) Did Respondent refuse to refer Mirable to work from its exclusive hiring hall because he was not a member of Respondent; and

(2) Did Respondent require Mirable to pay back dues as a condition precedent to reinstatement to membership in Respondent and referral from its hiring hall.

B. The Facts

1. Background

Mirable, a journeyman sheet metal worker, has been a member of Respondent for approximately 13 years. Respondent is a party to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Association, the most recent of which was effective from July 1, 1978, through June 30, 1981. The collective-bargaining agreement provides for an exclusive job referral system whereby all sheet metal workers to be employed by the employer-members of the Association must be referred by Respondent.

During August, Mirable worked for several days at a job in Ithaca, New York. The job was under the jurisdiction of Local 112 in Elmira. As a result of that job, Mirable was brought up on charges by Local 112, was found guilty and fined $1,000 by Local 112, and was expelled from membership in the International. Thereafter, Mirable appealed to the International but his appeal was denied as being untimely.

During the pendency of the appeal, until December 6, Respondent permitted Mirable to seek work through its exclusive job referral system. Mirable was in fact referred to employment on several occasions during the fall of 1979. Respondent also accepted the tender of dues by Mirable in October and November. However, by letter dated November 30, the International notified Respondent that since Mirable was fined $1,000 "and expelled by Local 112, it will be necessary for him to pay his fine and to receive clearance from Local 112 before he can be reinstated and dues accepted." On December 18, Raymond Fleck, Respondent's financial secretary-treasurer, sent Mirable a check for $204 as reimbursement of the November dues, reinstatement, and appeal fees and advised Mirable that "Local 13 cannot accept your dues until you receive clearance from Local 112." Thereafter, no dues were accepted.

2. Refusal to refer through hiring hall

On December 3, Mirable was referred through Respondent's exclusive job referral system to a job for Hawthorne Sheet Metal, an employer-member of the Association. The job for Hawthorne lasted about a day and a half. On December 6, Mirable returned to Respondent's hall to seek work. Mirable credibly testified that George Murray, Respondent's business manager, told him that he "couldn't sign the book no more."[2] Mirable credibly testified, as follows:

> Q. Did Murray tell you why you couldn't be referred to work?
> A. Yes, because you're not a member no more.
> Q. Did you sign in that day?
> A. No. I wasn't allowed to sign in. Only . . . if you're in the union you can sign in.

Mirable testified that during the next several months he kept on coming to the hall, asking for work. He testified that both Murray and William Voitle, Respondent's business agent, repeatedly told him "because I have no card, you can't work out of the hall." Mirable's testimony was corroborated by Paul Schachter, Mirable's attorney and one of his witnesses. Schachter testified that Mirable came to him in March 1980 with respect to his not being referred by Respondent. Schachter credibly testified as follows:

> Q. So what did you do?
> A. After doing some preliminary investigation of the facts of the case I called up Local 13 and I spoke to George Murray concerning the status of Mr. Mirable.
> Q. When was this conversation?
> A. This was on March 11th.
> Q. And what was said in the conversation?
> A. I told Mr. Murray—I identified myself. I said I'm Paul Schachter, Director of the Labor Law Clinic; we're trying to assist Mr. Mirable in getting reinstated to his job so that he could be again referred out from the hiring hall since he was not being referred out at the instant time . . . . and Mr.

[1] All dates refer to 1979 unless otherwise specified.

[2] Inasmuch as the events of December 6 occurred prior to the 10(b) period, I am not finding any violation of the Act based on such events. However, "earlier events may be utilized to shed light on the true character of matters occurring within the limitations period; and for that purpose 10(b) ordinarily does not bar such evidentiary use of anterior events." Local Lodge No. 1424, International Association of Machinists, AFL-CIO, et al. v. N.L.R.B., 362 U.S. 411, 416 (1960).

> Murray told me that they had no objection to reinstating Mr. Mirable. The problem was, however, that they had to get clearance from Owen Jones at Local 112 in upstate New York.
> I asked Mr. Murray if Mr. Mirable would be referred out to jobs pending getting the clearance from . . . Mr. Jones, since . . . Mr. Mirable had already paid the fine.
> Mr. Murray told me that as soon as Mr. Mirable was reinstated to the union, he would be able to be referred out for jobs again.
> Q. Did Murray say anything further in the conversation? He said that as soon as Mr Mirable was reinstated he could be referred out from the hall at Local 13.
> Q. Did Murray say anything further?
> A. Yes. When I asked Mr. Murray if Mr. Mirable could be referred pending his reinstatement into the union, the answer was that only—he would have to be in the union because only union people could be referred from the hall.

Schachter also testified with respect to a further conversation he had with Murray towards the latter part of April 1980. Schachter inquired of Murray whether Mirable's application for reinstatement was being processed, to which Murray replied in the affirmative. Schachter credibly testified as follows:

> I asked Mr. Murray if Mr. Mirable would be referred out to jobs now that the application was being processed. Mr. Murray said, no, that he would not be referred out to jobs until he was reinstated into the union, which he expected to be shortly.

While Murray denied that he told Mirable that he could not sign the out-of-work list, he admitted that he told Mirable "you have to pay the fine or I'm not able to send you to work." Murray also testified that when Mirable finished the Hawthorne job he came to the hall but "didn't sign an out-of-work sheet, and he didn't sign the book."

I credit Mirable's testimony that Murray and Voitle told him "because I have no card, you can't work out of the hall." This testimony, in effect, was corroborated by Schachter who credibly testified that Murray told him that only union people would be referred from the hiring hall and that Mirable would not be referred again until he was reinstated into membership. Murray virtually conceded this when he testified that he told Mirable that "you have to pay the fine or I'm not able to send you to work." With respect to Murray's testimony that Mirable appeared at the hall after the Hawthorne job but did not sign the book, it is inconceivable that Mirable would voluntarily not have signed the book. Murray testified that under the hiring hall procedure, when an individual reports out of work "he comes into the union office and we have slips of paper on the desk in a box and he signs in the paper and he signs his name." He also testified that this procedure is something that the members "automatically" follow. Inasmuch as Mirable had finished the Hawthorne job and was out of work, it is incredible that he would have appeared at the hall and, on his own volition, not have signed the out-of-work list. The evidence instead clearly points to the credibility of Mirable's statement that he was instructed not to sign the out-of-work list.

Accordingly, I find that Mirable was told by Respondent that he could not sign the out-of-work list because he was not a member of Respondent. After December 30, this instruction was reaffirmed by Respondent's statements that because Mirable had no "card," he could not "work out of the hall." I find that commencing December 30[3] Mirable was not referred to jobs by Respondent through its hiring hall because he was not a member of Respondent.

3. Employment at Hudson Food

Mirable testified that he attended an executive board meeting of Respondent on April 21, 1980. While at the union office he met Peter Nigro, vice president of Hudson Food Service Equipment Company (Hudson), who offered him a job as a welder. Mirable felt that he could not take the job because he did not have a "card." Peter Nigro corroborated Mirable's testimony as to the job offer. He stated that he met Mirable at the union office on April 21. He testified as follows:

> Q. Would you tell the court the circumstances under which you met him, what had happened, how he was introduced to you and so forth?
> A. I just met him in the outer offices there and I asked him if he was a sheet metal worker and he said yes and I asked him if he was working. He said no. I asked him if he wanted to work with us. I needed at that time a man in the shop to do sinks and dish tables.

Joseph Nigro, president of Hudson, testified that Mirable first came to work on June 16, 1980. He testified that he called either Murray or Voitle who told him that Mirable "could work." However, Nigro testified that he could not have sent Mirable to do "outside" work without a union card.

Based upon the testimony of Mirable, Peter Nigro, and Joseph Nigro, I find that Mirable was offered a job with Hudson on April 21, 1980. However, this job was not referred by Respondent through the hiring hall. Instead, Mirable happened to meet Peter Nigro at the union office. After finding out that Mirable was a welder, Nigro offered him a job. I conclude that the job offer was not a referral by Respondent through its hiring hall.

4. Reinstatement fee

Mirable testified that Fleck invited him to come to an executive board meeting on April 21, 1980. At that time he was told that he would have to pay the sum of $395 to be reinstated to membership in Respondent. Mirable testified that that night Fleck handed him General Counsel's Exhibit 3(b) which itemizes the total of $395 as follows: $296—"8 months back dues" for October 1979–May 1980; $25—"reinstatement fee"; and $74—"June & July dues." Mirable testified that he paid the $395 on June 24, 1980.[4] Fleck did not deny Mirable's version of the events.

[3] While the practice of nonreferral began on December 6, as pointed out above, inasmuch as December 6 antedates the 10(b) period, no violation is being found for events occurring prior to December 30.

I credit Mirable's testimony which essentially is uncontroverted and I find that Respondent required Mirable to pay a fee of $395 as a condition precedent to being reinstated into membership in Respondent. I find that the $395 fee consisted of $296 back dues for the period October 1979 to May 1980; $25 reinstatement fee; and $74 as dues for June and July 1980.

C. Discussion and Analysis

1. Refusal to refer

The law is well settled that a union violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act when, under an exclusive hiring-hall agreement with an employer, it accords its own members preference in job referrals over nonmembers using its hiring hall facilities. Local 357, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America [Los Angeles-Seattle Motor Express] v. N.L.R.B., 365 U.S. 667, 674–675 (1961); N.L.R.B. v. Local 269, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO, and Mercer County Division, New Jersey Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association 357 F.2d 51, 55 (3d Cir. 1966). As the Board has stated in Sachs Electric Company, 248 NLRB 669, 670 (1980).

> The operation of a union hiring hall imposes considerable responsibilities on the union agents in charge of the hall. Thus, they must neither foster nor countenance discrimination with regard to access to, or referral from, the hall on the basis of International union membership, local union membership, or any other arbitrary, invidious, or irrelevant considerations.

Respondent concedes that if in fact Mirable was discriminated against because of his not being a member in Respondent, such discrimination constitutes a violation of the Act.[5] I have found that in early December Respondent was notified by the International that it could no longer accept dues from Mirable. Soon thereafter, Mirable was told he could no longer "sign in" and was thereafter not referred to jobs from the hiring hall. These findings are based upon Mirable's credible testimony which was corroborated by the testimony of Schachter. Indeed, Murray himself testified that he told Mirable "you have to pay the fine or I'm not able to send you to work."

I further find that the discrimination continued until June 24, 1980. While Mirable was offered a job with Hudson in April 1980 this was not pursuant to a referral through Respondent's hiring hall.

Accordingy, I find that from December 30, 1979, until June 24, 1980, Respondent refused to refer Mirable to jobs from its hiring hall because Mirable was not a member of Respondent in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

2. Reinstatement fee

An applicant cannot be required to pay back dues for a period when dues were not validly required as a condition of employment. Bricklayers', Local No. 8, supra, 235 NLRB at 1005. I have found that Mirable was not offered work through Respondent's hiring hall from December 30, 1979, until June 24, 1980. I have further found that on June 24, 1980, Respondent demanded, and Mirable paid, the sum of $296 as back dues for the period of October 1979 through May 1980.

Respondent argues that the money requested constituted a "reinitiation" fee. However, the record does not support a finding that Mirable was asked for a "reinitiation" fee. On the contrary, General Counsel Exhibit's 3(b), which was handed to Mirable on June 24, 1980, specifically states the $296 as "8 months back dues." The "reinstatement fee" is specifically stated to be $25.

Accordingly, I find that Respondent's requirement that Mirable pay back dues for the period of December 30, 1979, to June 24, 1980, violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. See United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, East Pennsylvania Industrial District Council, AFL-CIO (Ridge Homes, a Division of Evans Products Co., Inc.) 224 NLRB 1144, 1148 (1976).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Association is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By refusing to refer Mirable to employment through its hiring hall from December 30, 1979, to June 24, 1980, because Mirable was not a member of Respondent, Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

4. By requiring Mirable to pay back dues for the period of December 30, 1979, to June 24, 1980, as a condition precedent to Mirable's reinstatement to membership and referral through the hiring hall, Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices constitute unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[4] Mirable credibly testified that he gave Fleck $400 and received change so that the total paid was "three ninety something." While the record contains a receipt for $99, which appears to include $25 as reinstatement fee and $74 for June and July dues, I credit Mirable's testimony that he in fact paid an additional $296, for a total of $395.

[5] Respondent adduced testimony to show that during the winter months a number of employees were out of work. In the first place, Respondent has not shown that jobs were unavailable. In fact, Voitle conceded that "Mirable would have had no problem getting a kitchen equipment job if he had signed the list between December of 1979 and July of 1980." More importantly, however, the Board has held that where a union refuses to refer an applicant because of improper union considerations, the General Counsel need not prove that jobs were available at the time of the request for referral. Bricklayers' and Stonemasons' International Union, Local No. 8, B.M. & P.I.U. of America (California Conference of Mason Contractor Associations, Inc.), 235 NLRB 1001, 1005 (1978).

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall order it to cease and desist therefrom and to take affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent having refused to refer Mirable to employment through its hiring hall from December 30, 1979, to June 24, 1980, I shall order Respondent to make Mirable whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered by not being referred to jobs during that period.

In addition, having found that Respondent unlawfully required Mirable to pay back dues as a condition precedent to his reinstatement into membership and referral through the hiring hall, I shall order Respondent to reimburse him for the amount of back dues paid for the period of December 30, 1979, to June 24, 1980.[6]

Backpay shall be computed in accordance with the formula approved in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950). Interest shall be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[7]

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[8]

The Respondent, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Local Union No. 13, AFL-CIO, Union, New Jersey, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to refer nonmembers to jobs through its exclusive hiring hall.

(b) Demanding the payment of back dues for periods when dues were not validly required as a condition of employment, as a requirement for reinstatement into membership and referral through the hiring hall.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Make whole Paul Mirable for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of Respondent's refusal to refer him to work, in the manner set forth above in the section entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Reimburse Mirable for back dues which he was required to pay for the period December 30, 1979, to June 24, 1980, plus interest, in the manner set forth above in the section entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Post at its offices, meeting halls, and hiring halls, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 22, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

[6] Counsel for Mirable urges that I order Respondent to reimburse the $1,000 fine which Mirable paid to Respondent for transmittal to Local 112. At the hearing, counsel for Mirable moved to amend the complaint to include an allegation that Mirable was required to pay the $1,000 fine. Counsel for the General Counsel and Respondent objected to the motion. Pursuant to GTE Automatic Electric, Inc., 196 NLRB 902 (1972), I denied the motion to amend. Accordingly, inasmuch as the matter of the fine was not litigated in this proceeding, I cannot order the relief requested by the Charging Party.

[8] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[9] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JENKINS, ZIMMERMAN, AND HUNTER

On June 29, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Norman Zankel issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed a brief in opposition to Respondent's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions, brief, and brief in opposition, and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified herein,[2] and to adopt his recommended Order.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for the Administrative Law Judge's Conclusion of Law:

"4. By refusing to furnish Painters District Council No. 22, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL-CIO, or its agents, for an audit, its books and record of original entry, including its general ledger, for the period September 1, 1979, to the date of completion of the audit, the Employer has refused to bargain collectively with the Union, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act."

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, L. M. Settles Construction Co., Inc., Livonia, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

NORMAN ZANKEL, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me on March 13 and May 27, 1981, in Detroit, Michigan.

Upon an original charge filed on June 9, 1980,[1] by Painters District Council No. 22, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL-CIO (the Union), the Regional Director for Region 7 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a complaint and notice of hearing on July 30.

In essence, the complaint alleges that L. M. Settles Construction Co., Inc. (the Employer), refused to bargain collectively with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act), when it refused the Union's May 9 request to conduct a comprehensive audit of its financial records, including its general ledger, which, the complaint claimed, was needed to enable the Union to police the Employer's administration of a collective-bargaining agreement between the parties.

The Employer filed a timely answer, filed a written amendment thereto, and made a further oral amendment at the hearing which admitted certain matters but denied the substantive allegation and that it committed any unfair labor practices.

All parties appeared at the hearing. Each was represented by counsel and was afforded full opportunity to be heard, to introduce and meet material evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to present oral argument, and to file briefs. Counsel for the General Counsel and the Union's counsel argued orally. In addition, the Employer's counsel and the Union's counsel filed briefs on June 8 and 15, 1981, respectively. I was administratively advised that the General Counsel would file no brief. I have carefully considered the oral arguments and the contents of the briefs submitted.

Upon consideration of the entire record, the arguments, and the briefs, and from my observation of the single witness and his demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Based upon the Employer's answer, as finally amended, there is no issue as to jurisdiction or labor organization status.

The Employer, a Michigan corporation, has maintained its office and place of business in Livonia, Michigan, where it has been engaged in the drywall construction business.

At all material times, the Employer has been a member of the Michigan Dry Wall Contractors Association, Inc. (the Association), which is comprised of employers engaged in the drywall construction industry and which exists for the purpose, inter alia, of representing its employer-members in negotiating and administering collective-bargaining agreements with various labor organizations, including the Union.

[1] In adopting the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to permit the Union to examine its financial records, including its general ledger, for the purpose of conducting a comprehensive audit, we agree with his finding that deferral to arbitration is inappropriate herein because the audit authorization provisions for fringe benefit payments contained in art. XVIII are explicitly exempt from the grievance and arbitration provisions of art. XX of the parties' agreement. Accordingly, we find it unnecessary to rely on the Administrative Law Judge's further grounds for declining to defer this matter to arbitration.

[2] We will modify the Administrative Law Judge's Conclusions of Law to conform more fully with his recommended Order.

During the calendar year immediately preceding issuance of the complaint, the various members of the Association generated gross revenues in excess of $500,000. During the same period of time, the members of the Association purchased goods and supplies valued in excess of $50,000 from various suppliers which, in turn, purchased such goods and caused them to be transported and delivered to their Michigan facilities directly from points located outside Michigan.

Upon all the foregoing, I find that the Employer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

The material facts are undisputed. They are a composite of the testimony of the sole witness, Michael G. Maher, administrative assistant to the Union's fringe benefit funds, and supporting documentary evidence.[2]

(The Employer objected to some of Maher's testimony regarding what was reported to him by employee Chandler as hearsay. The Employer argues I should draw adverse inferences regarding what apparently emanated from Chandler because he was present at the hearing, but was not called to testify. I decline to make such inferences because the documentary evidence fully supports and confirms all matter which Maher attributed to Chandler. In all other respects, Maher's testimony stands uncontradicted. The Employer rested without calling any witness to testify in its behalf).

At all material times, the Employer, as a member of the Association, has been a signatory to a collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the Association. At the time of the events relevant herein, the Employer was bound to such a collective-bargaining agreement in effect until May 31, 1980.

In material part, the collective-bargaining agreement (art. XVIII) provides for the Employer to make regular contributions to the Union's deposit fund to cover the fringe benefit package contained in said agreement. The amount of such contribution is based on the number of hours worked by each employee covered by that agreement.

The funds contributed by Association members is administered by trustees of Painters Union Deposit Funds (the Trustees). Article XVIII, section 2, contains the employer-members' authorization for "any accountant selected by the Trustees . . . to make regular audits of . . . [their] . . . payroll records to ascertain whether . . . [they have] . . . complied with the requirements" of the collective-bargaining agreement. Additionally, the audit authority provides for "any accountant selected by the Trustees . . . to have access to, and to inspect any and all books, records, accounts, ledgers, and records of original entry, for the purpose of determining whether or not the Employer has conformed with" its obligations to make fringe benefit contributions. Finally, the provision for regular audits specifies "such inspection shall be made only on an express order of the . . . Trustees."

On or about July 18, 1979, the Union conducted a regular audit (apparently pursuant to the contractual provisions quoted above) of the instant Employer's books and records. At that time, employee Chandler was not working for the Employer.[3]

Chandler started work for the Employer in a classification covered by the collective-bargaining agreement during the second week of September 1979. The Employer issued a check, dated September 14, 1979, to Chandler for $210. Because the Employer had not yet received Chandler's withholding authorizations, that check represented his gross wages.[4]

Sometime in November 1979, Chandler showed Maher a copy (or original)[5] of the $210 check. Chandler told Maher he believed other employees had been paid the "same way."

In Maher's experience, he occasionally found employers had circumvented their obligation to make fringe benefit contributions by making wage payments to employees from funds held in other than payroll accounts. Such payments had been made by issuance of so-called side checks. Thus, upon seeing Chandler's $210 check, Maher became suspicious that the Employer might be seeking to avoid its contractual obligations. Accordingly, Maher examined the Employer's contribution report forms. He concluded that the $210 check was drawn upon the Employer's general account by noting that the check was of the same kind which was used by the Employer to send its fringe benefit contributions to the Union.

On or about January 23, 1980, Maher reported to the trustees. He explained the existence of a possible breach of the Employer's obligation to contribute to the fringe benefit funds. The trustees ordered Maher to conduct a full comprehensive audit, including the books of original entry of the Employer.

By letter dated January 23, dispatched by regular mail, Maher wrote the Employer he had been instructed by the Trustees "to conduct a full Comprehensive Audit of all your records, and books of original entry, for the period January 1, 1978, to the date of completion of this Audit." Maher's letter asked the Employer to contact him within 5 days to arrange the audit. Maher received no response.

On February 6, Maher dispatched another letter by certified mail to the Employer. Its terms were identical to the January 23 letter. The February 6 letter was returned to Maher marked "Unclaimed."

[3] It is not asserted that this audit revealed any deficiency in the Employer's contributions.

[4] Chandler did not negotiate the check. It was later replaced by the Employer with a payroll check representing Chandler's net wages after appropriate withholding deductions.

[5] Maher was unsure whether he saw the original. I do not consider this significant.

On March 3, Maher once again dispatched his February 6 letter, this time by regular mail.

On March 21, Maher wrote the Employer. He referred to his letters of January 23 and February 6. The March 21 letter states, in relevant part, that the trustees "have given express orders for . . . . [Maher] . . . to conduct a full Comprehensive Audit of all your records, and books of original entry, for the period January 1, 1978 to December 31, 1979." Maher asked the Employer to contact him within 5 days to arrange for his examination of the records. The March 21 letter ends with the admonition that the Employer's failure to comply would result in Maher's request of the trustees for them to file unfair labor practice charges.

The Employer's president, Louis Settles, telephoned Maher around March 25 or 26. Settles asked Maher what he was seeking. Maher requested production of specific material, including the general ledger. Settles said he needed more time to consider the request.

Sometime later, Settles contacted Maher. They arranged for Maher to examine the Employer's books at Settles' office on May 9.

On May 9, Maher, together with a field auditor, met with Settles. Settles was presented with a copy of Chandler's $210 check. Settles explained that no deduction authorization form had been received by the Employer at the time that check had been issued. Settles also told Maher that check had not been cashed and was replaced with the Employer's payroll check.

Settles then gave Maher some of the records he requested. Specifically, Maher examined certain quarterly reports and individual payroll summaries. Maher asked to examine the Employer's general ledger. Settles declined to produce it.

Maher completed his examination of the records provided. He verified that all fringe benefits for Chandler and all other employees reported by the Employer to the Union's funds appeared consistent with the Employer's payroll summaries. Nonetheless, Maher repeated his request to examine the general ledger. Settles said he would have to think about whether he would produce the general ledger and would "get back" to Maher.

Maher credibly testified, and was unshaken during cross-examination on this issue, that without studying the general ledger he could not determine whether any "side" check had been issued to any employee. Maher further testified that the fringe benefit contribution forms, alone, would not necessarily reflect that an employer had made contributions for all hours worked. Those forms comprise a self-serving declaration by an employer of whatever number of hours worked the employer desires to place thereon.

About 2 weeks later, Maher and Settles spoke. Maher asked to see the general ledger. Settles said he decided not to deliver it.

Shortly thereafter, Maher reported to the trustees that Settles refused access to all the books and records and that the comprehensive audit was not completed. The trustees concluded they needed the general ledger to determine whether any employee had been issued a "side" check. The trustees directed Union Attorney Gold to pursue the issue. This resulted in the filing of the charge underlying the instant Complaint.

B. Analysis

The General Counsel and the Union contend the comprehensive audit, including the Employer's general ledger, is necessary and relevant to the Union's performance of its collective-bargaining obligations. As to necessity, they claim the general ledger, specifically, is needed to ascertain whether the Employer's fund contribution report forms accurately reflect all payments made to employees. Thus, if the general ledger were to reveal no side checks had been issued to employees, that would indicate the Employer fulfilled its fringe benefit obligations. On the other hand, if the general ledger reveals such side checks had been issued, the Union might decide to take appropriate action to enforce the contract.[6]

The Employer contends (1) no prima facie case has been established, and (2) the Board should defer to arbitration. The Employer claimed the General Counsel "must establish . . . [the Union] . . . held a reasonable belief that it will discover contract violations from the information requested."

I agree with the position taken by the General Counsel and the Union.

1. Relevance and necessity

The Employer asserts the evidence reflects the Union had only a speculative hint of any contract violation. As such, the Employer contends a prima facie case had not been established.

I find the facts show the Union had cause to believe the Employer breached its contractual obligation to make fringe benefit contributions. Thus, Maher was presented with Chandler's side check. This, alone, was a sufficient basis to doubt the accuracy of the information submitted by the Employer on its fringe benefit contribution reports.

Additionally, Maher was informed other employees had been paid the same way. Though literally hearsay, that information buttressed and enhanced his doubts.

The trustees then acted responsibly in ordering the comprehensive audit. That order set in motion the machinery by which the Union could obtain information by which it could determine whether a contract breach was present.

It is well established that a labor organization, obligated to represent employees in a bargaining unit with respect to their terms and conditions of employment, is entitled to such information from the employer as may be relevant and reasonably necessary to the proper execution of that obligation. Vertol Division, Boeing Company, 182 NLRB 421 (1970); N.L.R.B. v. Whitin Machine Works, 217 F.2d 593 (4th Cir. 1955), cert. denied 349

[6] Art. XX of the relevant collective-bargaining agreement establishes an extensive grievance and arbitration procedure "whenever a dispute arises between . . . [the parties] . . . concerning the carrying out of this agreement." However, as will be shown in subsec. II,B,2, infra, the subject of fringe benefit contributions is expressly excluded from operation of the grievance and arbitration procedure.

U.S. 905. The right to such information exists not only for the purpose of negotiating a contract, but also for the purpose of administering a collective-bargaining agreement. The employer's obligation, in either instance, is predicated on the need of the union for such information in order to provide intellignt representation of the employees. F. W. Woolworth Company, 109 NLRB 196, 197 (1954), enfd. 352 U.S. 938 (1956).

The test of the union's need for such information is simply a showing of "probability that the desired information was relevant, and that it would be of use to the Union in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibility." N.L.R.B. v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 437 (1967).[7] The union need not demonstrate that the information sought is certainly relevant or clearly dispositive of the dispute between the parties. The fact that the information is of potential relevance is sufficient to give rise to an obligation on the part of an employer to provide it. The Brooklyn Union Gas Company, 220 NLRB 189 (1975).

The appropriate standard in determining the potential relevance of information sought in aid of a bargaining agent's responsibility is a liberal discovery-type standard. Acme Industrial, supra.

Herein, the evidence reflects the Employer granted the Union access to a variety of records and reports on May 9. Nonetheless, I conclude that the material produced was insufficient to permit a fair and complete evaluation of the Employer's compliance with its contractual obligation to make fringe benefit contributions. Indeed, the Employer's denial of the general ledger constitutes a reservation to the Employer of the right to satisfy the legal standard upon its unilaterally determined standard of relevance. Such usurpation is contrary to the Employer's agreement, article XVIII, which grants the trustees the right to conduct audits. Moreover, such a reservation is impermissible under Board law. L & M Carpet Contractors, Inc., 218 NLRB 802, 804 (1975). In L & M, as herein, an employer submitted some but not all, of the records requested by the auditor. The Board left undisturbed the administrative law judges' finding that the employer refused to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing or refusing to provide access to all the records, including the general ledger.

The question of relevance is properly for the Board's determination. In Acme Industrial, supra, the Court noted (385 U.S. at 435–436):

> There can be no question of the general obligation of an employer to provide information that is needed by the bargaining representative for the proper performance of its duties. N.L.R.B. v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149. . . . The only real issue in this case, therefore, is whether the Board must await an arbitrator's determination of the relevancy of the requested information before it can enforce the union's statutory rights.

I find the contents of the general ledger presumptively relevant to the Union's collective-bargaining functions herein. Murray Bagdasorian d/b/a Michael Rossi Carpet Co., 208 NLRB 748, 753 (1974); Michigan Drywall Corporation, M & D Drywall, Inc., and James F. Mullins, 232 NLRB 120 (1977). This is so because production of the Employer's general ledger would have permitted the Union to compare payments made by the Employer to employees (if such payments appear in the general ledger) with the hours worked which were reported by the Employer on its fringe benefit contribution reports; or the Union would have discovered that no such side payments had been made. To deprive the Union of this ability to make such a comparison effectively vitiates its collective-bargaining obligation to police implementation of the collective-bargaining agreement. Ellisworth Sheet Metal, Inc., 224 NLRB 1506, 1509 (1976), reaffirmed 232 NLRB 109 (1977).[8]

The Supreme Court commented upon the efficacy of such purpose. Though Acme Industrial arose in the context of a union's need for information to determine whether it should proceed with a grievance, the legal principles and rationale derived from that opinion are apposite herein. Thus, the Court noted (385 U.S. at 437–438):

> When the Respondent furnishes the requested information, it may appear that . . . the grievances filed are without merit. On the other hand, even if it appears that such activities have taken place, an arbitrator might uphold the contention that no breach of the agreement occurred. . . . Such conclusions would clearly not be precluded by the Board's threshold determination concerning the potential relevance of the requested information.

The Employer urges the Union was engaged in a fishing expedition. It claims there is "no real evidence to suggest [the presence] of a violation of the coutract." I conclude this argument begs the question. The very purpose of the Union's requested audit was to enable it to determine whether a contract violation was present. That purpose, in my opinion, satisfies the Court's recognition that relevancy is a threshold question for the Board's determination.

As previously quoted, the standard for such determination is satisfied by showing a "probability that the desired information was relevant, and that it would be of use to the Union in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities." 385 U.S. at 437. I conclude the existence of Chandler's side check, coupled with Maher's experience that other employers had used side checks as a means to avoid their fringe benefit obligations, comprised sufficient probability the instant Employer might be avoiding its contractual commitment.

I have already discussed, and concluded, the general ledger could have been used by the Union to promote its statutory responsibilities. Moreover, the Court strongly encouraged the use of the earliest opportunities to determine whether the Union had an actionable claim. Thus, the Court observed (385 U.S. at 438): "Arbitration can function properly only if the grievance procedures leading to it can sift out meritorious claims." I have already observed this is one of the possible results of the Employer's compliance with the request for the comprehensive audit, including the general ledger.

[7] This case is cited by both the Union and the Employer.

[8] The fact that Chandler's check was not negotiated by him does not render moot the need to audit. Maher had been apprised of the possibility other employees had been given side checks. If so, there is no evidence to suggest such checks also had not been negotiated. Thus, the only sure way to conclude the issue was by an examination of the Employer's books of original entry—specifically, its general ledger.

Upon all the foregoing, I find the General Counsel has sustained the burden of proving the comprehensive audit of the Employer's records, including the books of original entry and general ledger, are relevant and necessary to the Union's performance of its collective-bargaining obligations. Because the Employer admittedly did not furnish the general ledger, I further find that neglect violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, as alleged.

2. Arbitrability

As noted, the Employer urges the Board to defer the issues to the arbitration provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement.

The General Counsel asserts deferral is inappropriate because grievances relating to the fringe benefit funds are expressly exempt from application of the grievance and arbitration provisions of article XX of the parties' agreement.

The agreement, article XX-H, declares, "Article XX shall not apply to disputes arising between the Union and an Employer concerning Article XVIII hereof."[9]

I conclude there is no merit to the Employer's position that "the grievance procedure would settle the present dispute." Patently, the instant controversy is expressly excluded from operation of the grievance and arbitration procedure.

Moreover, the Board will not apply its deferral principles Collyer (Collyer Insulated Wire, A Gulf and Western Systems Co., 192 NLRB 837 (1971)) unless the contractual grievance and arbitration provision at least arguably encompasses the type of dispute in question. Urban N. Patman, Inc., 197 NLRB 1222 (1972). Accordingly, I agree with the General Counsel.

If my conclusion that the grievance and arbitration provisions are inapplicable to the instant issue is imprudent, there exists yet another reason to decline to defer. Thus, in my view, the Employer's suggestion to defer restricts the parties in the statute's quest for maintenance of labor-management stability. The Employer's proposal requires recourse to the intricate grievance and arbitration machinery of article XX. That procedure involves an informal hearing, a possible investigation, a formal hearing, and, finally, binding arbitration before an impartial arbitrator.

It is clear that production of the requested information may well serve to cause the Union to abandon any such recourse if it should be satisfied, from an examination of the requested records, that the Employer has fulfilled its contractual fringe benefit obligations.

The Supreme Court, in Acme Industrial, declared (385 U.S. at 438): "[I]f all claims originally initiated as grievances had to be processed to arbitration, the system would be woefully overburdened." I conclude the Employer's position would foster such a result.

In any event, as I have found the withholding of the requested records has eliminated the Union's ability to assess whether a contract breach existed, it would not be possible to utilize either the grievance and arbitration procedure or any other legal means, for no facts exist which give rise to a grievance or any other legal action based on the failure to pay the required fringe benefit contributions. The source of such facts has been obscured by the Employer's unlawful refusal to deliver the general ledger.

It is unclear just what subject matter the Employer would have subjected to the grievance and arbitration provisions. If it is the Employer's failure to have complied with the request for a comprehensive audit which should be grieved, the exclusion of article XX-H would prevent such a grievance because the audit authority is contained in article XVIII. Thus, the Employer's proposal effectively eliminates all remedial possibilities.

Upon the foregoing, I find no merit in the Employer's contentions regarding deferral.

Upon the basis of the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions, and the entire record, I make the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. L. M. Settles Construction Co., Inc., is, and at all material times has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Painters District Council No. 22, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL-CIO, is, and at all times material herein has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All of the Employer's employees covered by the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the Michigan Dry Wall Contractor Association, Inc., scheduled to terminate on May 31, 1980, constitute a unit of employees appropriate for the purpose of collective-bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. By failing to permit the Union to conduct a full comprehensive audit of its records, including its general ledger and other books of original entry, in accordance with the Union's various requests between January and May 1980, the Employer refused to bargain collectively with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of the Act.[10]

THE REMEDY

Inasmuch as I have found the Employer refused to bargain with the Union by declining to permit the full comprehensive audit, I shall order the Employer to cease and desist from engaging in such unfair labor practice and affirmatively take such actions as will dissipate the effects of its unfair labor practice.

---

[9] Art. XVIII is entitled "Painters Union Deposit and Other Trust Funds." As noted, this article, inter alia, establishes the Employer's obligation to make fringe benefit contributions and gives the Union the right to audit.

[10] I reserved ruling upon the Employer's oral motion to dismiss the complaint allegations. Based upon the aforesaid conclusions of law, the Employer's motion is hereby denied.

The Order shall require the Employer to permit the Union fund trustees, or their designees, to conduct the comprehensive audit requested between January and May 1980, and to produce for such purpose to the Union all records, including its general ledger and other books of original entry, for the Union's examination.

The Union requested the period to be covered by its audit begin on January 1, 1978, and encompass the intervening time until the date the audit is complete. In my opinion, the record does not support such an extensive undertaking. Maher testified the Employer had been audited for the first 6 months of 1979. Although the extent of that audit was not fully developed, there is evidence the Union had been satisfied of no improprieties. It was not until Chandler began working in September 1979 that the facts show the Union had any cause to question the Employer's activities. Though I am mindful of the possibility the Employer might have been derelict before Chandler began to work, the state of the record provides little, if any, evidence to justify the breadth of the Union's request. Accordingly, I shall order the Employer to submit its general ledger and other books of original entry for audit only for the period beginning with September 1, 1979, to the date of its completion.

The Union has requested a variety of remedial provisions such as a "make-whole" remedy, a requirement that the Employer pay interest upon whatever deficiencies are uncovered by the audit ordered, and enforcement of the contractually mandated liquidated damages provision.[11]

As to the request for a make-whole remedy, the Employer resists, claiming, in effect, such a remedy is inappropriate because it places the Board in the posture of having gone beyond the limits of Acme Industrial by rendering a decision on the merits of the underlying dispute. Thus, the Employer argues the Supreme Court held, in Acme Industrial, the Board appropriately considered only the threshold issue of the relevance and necessity of the information sought.

I find merit to the Employer's position. The complaint before me does not allege the Employer refused to bargain by a failure to pay the fringe benefit contributions. In each of the cases cited by the Union in support of its make-whole request, the Board had before it the specific issue that an employer refused to bargain by having failed to make the contractually required fringe benefit payments. See, e.g., H & R Contracting Corp., 255 NLRB 491 (1981), failure to pay contributions; Tolmich, Inc. d/b/a Orange County Metal Processing, 252 NLRB 1269 (1980), discontinuance of health and welfare payments; Memley Plating Company, 252 NLRB 1264 (1980), failure to transmit dues; Allen Materials, Inc., Debtor-In-Possession, 252 NLRB 1116 (1980), termination of health and welfare contributions; Ace Masonry, Inc., 252 NLRB 287 (1980), unilateral discontinuance of fringe benefit payments; William Minter Masonry Contractor, Inc., 252 NLRB 130 (1980), discontinuance of trust fund payments; and V. Pangori & Sons, Inc. and David Cuvrell, Receiver in Bankruptcy, 248 NLRB 405 (1980), discontinuance of fringe benefit payments.

Thus, I find each of the above-cited cases contain material distinctions from the case at bar. The instant complaint and litigation before me does not go so far as those cases. I have been required to resolve only the Union's right to information. This involves consideration only of the threshold issues to which the Supreme Court alluded in Acme Industrial. I have done so. To do more would not only wreak an injustice upon the Employer, but would effectively conclude an issue which clearly was not, and had not been contemplated to be, litigated. Accordingly, the Union's make-whole request is denied.

With respect to the request for liquidated damages, there is a collective- bargaining provision covering that subject. Thus, article XVIII, section IV, provides "that the damages which will result from the failure of an Employer to pay his fringe benefit contributions on time, or in the correct amount, are difficult to calculate with any certainty and, therefore, any Employer who fails to make payments to the funds, in accordance with this Agreement, shall pay as liquidated damages, in addition to the contribution due: Delinquency for 1-15 days—5 percent of monthly contribution; Delinquency for 15-30 days—10 percent of monthly contribution; Delinquency for 30-45 days--20 percent of monthly contribution."

The Employer does not address this specific issue.

In Finger Lakes Plumbing & Heating Co., Inc., 254 NLRB 1399 (1981), the Board reaffirmed its Order (253 NLRB 406 (1980)) based on the charging party's exceptions to an administrative law judge's omission to order payment of contractually mandated liquidated damages for failure to pay fringe benefit fund contributions. Thus, the Board ordered such was an appropriate remedy.

Finger Lakes contains the same distinction noted above in the cases dealing with a make-whole remedy. The Board's liquidated damage order was predicated upon the Board's finding of an unfair labor practice in the Employer's unlawful discontinuance of fringe benefit payments. In the absence of such a finding in the case at bar, I deny the request for payment of the contractual liquidated damages.

Regarding the request for a provision for the Employer to pay interest upon moneys the Employer may owe the fringe benefit funds, it is hereby denied for two reasons. First, all the cases which my research has uncovered in which interest was even considered by the Board were based on a finding by the Board that such moneys actually were due, which finding, in turn, was based on a complaint of the General Counsel alleging that the failure to make such payments constituted an unfair labor practice. As noted above, the instant complaint contains no such allegation. Second, the Union's request is, in any event, premature. Thus, in Allen Materials, Inc., supra, the Board commented, in footnote 2, that it "does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of the proceeding for addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments." The Board left the matter to the compliance stage. See also Merryweather Optical Company, 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).

[11] The General Counsel did not address the scope of the remedy.

Finally, the Order shall require the Employer to refrain from in any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

Upon the above findings of fact, conclusions of law, the entire record in the case, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[12]

The Respondent, L. M. Settles Construction Co., Inc., Livonia, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to furnish Painters District Council No. 22, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL-CIO, or its agents, for an audit, its books and record of original entry, including its general ledger, for the period September 1, 1979, to the date of completion of the audit.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the free exercise of their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Furnish to Painters District Council No. 22, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL-CIO, or its agents, for inspection and examination, all records necessary, including its general ledger and other books and records of original entry, for said labor organization to make a comprehensive audit under article XVIII of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement.

(b) Post at its Livonia, Michigan, location, and at any other central location to which the Employer's employees in the bargaining unit found appropriate herein regularly report, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[13] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 7, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

Accordingly, we give you these assurances:

WE WILL NOT refuse to furnish Painters District Council No. 22, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL-CIO, or its agents, our general ledger and other records and books of original entry, for auditing purposes, from September 1, 1979, to the date said labor organization conducts a comprehensive audit which began on May 9, 1980.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce any of you in the free exercise of the rights set forth at the top of this notice.

L. M. SETTLES CONSTRUCTION CO., INC.

[12] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[13] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 292, AFL-CIO and Frantz Klodt & Son, Inc. and Honeywell, Inc. and International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local 1145. Case 18-CD-268

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS FANNING AND ZIMMERMAN

This is a proceeding under Section 10(k) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, following a charge filed by Frantz Klodt & Son, Inc., alleging that International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 292, AFL-CIO, herein called Local 292, had violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act by engaging in certain proscribed activity with an object of forcing or requiring Honeywell, Inc., herein called the Employer, to assign certain work to its members rather than to employees represented by International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local 1145, herein called Local 1145.

Pursuant to notice, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer David M. Biggar on September 10, 1981. All parties except Local 292 appeared and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to adduce evidence bearing on the issues.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the Hearing Officer's rulings made at the hearings and finds that they are free from prejudicial error. They are hereby affirmed.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following findings:

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER

The parties stipulated, and we find, that the Employer, a Delaware corporation with its principal place of business in Minneapolis, Minnesota, is engaged in the manufacture of temperature control systems, computers, and military defense systems. During the calendar year ending December 31, 1980, the Employer purchased and received at its facilities within the State of Minnesota products, goods, and materials from outside the State having a value in excess of $50,000. The parties also stipulated, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

The parties stipulated, and we find, that Local 292 and Local 1145 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of the Dispute

Honeywell has leased office space from Frantz Klodt & Son, Inc., in the Park Place office complex in St. Louis Park, Minnesota, and has performed construction-related improvements in its office space. It has assigned the installation of wire molding and related electrical work on these premises to its employees represented by Local 1145.

The record shows that in the last week of July and on August 3, 1981, John Wagner, business representative for Local 292, contacted James Becker, the maintenance supervisor for Honeywell, at the Park Place project. Wagner claimed that the work in dispute belonged to members of Local 292 rather than to Honeywell's employees represented by Local 1145, and indicated to Becker that Local 292 would banner the project. Becker advised Wagner that the work in dispute on such projects had normally been performed in the past by employees of Honeywell represented by Local 1145, and that this assignment would not be changed. Wagner then contacted Jon Blackstone, Honeywell's manager of labor relations for its Minneapolis operations, to claim that this work belonged to members of Local 292. Blackstone suggested that perhaps there was some compromise that could be reached that would allow work on the project to continue. Wagner indicated that he did not want to be involved in a dispute with Honeywell and would listen to alternative proposals. This conversation occurred on or about August 5, 1981. However, on August 6, 1981, before any alternative proposals were discussed, Local 292 placed a banner on the project. It is unclear as to the language on the picket sign but the testimony indicated that the effect of the picketing was that employees represented by Local 292 and employed by Minnetonka Electric Company, an electrical subcontractor of Frantz Klodt & Son, Inc., at Park Place, walked off the job. They did not return until the electricians represented by Local 1145 were removed from the project by Honeywell.

B. The Work in Dispute

The work in dispute involves the installation of wire molding, nonpermanent wiring, and related electrical work on modern wall partitioning located on floors leased to Honeywell, Inc., at the Park Place office project located at 5775 Wayzata Boulevard, St. Louis Park, Minnesota.

C. The Contentions of the Parties

The Employer and Frantz Klodt & Son, Inc., contend that the work should be assigned to Honeywell's employees represented by Local 1145, relying on Honeywell's collective-bargaining agreement with Local 1145, economy and efficiency of operations, nd employer assignment and preference.

Local 1145 asserts that the Employer's assignment of the work should be upheld as it falls within the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement with Honeywell.

Local 292 did not appear at the hearing. However, it informed the Board's Region 18 that its picketing of the Park Place project was to advertise to the public that electrical work was being performed on the project by employees who are not paid according to the standards and working conditions established in the area by Local 292.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed upon a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

The parties stipulated that there is no agreed-upon method of resolving the work assignment in dispute at the Park Place project which would bind all of the parties involved.

The record shows that in the last week of July and the first week of August 1981 Local 292 demanded that Honeywell assign the disputed work to its members rather than to Honeywell's own employees represented by Local 1145, and threatened to picket the Park Place project if Honeywell did not accede to its demands. The record further shows that on August 6 Local 292 did in fact banner the building and picket the project causing a walkout by a subcontractor's employees represented by Local 292.

On the basis of the entire record, we conclude that there is reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed-upon method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that this dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) of the Act requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after giving due consideration to various factors.[1] The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on commonsense and experience reached by balancing those factors involved in a particular case.[2]

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of the dispute before us:

1. Collective-bargaining agreements

Local 1145's collective-bargaining agreement with Honeywell covers the electricians who are performing the work in dispute as part of a production and maintenance unit. However, it does not specifically apply to the assignment of the work in dispute. Local 292 does not have a collective-bargaining agreement or a relationship with Honeywell. We find that this factor favors neither Union.

2. Company practice

It has been the Employer's practice for over 20 years to assign work similar to that in dispute to its own employees represented by Local 1145. This past practice favors an award of the work to Honeywell's employees represented by Local 1145.

3. Economy and efficiency of operations

The Honeywell electricians perform work for the Employer other than that which is in dispute. As a result, the Employer is able to perform both the disputed work and other tasks with one work force. Therefore, economy and efficiency of operations favor an award to Honeywell's employees represented by Local 1145.

4. Employer preference and assignment

The Employer has expressed its preference that the disputed work be performed by its employees presently doing the work. We find that the Employer's assignment and preference favor an award of the disputed work to its employees represented by Local 1145.

Conclusions

Upon the record as a whole, and after full consideration of all relevant factors involved, we conclude that Honeywell's employees who are represented by International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local 1145, are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the factors of company practice, economy and efficiency of operations, and employer preference and assignment.

In making this determination, we are awarding the work in question to Honeywell's employees who are represented by Local 1145, but not to that Union or its members. The present determination is limited to the particular controversy which gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

Pursuant to Section 10(k) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and upon the basis of the foregoing findings and the entire record in this proceeding, the National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute:

1. Employees of Honeywell, Inc., who are represented by International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local 1145, are entitled to perform the installation of wire molding, nonpermanent wiring, and related electrical work at the premises leased by Honeywell in the Park Place office project located at 5775 Wayzata Boulevard, St. Louis Park, Minnesota.

2. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 292, AFL-CIO, is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force or require Honeywell, Inc., to assign the disputed work to employees represented by that labor organization.

3. Within 10 days from the date of this Decision and Determination of Dispute, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 292, AFL-CIO, shall notify the Regional Director for Region 18, in writing, whether or not it will refrain from forcing or requiring the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act, to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with the above determination.

Honda of America Mfg., Inc. and International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW). Case 8-CA-15050

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on July 27, 1981, by International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), herein called the Union, and duly served on Honda of America Mfg., Inc., herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 8, issued a complaint on August 17, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and the complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that on July 19, 1981, following a Board election in Cases 8-RC-12320 and 8-RC-12482, the Union was duly certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate;[1] and that, commencing on or about July 17, 1981, and at all times thereafter, Respondent has refused, and continues to date to refuse, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative. On August 26, 1981, Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint.

On September 10, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on September 16, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

In its answer to the complaint and response to the Notice To Show Cause, Respondent asserts that the Union's certification was improperly issued in Cases 8-RC-12320 and 8-RC-12482 because the unit of boiler operators found appropriate by the Regional Director is inappropriate for bargaining. Respondent contends that the only appropriate unit would consist of all production and maintenance employees at its facility, including the boiler operators. Respondent admits that it has refused, and continues to refuse, to bargain with the Union, but alleges that it has no legal obligation to do so.

The General Counsel asserts that Respondent's answer raises no contentions other than those fully considered and rejected by he Board in the underlying representation proceeding and, since all other factual allegations of the complaint stand admitted in Respondent's answer, that there are no matters in issue requiring a hearing before an administrative law judge.

Our review of the record herein, including the record in Cases 8-RC-12320 and 8-RC-12482, discloses that the Union filed a petition for an election on April 27, 1981.[2] After a hearing, the Regional Director, on June 12, 1981, issued a Decision and Direction of Election in which he ordered that an election be held among the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All boiler operators employed by the Employer at its Marysville, Ohio, facility, excluding all office clerical employees and professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

Respondent filed with the Board a request for review, dated June 24, 1981, of the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election. The Board denied Respondent's request for review on July 8, 1981.

An election by secret ballot was conducted on July 10, 1981, in which four votes were cast for, and no votes were cast against, the Union. There were no challenged ballots. On July 20, 1981, the Acting Regional Director certified the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of the employees in the aforementioned unit.

In a letter to the Union dated July 17, 1981, Respondent stated that although it had not yet received the Certification of Representative from the Regional Director it would not consider such certification valid upon its issuance, and therefore Respondent would decline to bargain with the Union for the unit of boiler operators. Respondent has refused at all times since July 17, 1981, to bargain with the Union.[3]

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[4]

All issues raised by Respondent in this proceeding were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, and Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege that any special circumstances exist herein which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding.[5] We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent is and has been at all times material herein an Ohio corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of motorcycles at its facility located in Marysville, Ohio. Respondent annually ships goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from its Marysville facility to points located outside the State of Ohio.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All boiler operators employed by the Employer at its Marysville, Ohio, facility, excluding all office clerical employees and professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

2. The certification

On July 10, 1981, a majority of the employees of Respondent in said unit, in a secret-ballot election conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 8, designated the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent.

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit on July 20, 1981, and the Union continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. Respondent's Refusal To Bargain

Commencing on or about July 17, 1981, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in said unit.

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since July 17, 1981, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

[3] In view of Respondent's anticipatory repudiation of its bargaining obligation, we find immaterial the absence of an allegation in the complaint that the Union made a formal request that Respondent meet with it for purposes of collective bargaining.

[4] See Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. N.L.R.B., 313 U.S. 146, 162 (1941); Rules and Regulations of the Board, Secs. 102.67(f) and 102.69(c).

[5] We find no merit in Respondent's contention that its averred application of the "Japanese approach to labor relations" at its facility constitutes special circumstances warranting further consideration by the Board.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Honda of America Mfg., Inc., set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of certification as beginning on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Company, Inc., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Commerce Company d/b/a Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817; Burnett Construction Company, 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Honda of America Mfg., Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All boiler operators employed by Respondent at its Marysville, Ohio, facility, excluding all office clerical employees and professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since July 20, 1981, the above-named labor organization has been and now is the certified and exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing on or about July 17, 1981, and at all times thereafter, to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees of Respondent in the appropriate unit, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Honda of America Mfg., Inc., Marysville, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All boiler operators employed by Respondent at its Marysville, Ohio, facility, excluding all office clerical employees and professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at its Marysville, Ohio, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 8, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 8, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain with the above-named Union, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All boiler operators employed by us at our Marysville, Ohio, facility, excluding all office clerical employees and professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, ZIMMERMAN, AND HUNTER

On September 18, 1981, the Board issued a Decision and Order[1] in this proceeding dismissing the 8(a)(1) and (5) complaint in its entirety.[2] On October 19, 1981, Fred Tenderella,[3] one of the employees whom Respondent refused to discharge, as requested by the Union, filed a request for "attorney's fees and other costs" under the Equal Access to Justice Act.[4]

We find no merit in Tenderella's contention that he is entitled to an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act.

As noted above, the Board's Decision and Order in this matter issued September 18, 1981; since the Equal Access to Justice Act did not become effective until October 1, 1981, Tenderellas request for an award is untimely.[5] Further, the question of timeliness aside, Section 102.143 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, which deals with, inter alia, entitlement and eligibility, limits awards to "a respondent in an adversary adjudication who prevails in that proceeding." (Emphasis supplied.) Tenderella was not the respondent in this proceeding; indeed, Tenderella was not even a "party" in this matter. Accordingly, Tenderella is not entitled to an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act.

ORDER

It is hereby ordered that Fred Tenderella's request for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act be, and it hereby is, denied.

[2] The complaint alleged violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act based on Respondent's refusal to comply with the union-security provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union.

[3] At the hearing in this matter, Tenderella moved to intervene. Tenderella's motion to intervene was denied by the Administrative Law Judge. The Board affirmed the denial of Tenderella's motion to intervene, but considered Tenderella's "appeal" to the Administrative Law Judge's Decision as an amicus curiae brief.

[5] See G. W. Hunt d/b/a Foremost Foods Distributing, 258 NLRB No. 158 (1981). We find no merit in Tenderella's contention that his request is timely because the Board's Order is not "final" until after the time has passed for filing a motion for reconsideration. Under Sec. 102.48(d)(2) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, any party may move for reconsideration of the Board's decision and order within 20 days of issuance. However, Sec. 102.48(d)(3) provides that filing of a motion for reconsideration "shall not operate to stay the effectiveness" of the Board's action. See also Sec. 102.148(c), which provides that the filing of a motion for reconsideration does not stay the time for filing an application for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On March 27, 1981, Administrative Law Judge George Norman issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith.

We agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by telling two employees on separate occasions that they would receive wage increases if the Union were decertified. Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, however, we conclude that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) when, during collective-bargaining negotiations with the Union, (1) it discontinued merit increases for unit employees, and (2) it did not grant them the same increases in their automobile mileage allowance that it granted to employees in its advertising department.[3]

On June 1, 1979, the Union filed a petition to represent Respondent's newsroom employees. On the same date, it sent Respondent a letter stating in pertinent part that any attempt by Respondent "to change the status quo with regard to past practices of wages, hours and working conditions during the period of our organizing efforts and subsequent contract negotiations is in violation of Section 7 and 8 of the National Labor Relations Act. . . ." Respondent replied, in a letter dated June 7, 1979, that its understanding of the Union's statement was as follows:

> No further wage, benefits or working condition changes can be made in the newsroom while you are trying to convince newsroom employees to join the Typographical Union unless these changes were announced prior to receipt of your letter.
> However, if, after learning all the facts, they decide to be represented by your Union, I believe you are also correct in stating that wages, benefits and working conditions cannot be changed until an agreement is reached.

The election was held on August 8, 1979, and the Union was subsequently certified as the exclusive representative of the newsroom employees. Negotiations for a collective-bargaining contract began August 1979 and continued until September 1980, culminating in tentative agreement, which had not been ratified as of the date of the hearing, October 27, 1980. Merit increases, which were not retroactive, were granted to newsroom employees in September 1980 pursuant to this agreement.

During negotiations, on November 15, 1979, the Union sent Respondent a letter saying it had no objections to Respondent's effecting "scheduled pay increases" in the bargaining unit. Respondent replied in a subsequent letter that it did not know what the Union meant by such term, inasmuch as salaries and other terms and conditions of employment were then being negotiated. The Union responded on December 19 that its position was based upon "past practice," and it listed 16 employees who it believed were entitled to pay increases. Finally, on January 9, 1980, Respondent sent a letter telling the Union that salary increases for unit employees had been given on a "discretionary basis" and, like all other discretionary terms of employment, were subject to negotiation. This letter further stated that increases for probationary employees, since they were given automatically, were an exception.[4]

The Administrative Law Judge found that Respondent had a longstanding policy of regularly evaluating the performance of newsroom employees and granting them annual wage increases. He relied on the testimony of witnesses as to what they were told when hired and upon payroll records showing the dates and amounts of increases received by each employee, and he concluded that Respondent's discontinuance of this practice was

[2] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[3] Respondent reimbursed employees who used their own automobiles in connection with their work on a per-mile basis.

discriminatory. Prior to the appointment of Al Greene as managing editor in mid-1978, Respondent apparently had a fairly regular practice of granting merit increases to employees in January and June or July of the year. Greene, however, modified this practice.[5] According to employee John Maines, Greene told him when he was hired that he would receive a raise at the end of a 6-month probationary period and would be considered for a raise annually thereafter. However, Carol Eisenberg testified that Greene told her she would be reviewed 6 months after receiving her probationary raise. The testimony of these witnesses is thus conflicting and does not, in itself, clearly establish a policy of regular merit increases.[6]

The practice under Greene has been even less regular and definite than these statements would indicate. In 1978, including the 5-month period before Greene became managing editor, of 13 employees who ostensibly would be entitled to nonprobationary raises, 10 received 1 increase and 3 received no increases. In 1979, of 18 employees ostensibly eligible for nonprobationary raises, 2 employees received 2 increases, 9 received 1 increase, and 7 employees got no increase.[7] While most of these increases in 1978 and 1979 were given in June, in both years a significant proportion of them was granted randomly in other months. The amounts of wage increases also did not follow any discernible pattern. Based on a weekly salary, increases ranged from $10 to $20 and were apparently unrelated to increases received either at the time by comparably paid employees or in the past by the particular employee.

Both before and during Greene's tenure, Respondent did not conduct any formal or written evaluations of newsroom employees. It did not systematically review the performance of newsroom employees and grant raises to those who met a minimum standard, nor did it rate them according to any criteria. Rather, as Greene expressed it, when an employee "sparkled," he or she got a merit raise. Employees who were chosen for merit increases were so informed in brief, oral reviews or received the increases in their paychecks without any discussion. Employees who did not receive increases were excluded not because they had failed a review with objectve, articulable standards or, indeed, because they had failed any review whatsoever; they simply had not achieved the entirely subjective standards of Greene or his predecessor. The arbitrary manner in which Respondent dispensed merit increases is further shown by a memorandum to Greene written by newsroom employees, just before the petition was filed, expressing their frustration at the lack of regular merit increases.

The circumstances herein are considerably different from those in General Motors Acceptance Corporation, 196 NLRB 137 (1972), enfd. 476 F.2d 850 (1st Cir. 1973), and other cases where the Board has found a violation in an employer's unilateral discontinuance of a merit increase program.[8] In General Motors Acceptance Corporation, the employer instituted a wage freeze of its own accord when the union filed the petition therein, but it continued giving employees semiannual merit reviews, in May and November. Prior to the wage freeze, employees who were rated "fair" or higher in the merit reviews received raises, which were effected at different times during the year. In the 9 months of the calendar year before the freeze, nearly all of the eligible employees had received merit increases in approximately the same amount.

Whereas the employer in General Motors Acceptance Corporation exercised discretion only with respect to certain aspects of its merit increase program, Respondent's granting of increases has been entirely discretionary. The timing and the amounts of raises, and the selection of employees to receive them, have not been determined in any objective or consistent manner. Respondent did not regularly evaluate employees irrespective of whether they were to receive increases and thus did not continue periodically to review employees after the filing of the petition without granting them increases. Thus, it is impossible to conclude with any degree of certainty when, and if, merit increases would have been given and which employees would have received them. See The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company, Inc., 192 NLRB 645 (1971). Requiring Respondent during negotiations to continue giving raises to employees selected by it, at times and in amounts unrestricted by a clearly established pattern, is tantamount to licensing it to grant them unilateral wage increases, contrary to N.L.R.B. v. Benne Katz, etc. d/b/a Williamsburg Steel Products, Co., 369 U.S. 736 (1962). In sum, the evidence fails to establish that Respondent had a merit increase program that it was bound to continue during negotiations.

[5] Respondent did not, at all material times herein, provide any other type of wage increases, such as cost-of-living raises.

[6] When advised by the Administrative Law Judge that her evidence on this point was becoming cumulative, counsel for the General Counsel made an offer of proof as to the testimony of other witnesses concerning statements to them when they were hired. Assuming that the General Counsel's representation of their testimony is correct, however, we note that their testimony would show the same disperity between being reviewed at 6-month or at 1-year intervals.

[7] Prior to the merit increases given in September 1980 pursuant to the parties' tentative agreement, the last such increases were given in June 1979. The decision to grant these increases was made before the petition was filed on June 1, 1979.

Furthermore, because Respondent's discontinuance of merit increases was alleged and litigated as discriminatory conduct in violation of Section 8(a)(3), rather than as a unilateral change in violation of Section 8(a)(5), the General Counsel also had to show that Respondent was motivated by animus toward employees' selection of the Union. The Administrative Law Judge found that such unlawful motivation was evidenced by (1) the aforementioned two statements violating Section 8(a)(1), made by Greene in the spring of 1980, promising employees wage increases if they decertified the Union; and (2) evidence that some employees hired during the period when merit raises were not being given, after receiving their probationary increases, were paid more than senior employees. Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge's implication in footnote 9 of his Decision, the record does not show that all new hires, after receiving their probationary increases, were paid more than all senior employees. Moreover, there is no evidence whether the few senior employees who were paid less than some of the new hires had comparable skills, experience, and duties. Thus, the mere fact that some new employees received more pay than some senior employees is inconclusive to establish antiunion motivation. The two statements found to violate Section 8(a)(1) are insufficient to show such animus in light of Respondent's position, manifested in the exchange of correspondence initiated by the Union, that it was precluded by law from granting merit increases because of its collective-bargaining obligations.

Therefore, we conclude that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discontinuing merit increases for newsroom employees during negotiations with the Union.

We also disagree with the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1), while it was engaged in collective bargaining, by not granting newsroom employees the same increases in their mileage allowance for use of their personal automobiles that it granted to employees in its advertising department. The only evidence that Respondent had such a practice was a memorandum from Respondent's publisher dated May 30, 1979, stating that the circulation department would receive a certain rate and "[a]ll other departments will go from 13-1/2 cents per mile to 14-1/2 cents per mile." Testimony established that "all other departments" referred to the newsroom and the advertising department. The record does not reveal the practice, if any, before this date. The advertising department subsequently received two more increases, which were not given to the newsroom: From 14-1/2 cents to 15-1/2 cents per mile on an unspecified date, and from 15-1/2 cents to 16-1/2 cents per mile on January 22, 1980. In February 1980, a newsroom employee asked Respondent's publisher why the newsroom had not received the increase that was recently granted to the advertising department; the publisher replied that the mileage allowance was a subject of collective-bargaining negotiations and could not be changed then. Apparently pursuant to the tentative agreement between Respondent and the Union, the rate for newsroom employees was increased to 16-1/2 cents per mile shortly before the hearing.

Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, we do not think one ambiguous memorandum proves that Respondent had an "established past practice" of granting the newsroom the same mileage allowance it granted to the advertising department. See United Technologies Corporation (formerly United Aircraft Corporation), 226 NLRB 750 (1976). Even if this document were sufficient to show such a practice, the evidence fails to prove that Respondent's motivation in discontinuing it was discriminatory. The above statement by Respondent's publisher does not indicate animus toward the employees' selection of the Union, and the two statements by Greene found to violate Section 8(a)(1) bear upon the unrelated issue of merit increases. Accordingly, we shall also dismiss this allegation of the complaint.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, The Ithaca Journal-News, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Ithaca Typographical Union No. 379 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By promising employees Judith Horstman and Carol Eisenberg that they would receive wage increases if the Union were decertified, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

5. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discontinuing merit increases for newsroom employees while it was engaged in collective-bargaining negotiations with the Union.

6. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by not granting newsroom employees the same increases in their mileage allowance that it granted to employees of its advertising department while it engaged in collective-bargaining negotiations with the Union.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, The Ithaca Journal-News, Inc., Ithaca, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Promising employees that they would receive wage increases if the Union were decertified.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Post at its office and place of business located in Ithaca, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 3, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director for Region 3, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found herein.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT promise our employees that they will receive wage increases if the Union is decertified.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

THE ITHACA JOURNAL-NEWS, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GEORGE NORMAN, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard in Ithaca, New York, on October 27 and 28, 1980. The charge was filed by Ithaca Typographical Union No. 379 (herein the Union) on March 28, 1980. A complaint based on that charge issued on May 7, 1980, alleging that The Ithaca Journal-News, Inc. (herein Respondent), violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

Issues

The primary issues are:

1. Whether Respondent denied merit increases and refused to raise the mileage allowance for newsroom employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

2. Whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by promising emoloyees pay raises if they decertified the Union.

3. Whether Respondent's conduct comes within the 6-month limitation rule contained in Section 10(b) of the Act.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondent. The briefs have been carefully considered.

Upon the entire record of the case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, The Ithaca Journal-News, Inc., is a newspaper of general circulation published daily in Ithaca, New York. Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchases, transfers, and delivers to its Ithaca, New York, plant goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, which are transported to said location directly from States of the United States other than the State of New York. During the past 12 months Respondent has received gross revenues in excess of $200,000, has subscribed to two interstate news services, and has published advertisements for nationally marketed products.

I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Ithaca Typographical Union No. 379 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

On June 1, 1979, the Union filed a petition to represent newsroom employees of Respondent. The election was held on August 8. 1979, and the Union was subsequently certified. Negotiations for a collective-bargaining contract began in August 1979 and continued until September 1980, when a tentative agreement was reached between the bargaining committee of the Union and the bargaining committee of Respondent.[1]

On June 7, 1979, Respondent instituted a policy of not granting any wage increases (with the exception of probationary increases for new emoloyees). That practice continued until the pay and benefit increases had been made pursuant to the signing of a tentative agreement in September 1980, referred to above.

The following letter dated November 15, 1979, was sent by Donald C. Ball, secretary of the Union, to Peter Hickey, publisher of Respondent:

> This letter is to inform you that International Typographical Union No. 379 has no objections to the Ithaca Journal putting into effect scheduled pay increases in the newsroom. It is to be understood that any increases put into effect will not prejudice our contract negotiations in the newsroom.
> Because of rate of inflation and also due to the fact that some bargaining unit employees are overdue on their raises, we would hope that you comply with this request.

B. Respondent's Past Practice

Respondent contends that its past practice was as follows:

When Al Greene[2] took over from his predecessor he did not become aware of any written or verbal policy concerning pay increases. He established a policy of granting an increase if the individual successfully completed a 6-month probation period after hire and, after the employee passed that threshold, the policy was to give employees discretionary increases based on their performance. Respondent also contends that Greene had no particular system for giving raises; that if the reporter felt he was doing a good job he would ask for a raise or if Greene felt the reporter was doing a good job he would initiate a request for a raise for that employee. Employee requests were not always granted.

The General Counsel, on the other hand, contends that, prior to June 1979, Respondent had a clearly established past practice of granting periodic merit increases for newsroom employees. The pattern appears to have varied from time to time but generally those increases were granted on yearly bases or at 6-month intervals.

Four newsroom employees testified, Judith Horstman, John Maines, Carol Eisenberg, and Jane Marcham, concerning what they were told at the time they were initially hired and with respect to their actual history of increases while employed by Respondent. Their testimony reveals that there was indeed a pattern, albeit a varied one. The payroll records in evidence reveal that, after the 6-month probationary increase, employees received pay raises practically every year. In some cases employees received two pay raises in 1 year followed by no pay raises the following year and then a resumption of pay raises on a fairly scheduled annual basis, although many of the increases did not fall exactly on anniversary dates.

Employee Eisenberg testified that, when she was employed by Greene in mid-June 1979, Greene told her she would be on probation for 6 months and if she did an acceptable job during that time she would get a raise at the end of that period, would be reviewed 6 months thereafter, and would receive subsequent raises if she continued doing a competent job. Eisenberg said she received increases 6 months and 12 months after she was initially hired. Six months after her second increase (December 1979 or January 1980) she asked Greene for a raise inasmuch as she thought she was doing a good job. Greene responded that he thought she was doing a good job and would like to give her a raise but could not "because the labor negotiations are under way."[3] She said that, after that, Greene gave her the same answer when she asked for a raise on other occasions.

Maines testified that, when he was hired by Greene in February 1979, Greene told him he could expect a raise at the end of the 6-month probationary period and, if he made it through the period, he would be considered for a raise at the end of his first year and every year after that. Maines said he received an increase in June 1979, which Greene told him was based on merit but that when he asked Greene about a raise after he had worked for a year (February 8, 1980) Greene told him he had done good work; that Greene was not unhappy at all with his work; that he would love to give him a raise; but he could not because his hands were tied by the union matter.[4]

Employee Judith Horstman testified that she asked for a raise near the end of 1979, and Greene responded that while contract negotiations were in progress he could not grant an increase because his hands were tied. It was during this time that the Union stated it would not have any objection if Respondent granted wage increases on behalf of bargaining unit members as it had done in the past.

C. The Alleged Promise of Pay Raises if the Employees Would Decertify the Union

Judith Horstman further testified that, in late February or early March 1980, she again asked Greene for a raise.

[1] As of the date of the hearing in this case, the agreement had not yet been ratified and signed. Pay and benefit increases pursuant to that tentative agreement, however, had been effected.

[2] The name "Al Greene" is spelled "Al Green" in Respondent's brief. But the record establishes that the correct spelling is Al Greene.

[3] Referring to the collective-bargaining negotiations that were under way at the time.

[4] Greene did not deny the substance of these conversations with Eisenberg and Maines.

Horstman said that Greene responded stating that she deserved a raise but his hands were tied while they were negotiating. Horstman further testified that, when she again asked for a raise, Greene said, "[I]f you want a raise decertify the Union and then you'll get your raise."[5]

Eisenberg further testified that Greene took her out to lunch sometime in early April 1980. She told him that staff members were unhappy about not getting increases and that Greene replied that he was aware of it and that he was sorry about it, but that there was nothing he could do. According to Eisenberg, Greene further stated that he had warned all of them before they voted that once a union came in it would not be Al Greene negotiating with Carol Eisenberg, but the Ithaca Typographical Union representative talking to a Gannett representative from Rochester. Greene then said, "Don't you realize money is in the budget if you decertify." Eisenberg testified further that Greene told her she should find out what it meant to come to impasse.

Greene testified concerning the conversations with Horstman and Eisenberg on the topic of decertification. Greene's memory was bad with regard to the conversation with Horstman, testifying that he did not recall who initiated the conversation and that he could not remember any specific conversation. He also said he could not recall how the topic of decertification came up. He said he had a standard answer when people started talking about decertification and he recited that standard answer. He said his standard answer was, "It was up to the newsroom." Greene testified that he did recall a conversation with Eisenberg in which she said it was clear, from the Company's attitude, that they wanted the newsroom to decertify. He told her that it was up to the newsroom and said that there was no other discussion.

Greene said he remembered the conversation with Eisenberg in which they talked about the Union and what was happening in the Union and about raises for the people. He said Eisenberg wanted to know if there were room in the budget for raises and he said there was. Greene admitted stating, "I said my hands were tied and I couldn't do anything." Greene further testified that Eisenberg then said it was clear the Company wanted the newsroom to decertify but Greene denied saying that if they would decertify that they would be able to get their raises.[6]

D. Mileage Reimbursement

The employees of Respondent who use their own automobiles in connection with their work were reimbursed a mileage rate which was increased on occasion. Such increases were published by Respondent by placing a notice on the employee bulletin board.

Employee John Huenneke testified that in February 1980, upon learning that the advertising department had been given an increase in the mileage rate, but not the newsroom employees, he told Terry Hopkins, publisher, that the newsroom employees were being treated discriminatorily. Hopkins responded that the Company did not want to break the law; that the Company and the Union were involved in contract negotiations; that she felt mileage reimbursement was a subject for bargaining; and that the Company could not change the rate for the newsroom employees at that time.[7] Huenneke's testimony was not controverted. I credit it.

E. Discussion and Conclusions

That Respondent's decision to freeze wages of the newsroom employees was made prior to the 10(b) period is not in issue. The fact that Respondent refused to grant merit increases to the newsroom employees from that date (except increases granted in September 1980 pursuant to the tentative agreement) because of union negotiations is not in issue. That the Union in November 1979 notified Respondent that it had no objection to its granting pay increases to employees in the unit according to past practice is also not in issue.

Contrary to the contention of Respondent, the record substantiates a past practice of granting increases to employees in the newsroom annually, although not necessarily on anniversary dates (the testimony of the witnesses and the payroll sheets received in evidence). Accordingly, I do not agree with Respondent that it was in a "damned if you do, damned if you don't" situation with respect to granting merit increases during negotiations.[8] As in General Motors Acceptance Corporation, 196 NLRB 137 (1972), enfd. 476 F.2d 850 (1st Cir. 1973), Respondent had a longstanding policy of evaluating employee performance and rewarding such performance with wage increases. Such a practice was an existing form of compensation, and a term and condition of employment regularly expected by the employees. And even though an element of discretion predicated upon prior merit review was exercised by Respondent with respect to the unit employees after Al Greene became in charge, it did not make it any less a past policy of Respondent. Accordingly, Respondent could have continued its past policy, especially in view of the acquiescence of the Union, and not have violated the law. Instead, because of the negotiations with the Union, Respondent suspended merit increases which it would otherwise have given to its employees.[9]

[5] Horstman stated that she did not bring up the decertification and that Greene did.

[6] With respect to the testimony of the conversations between Greene and the employees discussed above, I credit the employees' version and not Greene's. As stated above, Greene's memory was poor on specifics. He spoke hesitantly and, on occasion, upon further questioning he either revealed more or gave a different version. Each employee testified in a clear and convincing manner, unhesitantly and consistently. Moreover, Greene testified that he had no regular system to evaluate employees, but rather, when somebody's work was really "sparkling," he decided to give him or her an increase. In the latter regard, Greene's testimony is contradicted both by the payroll sheets of newer employees and the testimony of Maines and Eisenberg concerning statements made by Greene at the time they were hired. Greene said that 5 out of the 27 employees "sparkled" in June 1979, and therefore received merit increases. The payroll sheets reveal that nine employees must have "sparkled" inasmuch as nine employees were granted increases in early June 1979.

[7] The mileage rate for advertising and newsroom departments was increased from 13-1/2 cents to 14-1/2 cents per mile on May 30, 1979. On January 22, 1980, the mileage rate for the advertising department was increased from 15-1/2 cents per mile to 16-1/2 cents. Thus, the advertising department received two mileage rate increases after May 30, 1979, which were not received by the newsroom department.

[8] The Union's request in November that Respondent grant those increases should have relieved Respondent's doubts of legality.

In this case Respondent's conduct included a statement by Managing Editor Greene to at least two employees which, at best, inferred that the employees would receive increases if they decertified the Union inasmuch as there was money for such increase in the budget. By its conduct, Respondent, in effect, placed full responsibility on the Union for the employees' failure to receive their merit increases. The message conveyed to the employees was clear—to obtain their scheduled merit increases they first had to abandon the Union. General Motors Acceptance Corporation, supra.

I consider Respondent's conduct as being equivalent to Respondent's conduct in General Motors Acceptance Corporation, supra, wherein the Board stated, "The evil of the Respondent's actions was further compounded by the Respondent's coercive poll by which it sought to present evidence of employee dissatisfaction with the Union."

I conclude that Respondent's attempts to decertify the Union, by withholding merit increases and stating that they would receive them if they decertified, interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the free exercise of their Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

I find, further, Respondent discriminatorily discontinued the practice of periodic merit increases and denied employees increases during the 10(b) period,[10] which increases would have been granted to these employees absent the Union, because the newsroom employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, thereby discouraging union membership by placing the blame for the discontinued merit increases on the Union, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. I find also that by refusing to grant an increase in the mileage reimbursement rate for newsroom employees, while granting such an increase to advertising department employees even though there is an established past practice of giving such increases, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

I also find that the statements made by Al Greene to the effect that, if the employees decertified the Union they would receive raises, constitute interference, restraint, and coercion of employees in the free exercise of Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By interfering with, restraining, and coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act, by discriminatorily denying merit increases to newsroom employees and by discriminatorily refusing to raise the mileage allowance for newsroom employees because the newsroom employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, thereby discouraging membership in the Union, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent committed certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies and purposes of the Act. I shall recommend that, in addition to posting a notice to employees, Respondent make whole those newsroom employees for any loss of wages and benefits they may have suffered because of Respondent's discriminatory failure to grant merit increases and mileage rate increases after September 28, 1979.[11] Such merit increases and mileage rate increases shall be paid as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[9] The testimony of witnesses indicated that Greene would have given several of the unit employees merit increases but for the negotiations that were then being conducted. In addition, there is uncontroverted evidence that Respondent paid new hires more after the 6-month increase than it did to unit employees, thus, in effect, penalizing the more senior employees for having voted for the Union.

[10] Each individual denial of a merit increase during the 10(b) period constitutes a violation of the Act although the initial decision with respect to the policy of denials was made and disclosed prior to the 10(b) period. Pease Company, 251 NLRB 540 (1980); General Motors Acceptance Corporation, supra.

DECISION AND DIRECTION OF ELECTION

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

Upon a petition duly filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, a hearing was held on August 27, 1980, before Hearing Officer Melvin L. Ford. Following the hearing, this case was transferred to the National Labor Relations Board in Washington, D.C., for decision, pursuant to Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations and Statements of Procedure, Series 8, as amended. Thereafter, the Petitioner and the Intervenor[1] filed briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Hearing Officer's rulings made at the hearing are free from prejudicial error and are hereby affirmed.

Upon the entire record in this case, including the briefs, the Board finds:

1. The Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act and it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

2. The labor organizations involved claim to represent certain employees of the Employer.

3. A question affecting commerce exists concerning the representation of employees of the Employer within the meaning of Section 9(c)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

4. The Petitioner, by petition of March 13, 1980, seeks to sever from the existing production and maintenance unit currently represented by the Intervenor a unit of over-the-road truckdrivers of the Employer. The Intervenor opposes the requested severance on several grounds: First, that the Petitioner is not a labor organization within the meaning of the Act; second, that the Petitioner should not be certified as representative because it would discriminate against black employees and perpetuate unlawful privileges of white employees; and, third, that the unit sought is not an appropriate unit for severance from the existing overall bargaining unit. We find no merit in the Intervenor's positions.

The Employer is a manufacturer of furniture located in Memphis, Tennessee, employing approximately 1,000 employees. The Intervenor was certified in 1978 to represent an overall bargaining unit including all production and maintenance employees and local and over-the-road truckdrivers. As indicated above, the initial collective-bargaining agreement expired as of March 12, 1980. At the time of hearing it did not appear that a new contract had been executed.[2]

The Employer employs 16 over-the-road truckdrivers, who deliver furniture manufactured by the Employer. These truckdrivers are dispatched from the "truck shop," located several blocks from the Employer's manufacturing plant and warehouse. Truckdrivers spend 95 percent of their time away from the plant, do no plant work, do not load their trucks, have no contact with production and maintenance employees, and have only occasional contact with truck shop mechanics. Their hours differ from those of production and maintenance employees and they are not supervised by production and maintenance supervisors. They are generally dispatched by telephone and come to the truck shop to pick up their loads, choosing from the available bills of lading laid out for their inspection. Over-the-road truckdrivers are paid by mileage, whereas production and maintenance employees, including local drivers and "city switchmen," are paid hourly. Unlike local drivers, over-the-road truckdrivers are subject to regulations of the Department of Transportation, including required physical examinations and limits on the amount of time devoted to driving within a given period. Based on the foregoing factors, we find that over-the-road truckdrivers employed by the Employer constitute a homogeneous, functionally distinct group such as the Board has traditionally accorded the right of self-determination, notwithstanding a history of bargaining on a broader basis. See Wright City Display Manufacturing Company, a Subsidiary of Permaneer Corporation (Delaware), 183 NLRB 881 (1970); Downington Paper Co., a Division of Sonoco Products Company, 192 NLRB 310 (1971).[3]

[1] United Furniture Workers of America Local 282, AFL–CIO, herein the Intervenor, was permitted to intervene on the basis of its contractual representation pursuant to certification of a unit of the Employer's employees, including over-the-road truckdrivers. An initial contract expired as of March 12, 1980, and the parties have stipulated that there is no contract bar to this proceeding to sever over-the-road truckdrivers.

[2] In its brief dated September 18, 1980, the Intervenor contends that the parties are abiding by an unsigned contract covering the certified unit including over-the-road truckdrivers.

[3] We would distinguish the cases cited by the Intervenor: Rockingham Poultry Marketing Cooperative, Inc., 174 NLRB 1278 (1969), where the over-the-road drivers performed in substantial respects duties similar to those of other drivers not sought, were at times transferred to production jobs, and in some instances were subject to common supervision, and Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, Division of the Hearst Corporation, 200 NLRB 475 (1972), which involved a unit of local drivers in the circulation department found to have a clear history of bargaining on a broader basis despite a period of separate representation pursuant to a stipulated consent election.

Concerning the contention that the Petitioner is not a labor organization within the meaning of the Act, we note that the Petitioner was formed for the purpose of representing employees in bargaining with their employer concerning wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment. Accordingly, we find that the Petitioner is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act. We do not find controlling the fact that the Association has no history of representing truckdrivers, though established for that express purpose. See Friden Calculating Machine Co., Inc., and Marchant Calculators, Inc., 110 NLRB 1618, 1619 (1954).

With respect to the Intervenor's concern that the Petitioner, if certified, is unlikely to represent black employees fairly and equally, the Board does not consider a contention of that sort before certification. See Pioneer Bus Company, Inc., 140 NLRB 54, 56 (1962). In the event the Petitioner is certified and then abuses its certification by failing to represent all unit employees fairly, the Board will then consider a motion to revoke the certification.[4]

Our colleague emphasizes the invidious discrimination "apparent in this case" and would have the evidence in that regard considered before certification. This is, of course, consistent with our colleague's dissent in Handy Andy, Inc., 228 NLRB 447, 457 (1977), wherein a Board majority concluded, at 455: ". . . that our statutory function of eliminating invidious discrimination by labor organizations is best served by scrutinizing their activities when they are subject to our adversary procedures and remedial orders." The Board there went on to say that it had long used unfair labor practice procedures rather than representation procedures to consider allegations of invidious discrimination, as a result of which "the duty of fair representation has become the touchstone of the Board's concern with invidious discrimination by unions." If the Union here succeeds in being certified, it will thereafter be appropriate to consider whether it is fairly representing all members of the unit.

We find, therefore, that the Employer's over-the-road truckdrivers may, if they so desire, constitute a separate appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining, and we shall therefore direct an election among the employees in the following voting group:

> All over-the-road truckdrivers of the Employer at its plant in Memphis, Tennessee, excluding mechanics, mechanics' helpers, local drivers, city switchmen, all other employees, and supervisors as defined by the Act.

We shall make no final unit determination at this time, but shall be guided in part by the desires of the employees as expressed in the election hereinafter directed. If a majority of those in the voting group vote for the Petitioner, they will be taken to have indicated their desire to constitute a separate appropriate unit, and the Regional Director conducting the election will issue a Certification of Representative to the Petitioner for the unit described above, which the Board, in such circumstances, finds to be appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining. In the event that a majority do not vote for the Petitioner, these employees shall remain a part of the existing unit and the Regional Director will issue a Certification of Results of Election to such effect.

MEMBER JENKINS, dissenting:

Contrary to my colleagues, I would dismiss the instant petition for severance of the over-the-road truckdrivers from the existing unit. The attempted severance is a thinly disguised and racially discriminatory ploy designed to install and perpetuate a system of segregation in the Employer's workplace and thus to divide the existing bargaining unit along racial classifications.

The facts in this regard reveal that the Intervenor, a predominantly black local union, has since 1978 represented a certified unit of the Employer's work force consisting of approximately 1,000 employees. The present unit, which includes over-the-road truckdrivers and other employees of the Employer's trucking division as well as production and maintenance employees, is likewise predominantly black. In contrast, the unit sought in the instant petition consists of 16 employees, 12 of whom are white. The Petitioner is a local unaffiliated organization with a grand total of 12 members—not coincidentally, the 12 white truckdrivers employed by the Employer. The Petitioner was formed in March 1980 and at the time of the hearing had held four meetings. None of the black truckdrivers whom Petitioner seeks to represent was informed of or invited to attend these meetings.

Under these circumstances, I am unwilling to join my colleagues' direction of election in a unit so patently discriminatory that the results would amount to a segregation of the work force.[6] The

[4] The Intervenor also contends that the Petitioner is a sham union and that the role of a "management" law firm in the Petitioner's formation suggests financial assistance, presumably by the Employer. The Intervenor views the Petitioner as consisting of 12 white, antiunion employees who have already rejected representation by the Teamsters and who are really intent upon nonrepresentation, thus relegating the 4 black drivers to production jobs. This argument is also a post-certification issue.

[6] My colleagues rely on the fact that we have, in the past, allowed severance of similar units. However, aside from the factual differences be-blatant exclusion of the black over-the-road truckdrivers from membership or participation in the Petitioner can leave no doubt that that their exclusion was purposeful. For the Board, an agency of the United States Government, to grant its imprimatur to such an organization is to countenance a manifest injustice and a breach of constitutional requirements. I will have no part of any such action.

tween those cases and here, whether we might allow a similar unit under different circumstances is not relevant. What is important is that the Board must not countenance the invidious discrimination apparent in this case.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On July 29, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Earldean V. S. Robbins issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt her recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO, CLC, Local 1981, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had a chance to give evidence, the National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post this notice and we intend to carry out the Order of the Board and abide by the following:

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act by trying, fining, suspending, or otherwise disciplining them because of their giving testimony adverse to the Union's position in arbitration proceedings before an arbitrator under a collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act or impair the integrity of the arbitration procedures of the collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL rescind the fine assessed against, and the suspension of, Gabriel Torres and expunge from our records all reference to such fine and suspension.

WE WILL reimburse Gabriel Torres for any amount he may have paid on such fine with interest from the date of such payment.

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA, AFL-CIO, CLC, LOCAL 1981

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

EARLDEAN V. S. ROBBINS, Administrative Law Judge: This matter was heard by me in Los Angeles, California, on May 19, 1981. The charge in Case 21-CB-7449 was filed by Major Safe Company, Inc., herein called Major Safe or the Company, on August 15, 1980, and served on United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO, CLC, Local 1981, herein called Respondent, on August 18, 1980. The charge in Case 21-CB-7610 was filed by Major Safe on January 12, 1981, and served on Respondent on January 13, 1981. The complaint, which issued on February 25, 1981, alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein called the Act.

The principal issue herein is whether Respondent violated the Act by threatening employee Ruben Campos with intraunion discipline if he testified on behalf of the Company in a grievance proceeding and by holding an intraunion trial of employee Gabriel Torres and subsequently suspending and fining him because he testified on behalf of the Company in an arbitration proceeding.

Upon the entire record including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the post-hearing briefs filed by the parties, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material herein, Major Safe, a California corporation with an office and place of business in Los Angeles, California, has been engaged in the manufacturing of safes. Major Safe, in the course and conduct of its business operations, annually sells and ships goods and products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Major Safe is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Respondent is now, and at all times material herein has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

Respondent and Major Safe Company are parties to a collective-bargaining agreement which provides for a multistep grievance and arbitration procedure. On June 13, 1980,[1] Cesar Melgar, an employee of Major Safe, received a written warning and a 1 day suspension for violating a company rule by reading a newspaper in the bathroom during working hours. Melgar filed a grievance on June 16 protesting the warning and suspension.

The step 1 grievance meeting was skipped. Following step 2 and 3 meetings, a step 4 grievance meeting was held on July 23. Between the third and fourth step meetings, Jerrold Bellenger, director of industrial relations for the Company, asked employee Ruben Campos to testify on behalf of the Company.[2] Shortly thereafter, according to Campos, Jose Diaz, Respondent's unit chairman at Major Safe, asked Campos if he were going to be a witness against a brother and if he knew what the outcome would be. Diaz said if Campos did not tell the truth he could be punished or fined. However, in Campos' prehearing affidavit, he stated that Diaz said that Campos should state in the grievance meeting that he had seen nothing and knew nothing, that if Campos were a witness against Melgar the Union could punish or fine him.

Present for the Company at the July 23 step 4 meeting were Bellenger, Donald Wagner, vice president of manufacturing, and Donald Aldridge, plant manager. Present for Respondent were Tony Torres, International representative, Wesley Guajardo, business representative, Miguel Garcia, treasurer, and Jose Diaz, Salvador Serna, and Jose Campos, unit committeemen. The Company called Campos as a witness. When Tony Torres began questioning Campos in English, with Garcia translating into Spanish, Torres stated words to the effect that Campos could be disciplined on fined for giving false testimony against a brother.[3] Torres then proceeded to read from Respondent's International constitution a subsection which makes a member subject to discipline for "slandering or willfully wronging a member of the International Union." Bellenger said he thought Torres was intimidating the witness and asked him to cease the statement regarding discipline. Torres refused and Bellenger called a temporary halt to the meeting.

On October 16, a hearing was held before an arbitrator on the Melgar grievance. Gabriel Torres testified as a witness for the Company. During the course of the arbitration hearing, Respondent and the Company reached a settlement which provided that the written warning and all references thereto be removed from Melgar's personnel file and that a half day's pay be restored to Melgar.[4]

On October 22, Melgar filed an intraunion charge against Gabriel Torres alleging that Torres had violated certain specific sections of the International union constitution by falsely testifying at the arbitration hearing. Thereafter, Gabriel Torres was notified by letter that the charge had been filed and the trial scheduled for December 4. The trial was held as scheduled on December 4. Gabriel Torres did not attend. Melgar did attend and testify. On December 4, the intraunion trial committee found Torres guilty as charged and recommended that he be fined $600 and his membership in Respondent be suspended for 6 months for giving false testimony. On December 11, the general membership of Respondent adopted the trial committee's recommendation. Thereafter, Gabriel Torres was notified of the finding and of his right to appeal. However, he did not file an appeal.

B. Conclusion

The General Counsel contends that Respondent violated the Act by Diaz threatening Campos with discipline if he testified on behalf of the Company. In its answer, Respondent denies that Diaz is an agent of Respondent but did not pursue this position in its post-hearing brief. The record establishes that, as unit chairman, Diaz is responsible for enforcing the collective-bargaining agreement and is required to report to Respondent any infraction or violations of the agreement of which he is aware. He handles grievances on behalf of Respondent and, in accordance with the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement, he is excused from work to do so without loss of pay. In these circumstances, I find that Diaz is an agent of Respondent. Local Lodge Number 5, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO (Regor Construction Company, Inc.), 249 NLRB 840, 848 (1980).

[2] Campos, Gabriel Torres, and at least one or two other employees were present in the bathroom at the time of the alleged reading incident.

[3] Bellenger testified that Torres said Campos could be punished or fined if he said anything "bad" about a brother. However, Torres, Campos, and two other witnesses testified that Torres spoke in terms of "false" testimony or lying. I credit these latter witnesses that Torres spoke of false testimony.

[4] According to Bellenger, a basis for the settlement was that the Company revise its rules regarding reading on company time so that it was not overly broad as the arbitrator deemed the present rule to be. Torres denied that the arbitraton commented that the rule was overly broad or that changing the rule was part of the basis of the settlement. According to him, the arbitrator suggested a settlement because of conflicting testimony.

However, in view of the conflict between Campos' testimony and his prehearing affidavit, I further find that Campos is not a reliable witness in this regard. I therefore find that the evidence is insufficient to establish that Diaz threatened Campos in violation of the Act.[5]

The complaint alleges that Respondent violated the Act by subjecting Gabriel Torres to an internal disciplinary trial and by imposing court collectible fines on Torres and suspending him from membership in Respondent for a period of 6 months. Respondent contends that its trial of Gabriel Torres and the fine and suspension resulting therefrom were proper since Torres was afforded all the procedural and substantive safeguards required under the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act.

The General Counsel argues that it is unlawful for Respondent to make a determination as to whether an employee gave false testimony in a grievance arbitration proceeding and that the mere entertaining of the charge, the trial, and resulting discipline are violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

The General Counsel's argument is supported by Board law. It is well established that, although under the proviso to Section 8(b)(1)(A), a labor organization may in certain circumstances fine an employee-member for violating union rules relating to the acquisition or retention of membership, the proviso does not permit such intraunion disciplinary action for every infraction of intraunion rules particularly where such intraunion action infringes upon employees' Section 7 rights. The Board has found that subjecting an employee-member to an internal union trial proceeding and imposing disciplinary sanctions for testifying adverse to the Union's position infringes upon employees' Section 7 rights. Freight Drivers and Helpers Local Union No. 557, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Liberty Transfer Company, Inc.), 218 NLRB 1117 (1975); Cannery Warehousemen, Food Processors, Drivers and Helpers Local Union No. 788, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America Independent (Marston Ball, an Individual), 190 NLRB 24 (1971). The Board has further found that such intraunion disciplinary action is no less an infringement upon employees' protected rights because it purports to be based on the giving of false testimony. As stated by the administrative law judge in Liberty Transfer, supra at 1121, "[A] determination of that sort [as to the falsity of the testimony] seems scarcely one to be entrusted to the biased judgment of the Union against whose interests the testimony was given."

Therefore, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by trying, fining, and suspending Gabriel Torres because he testified adverse to Respondent's position[6] in an arbitration hearing. I further conclude that such conduct has impaired the integrity of the contractual arbitration procedure and, accordingly, I find that Respondent thereby violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act. Liberty Transfer, supra; Marston Ball, supra.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Major Safe Company, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By bringing to trial, suspending, and fining employee Gabriel Torres because he cooperated with the Employer in connection with the grievance arbitration procedure, Respondent has restrained and coerced employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act in violation of the provisions of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act; and impaired the integrity of the arbitration clause in the collective-bargaining agreement, thereby violating Sections 8(d) and 8(b)(3) of the Act.

4. By engaging in the aforesaid conduct, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. To remedy the coercive and restraining effect upon all employee-members by the trial procedure and the resulting fine against, and suspension of, Gabriel Torres, it is recommended that Respondent be required to rescind the fine against, and suspension of, Gabriel Torres, to expunge from its records all references to the fine and suspension, and to notify all members of the rescission of such fine and suspension and of their right to testify in arbitration proceedings under the collective-bargaining agreement without fear of being charged, tried, fined, or suspended for doing so, such notices to be posted at Respondent's office and hall and at Major Safe Company's place of business providing the latter is willing.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[7]

The Respondent, United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO, CLC, Local 1981, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

[5] In reaching this conclusion, I have fully considered the statements made by Campos in his pre-hearing affidavit and the General Counsel's argument that I should find the statements therein to be true.

[6] I reject Respondent's position that the trial committee was totally disinterested, apparently based on a contention that this grievance was only for Gabriel Torres' benefit and that Respondent has no stake in the outcome. The issue was clearly one of union regularity, a position that Tony Torres certainly made evident by his conduct toward Campos during the fourth step grievance meeting.

[7] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(a) Restraining and coercing employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act by trying, fining, or otherwise disciplining its members because they gave testimony adverse to the Union's position in arbitration proceedings under a collective-bargaining agreement, and by such conduct thereby impairing the integrity of arbitration procedures under a collective-bargaining agreement.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining and coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, or refusing to bargain with an employer in violation of Sections 8(d) and 8(b)(3) of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Rescind the fine against and suspension of Gabriel Torres and expunge from Respondent's records all reference to the fine and suspension, and, if such fine has been paid, make reimbursement to Gabriel Torres the amount of the payment with interest as provided in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

(b) Post in Respondent's business offices and meeting halls, copies of the attached notice, in both English and Spanish, marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of said notice, in both English and Spanish, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter. Copies shall be posted in conspicuous places, within clear view of all persons entering Respondent's hall. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material. Upon request of the Regional Director, Respondent shall supply him with a sufficient number of signed copies for posting by Major Safe Company if desired by them.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 21, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS ALSO ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges any violation of the Act not specifically found herein.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On April 20, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Joan Wieder issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified herein, and to adopt her recommended Order, as modified.

We agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act when it terminated the accident and sickness (A and S) benefits of the six discriminatees on January 8, 1980,[3] the first day of the strike. However, for the reasons stated herein, we disagree with the Administrative Law Judge's recommended remedy as to four of the six individuals.[4] While the Administrative Law Judge correctly determined that these four discriminatees should be reimbursed for benefits lost under Respondent's A and S plan beginning on January 8, 1980, we hereby modify her findings as to which date their respective entitlements ended.

Peter J. Gottfried

Employee Gottfried suffered from chronic rheumatoid arthritis. In December 1979, Gottfried received treatment from a rheumatologist in California while on vacation. Gottfried received permission from Respondent's personnel director by telephone to remain in California on sick leave in order to finish these treatments. Upon his return to Wyoming on January 6 or 7, Gottfried informed Respondent that he was going to consult his local physician before returning to work. However, Gottfried did not see his physician until January 30, approximately 3 weeks later. At that time, Gottfried received an injection (gold salts therapy) and was told by his physician that he could return to work when he "felt like it." Gottfried testified that he felt well enough to work on February 11, and that he began to picket at that time.

The Administrative Law Judge found Gottfried's testimony that he was available for work on February 11 to be dispositive of the issue of what date Gottfried's eligibility for A and S benefits ended. However, it appears that Gottfried may have been medically able to work before that time, possibly following his January 30 doctor's appointment. Furthermore, Respondent may be correct that Gottfried unnecessarily waited 3 weeks to see his doctor, and that his chronic condition would not have prevented him from working shortly after his return to Wyoming in early January. We therefore leave to the compliance stage the question of which date Gottfried was medically able to return to work.

Michael L. Wergin

At the beginning of the strike, Wergin was on sick leave because of a knee injury. He was subsequently released by his doctor on February 7, and began picketing on February 21.

The Administrative Law Judge found that there was no indication that Wergin was ready to work immediately after his release or prior to his commencement of picketing. She therefore concluded that Wergin's entitlement to A and S benefits ended on February 21, the first day that he picketed. However, under E. L. Wiegand Division, Emerson Electric Co., supra, a discriminatee is not entitled to recover A and S benefits for longer than the period of his disability. Wergin's doctor released Wergin to return to work on February 7. We therefore find that Wergin's entitlement to benefits ended on February 7, the date of his medical release.

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing her findings.

[2] We note that, while Respondent has excepted to the Administrative Law Judge's finding that it is an Illinois corporation, Respondent has not indicated in which State it is actually incorporated.

[3] All dates are in 1980, unless otherwise noted.

[4] We adopt the Administrative Law Judge's recommended remedy as to William B. Noell and John Vin.

Member Jenkins agrees with the findings herein as to the remedy for the reasons set forth in his dissent in E. L. Wiegand Division, Emerson Electric Co., 246 NLRB 1143 (1979), enfd. as modified 650 F.2d 463 (3d Cir. 1981).

Member Zimmerman finds it unnecessary to reach the remedial issue set forth in Emerson Electric Co., supra, since the result in this case is the same under either the majority or dissenting approach.

James T. Lake

Lake was placed on sick leave in December 1979, due to back problems, and received treatments from Respondent's doctor at the Casper facility. When the strike began, Lake stopped going in for treatments because he did not wish to cross the picket line. Lake did not seek treatment elsewhere, but remained at home and used a heating pad, as the doctor had instructed. Lake testified that he could have returned to work "sometime after the 20th of January," and that he had begun picketing at that time. Approximately a week earlier, on January 13, Lake had visited the picket line in his car, gotten out, and spoken with several of the picketers.

The Administrative Law Judge found that Lake's eligibility ended on January 13, because the combination of Lake's failure to continue his treatment at the facility and his January 13 visit to the picket line constituted public support of the strike which disqualified him from further A and S benefits. However, we find that under Emerson Electric Co., supra, Lake's actions were not a sufficient manifestation of public support to deny him his entitlement to continued A and S benefits. First, a failure to go to the facility for treatments is not an "affirmative" demonstration of support for the strike, as is required in Emerson Electric Co.[5] Second, Lake's testimony established that he did not carry a picket sign, and that his visit to the picket line was social; therefore, it does not establish that Lake supported the strike. Since there is no other evidence of strike support prior to Lake's recovery, we reject the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Lake's January 13 visit to the picket line disqualified him from further A and S benefits. As the evidence here is insufficient to make a final determination, we leave to the compliance stage the question of whether Lake was medically able to return to work shortly after January 20, as he testified, or at an earlier time.

Robert Ravert

At the beginning of the strike, Ravert was on sick leave with three broken ribs and a fractured shoulder blade. He received a work release from a local doctor on March 24.

The Administrative Law Judge concluded that the only clear evidence of Ravert's ability to return to work was his March 24 work release. She therefore concluded that Ravert's eligibility should end as of that date. However, it appears from the record that Ravert may have been medically able to return to work before the time that he obtained the release from his doctor. Ravert's own testimony suggests that Ravert may not have seen his doctor for several weeks prior to picking up the release, and that he may have picked up the release on March 24 as a matter of convenience because the strike was ending. Thus, we leave to the compliance stage the question of when Ravert was medically able to return to work.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Texaco Oil Company, Casper, Wyoming, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as modified below:

Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a):

"(a) Make whole the employees listed in the section of this Decision entitled 'The Remedy,' in the manner set forth therein, as modified by the Board's Decision, by paying to each whatever sickness and disability or occupational illness and injury benefits were due them during the period January 8, 1980, to April 1, 1980, with interest."

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOAN WIEDER, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard in Casper, Wyoming, on December 17, 1980.[1] Charges were filed on May 10 by Michael L. Wergin and on June 2 by Robert G. Ravert. A complaint was issued July 25 alleging that Texaco Oil Company, herein called the Company or Respondent, interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act by, on or about January 8, suspending sickness and disability payments to five employees; and that by engaging in such conduct and acts because of the Company's employees' membership in and activities on behalf of the Union, Respondent did discriminate and is discriminating against its employees for the purpose of discouraging membership in a union in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Respondent admits in its answer that certain sick and disability payments were terminated, but denies that such action was unlawful or in any way resulted in a violation of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein called the Act.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and the Company on or about January 19, 1981, have been carefully considered.

[5] We note in this regard that any attempt by Lake to continue his treatments would likely have been futile; Robert Ravert, another of the six discriminatees, attempted to enter the facility for his medical treatments during the strike, and was refused entry by Respondent.

[1] All dates hereinafter are in 1980 unless otherwise indicated.

Upon the entire record, including especially my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE COMPANY

The Company is an Illinois corporation with an office and place of business in Casper, Wyoming, herein called the Casper refinery, which is engaged in the processing, nonretail sale, and distribution of petroleum and related products. During the course and conduct of its business at Casper, the Company annually sells and distributes goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 to points and places outside the State of Wyoming. It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union (OCAW), and its Local No. 2-230, herein individually and jointly referred to as the Union, are admitted to be, and I find that they are, labor orgenizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Union and Respondent have, since the 1930's, maintained a bargaining relationship. The Union represents a unit of approximately 160 employees. On January 8, at approximately 3 p.m., an economic strike commenced at the refinery and lasted until March 30, when the employees began returning to work at 11 p.m.[2]

On the day the strike commenced, the Company informed the Union that accident and sickness benefits were being terminated when the strike began.

B. Provisions of Applicable Benefit Plans

Article XV of the applicable collective-bargaining agreement provides that, if a work stoppage, defined as covered by the agreement, occurs, "[A]ll obligations imposed upon the parties to this Labor Agreement will be suspended with the commencement of such strike and shall continue to be suspended, unless and until it is mutually agreeable to both parties to reimpose said obligations." The contract further provides in article VIII, section 2, that the accident and sickness benefit plan is to be incorporated into and made a part of the collective-bargaining agreement subject to all the provisions of the plan which will determine "all the questions arising under and in connection with the plans, except that the Company agrees that it will not voluntarily discontinue, change or modify such PLANS during the term of this Agreement in such a way as to decrease the benefits under said PLANS to any employee covered by this Agreement."

The details of the plan itself are contained in a booklet entitled "Accident and Sick Benefit Plan."[3] An employee qualifies for accident and sick benefit payments after 1 year of employment. The amount of benefits received is dependent upon the completed years of service. The plan encompasses all regular employees of Texaco who are located within the United States,[4] who are absent from work because of illness or accident. The individuals involved in this case were all described as receiving benefits for nonoccupational illness or injury. They had been receiving payments under the plan before the strike commenced and had their accident and sick benefits terminated at the commencement of the strike. Those employees are: Peter J. Gottfried, Michael L. Wergin, William B. Noell, John Vin, James T. Lake, and Robert G. Ravert. It appears from the record that these were the only unit members who were receiving accident and sickness benefits at the commencement of the strike. All other employees in the unit apparently participated in the strike.[5]

The contract negotiation meeting of January 8, 1980, was memorialized by the Company in a memorandum submitted as Respondent's Exhibit, and contains the following statements:

> Upon commencement of a strike, all A & S benefits will be discontinued, except in those cases involving industrial accident or injury. A & S benefits will be continued to those employees who are disabled due to industrial injury until medically released by their doctors or until expiration of their benefits in accordance with the Plan's benefit schedule, whichever occurs first.

C. The Recipients of Accident and Sickness Benefits

1. Peter J. Gottfried

Gottfried, a union member, had an ongoing chronic illness, rheumatoid arthritis. In December 1979, while vacationing in California, he sought treatment from a rheumatologist, a physician who specializes in this disease.[6] On or about December 22, Gottfried contacted F. M. Chaney, the personnel director of Respondent's Casper facility, an admitted supervisor. Chaney instructed Gottfried to pursue his consultations with the specialist; to follow the prescribed course of treatment; and to take all the time necessary. On or about December 26 or December 28, 1979, Gottfried again called Chaney and informed him he would be unable to finish the prescribed course of treatment within the allotted vacation time and would have to be placed on sick leave, which was permitted by the Company. Gottfried remained in California receiving the treatments prescribed by the rheumatologist until January 6 or 7, when he returned to Casper and resumed treatments under his own physician. Upon his return to Casper, he telephoned the Company and asked to speak to Chaney, who was unavailable; therefore, he spoke to a Mr. Mathis and informed him that he was going to consult his local physician prior to returning to work. Gottfried believes the telephone conversation occurred on or about January 7. Gottfried saw his personal physician in Casper on January 30, and received another treatment which was apparently an injection, described as gold salts therapy, and was told he was responding well to the treatment. His physician informed him that he could return to work when he "felt like it."[7]

[2] It is unrefuted that the strike was an economic strike occasioned by the failure of Respondent and the Union to reach agreement during negotiations which commenced pursuant to a provision in the contract for reopening the agreement.

[3] Only the accident and sickness benefit plan is involved in the instant proceeding.

[5] There is no evidence indicating that any other hourly employees were not represented by any union or were represented by a bargaining agent other than the OCAW. Furthermore, there was no indication as to whether any unrepresented or supervisory employees were eligible for accident and sickness benefits and did or did not receive any payments under the plan.

[6] It is unrefuted that there are no rheumatologists in Casper, Wyoming.

Shortly after the strike commenced, Gottfried again tried to contact Chaney telephonically to tell him about the medical treatment, but was unsuccessful. Gottfried decided that, because of the strike, there was no use in continuing his attempts to contact Chaney; he did not think it was necessary until he had received sufficient information from his own physician to relate to the Company a more definitive indication of his medical status.

Gottfried received payments for sickness and disability under the plan administered by Respondent until January 8, when all payments terminated. Gottfried did not protest to Texaco when his accident and sickness benefits were terminated in January at the commencement of the strike because he did not think it would do any good. Gottfried also did not attempt to make any reports after his unsuccessful attempt to call Chaney. Gottfried's failure to report was done with the admitted knowledge that the Company had an absentee policy but he does not interpret that policy as requiring day-to-day reporting while an employee is on sick leave. During the week of February 11, Gottfried felt well enough to take part in the strike and he commenced picketing. The picketing was engaged in pursuant to his doctor's instructions, who told him to go back to work or to assume picket duty when he felt like it. As soon as Gottfried felt well enough to go back to work, he actively supported the strike, feeling it was an obligation. Gottfried testified that he conscientiously could never cross a picket line, he would have to show some support for the strike. Gottfried has never crossed a picket line.

Respondent, in its brief, argues that there was no significant difference in Gottfried's arthritic condition from the time he went on vacation to his return to Wyoming on January 8, and, therefore, he should be considered ready to return to work and not eligible for accident and sickness pay. This argument is considered to be without merit. Respondent unrefutedly paid Gottfried accident and sickness benefits until the strike commenced. The obligations to ascertain Gottfried's ability to return to work and his willingness to do so remained the same, and it cannot now be argued that he never qualified for accident and sickness payments if Respondent had never previously questioned the propriety of his receiving such benefits, as demonstrated by its willingness to pay accident and sickness payments until the strike commenced. Accordingly, Gottfried's testimony that he was available for work on February 11 will be considered dispositive of when he was eligible to return to work, and his failure to do so will be construed as an affirmative showing of support for the strike. Respondent admitted that it never inquired if Gottfried supported the strike.

2. Michael L. Wergin

Wergin, a union member, commenced employment with Texaco in 1971. On or about the evening of January 6, he went on sick leave because he injured a knee. He underwent knee surgery. On or about February 7,[8] he was released by his doctor. Approximately 2 weeks later, he commenced picketing. Wergin received sickness and disability payments for the period preceding the commencement of the strike, which were terminated on January 8. He did not receive any payments for the period subsequent to the commencement of the strike. Wergin admitted that he did not report to work after he was released from the doctor because he decided to honor the picket line and to support the strike. He did not report his release for work to the Company at the time received because of the strike and his decision to participate therein.[9]

Wergin began picketing on or about February 21 and he continued to picket for the duration of the strike whenever his turn came up in the picketing rotation. Also during the strike, Wergin found a regular job, which he currently holds, at Anexter Mine Supply. The date he started working for Anexter Mine Supply is not a matter of record. There is no indication that he was ready to work immediately after his release on or about February 7 or prior to his commencement of picketing on or about February 21. Accordingly, his change of employment to Anexter Mine Supply is not found to demonstrate overt support for the strike prior to February 21 when he actively began to picket.

[7] Gottfried had informed the Company on the day of the strike, when he returned from California, that he had to have an appointment with his own doctor to undergo the treatment recommended by the specialist in California. There was no indication as to why the appointment was held several weeks after his return, whether it was pursuant to doctor's instructions or caused by other factors. Respondent seeks to infer that the delay was occasioned by Gottfried's assumption that he was on strike and there was no need to rush until the strike was over. This inference is insupportable because there was no evidence to indicate that Gottfried knew that the strike would last until January 30.

[8] The witness stated it was either February 7 or 10 that he was released by his doctor.

[9] Wergin is one of the Charging Parties. He signed a charge that was prepared for him, apparently by some union personnel. These facts are inadequate to support a finding that the filing of the charge by Wergin or any other individual was in contravention of the strike settlement agreement which the Union executed and contained a provision for withdrawal of all unfair labor practice charges by the Union. There was no showing that the Union did not withdraw all charges it previously filed, pursuant to the agreement, or that any of its activities on behalf of Wergin were not consonant with its duties of fair representation to its members or were in contravention of the strike settlement agreement.

3. William B. Noell

Noell, a current employee of Texaco, has been an employee of Respondent for 34 years. Noell, a union member, underwent an operation in November, the results of which led to the determination that he had cancer and he underwent therapy for that illness. The doctor released him to return to work on March 24; however, he never joined the picketing or even visited the picket line on the advice of his doctor who informed him that he should concentrate on his serious illness and stay away from the strike and the plant until she advised differently. He was never requested by the Union to picket. He did receive strike benefits as did all the other employees, including those discussed herein. He did not report for work when he was released because he decided to honor the picket line and support the strike. Noell has supported every strike that occurred at Respondent since his employment in 1950.

During the course of his illness and the treatment prescribed therefor, Noell kept in contact with the Company's nurse, Wareen Pierce. Sometimes the nurse called him and sometimes he called the nurse. He believes the contact was more or less out of her friendship with him. Respondent contends that the calls were made consonant with the Company's policy of keeping them informed of an employee's medical condition during his disability. Respondent argues that the obligation to keep the Company informed remains in effect during the strike and that an individual employee's failure to abide by that obligation was arguably an indicia of support for the strike. This argument will be considered hereinafter. The Company never inquired if Noell did support the strike.

4. John Vin

Vin, a union member, was also a long-term employee of Texaco, commencing his employment in September 1950. On January 8, he was on sick leave. Initially, his illness was the flu, but when he went to the doctor they found that he needed a cataract operation which was performed on December 13, 1979. He was still on sick leave on January 8. He was able to go back to work sometime after January 8, but did not return to his job because of the strike. When he was released by his doctor sometime in the latter part of January to return to work, he commenced picketing. He telephoned the nurse, since he could not cross the picket line, to inform the Company that he had been released by his doctor and could return to work. He does not recall when he called the nurse.[10]

Inasmuch as Vin and counsel for the General Counsel had the most appropriate access to Vin's medical records, and the Company had records which may have recorded his reporting of the release for work, and all failed to demonstrate the extent of any entitlement to accident and sickness benefits subsequent to January 8, it is concluded that his entitlement to such benefits after January 8, if any, should be determined at the compliance stage of these proceedings.

5. James T. Lake

Lake, a union member, was placed on sick leave sometime in the latter part of December due to low back pain. He was being treated by the Company's doctor. The treatment consisted of some unspecified sound treatments at the Company's facility in Casper, Wyoming, plus following the doctor's directions, which included staying at home and using a heating pad until he felt like working. He received accident and sickness benefits until January 8 when they stopped. Lake was not notified by the Company that the benefits would be terminated when the strike commenced. After January 8, he was not released by the doctor. When the strike commenced, he did not go to the plant to continue the treatments, and he did not call the nurse who was administering the treatments prior to the strike or any other individual at Respondent's facility. Lake stated he stopped going in for treatments because he did not want to cross the picket line. He did not inform the Company of his decision nor did he seek approval from the Union to cross the picket line to continue receiving treatments. The Company never called Lake to ask if he supported the strike. Lake stated that, if he made any assumptions about the Company's attitude, it was that they did not care what he did if he were on strike. Accordingly, he just stayed home with his heating pad and did not seek treatment elsewhere because he did not consult another doctor who could direct him to a place where he could continue the treatments.

Lake opined that he could have returned to work sometime after January 20. He began picketing sometime after January 20. Prior to January 20, sometime shortly after the strike commenced, he did stop by the picket line in his car. He does not recall, though, if he got out of his car; he thinks he probably did. He did not carry a picket sign, but he did talk to several of the picketers. He believes that the visit was approximately a week before January 20, which would be about January 13. Lake did receive the $150 check as part of the strike settlement as did all the other employees involved herein.

It is concluded that Lake's failure to continue seeking treatment by refusing to cross the picket line cojoined with his appearance at the picket line on or about January 13, where he stood, he believes, outside his vehicle and talked with some of the picketers, constituted public support of the strike activities, and constituted, as of January 13, a manifestation of public support for the strike sufficient to disqualify him from receipt of accident and sickness benefits after January 13. It is therefore concluded that Lake is entitled to receipt of accident and sickness benefits he would otherwise receive from January 8 through January 13, had it not been for the activities of other unit employees.

[10] The witness was confused as to the exact time the release was obtained, testifying initially that there was a release sometime around December 18, 1979, but since the cataract operation was December 13, 1979, and he stated he was released from the hospital December 16, 1979, it appears unlikely that he was ready to return to work on December 18, 1979, and failed to do so. Inasmuch as Respondent filled out documents indicating that accident and sickness benefits were due and owing through January 8, it is concluded that the witness' later testimony that the doctor approved his return to work sometime in the latter part of January when he commenced picketing is most probably accurate.

6. Robert G. Ravert

Ravert had worked for the Company approximately 13-1/2 years and had been a union member for the entire duration of his employment by Respondent. On November 3, he was involved in an accident away from work where he suffered three broken ribs and a fractured shoulder blade. Accident and sickness benefits were paid by Respondent from November 3 through January 8, 1980. Since January 2 or 3, he was receiving treatments almost daily thereafter from the nurse at Respondent's facility, until January 8, when the strike commenced. He did receive a treatment on January 8 and noted that the strike had begun when he was leaving the premises after receiving the treatment.

Ravert requested permission from the Union to continue receiving the treatments from Respondent, and the Union granted his request. When Ravert went to Respondent's facility to continue receiving treatments, a gateman and guard stopped him, telephoned someone at the facility, and refused to permit him to enter. This refusal on the part of Respondent's employees to permit Ravert to enter for a continuation of treatment requires that his termination of treatments during the strike be considered differently from Lake's actions, where he never attempted to continue treatments and was not denied access to the facility.

Ravert did visit the picket line once, at an unspecified date, but it was not shown that he got out of the car or in any way demonstrated public support for the strike.

Ravert was continuing medical treatment sometime after the strike commenced from a Dr. Roussalis, who gave him a return to work release dated March 24, 1980. The reason the release to return to work was obtained that day was that Ravert's wife had an appointment with the doctor on that day, so he went along to obtain the release. He was unclear whether it was given to Respondent at any time thereafter. Ravert did not participate in the picketing before or after March 24, 1980. It was stipulated that Ravert's personnel file contained two payroll authorization forms for leaves of absence and separation. The first form was dated December 14, 1979, and indicated that he was granted full accident and sickness benefits from November through December 31, 1979, with the date of return to work unknown.

The second payroll authorization form, dated January 17, stated, "[C]ontinue full accident and sickness benefits from 1-1-80 through 3:00 p.m. 1-8-80; employee on strike at 3:00 p.m., 1-8-80," and "date of return to work unknown." The record is unclear as to whether Ravert remained physically disabled from working during the duration of the strike. However, the personnel records clearly demonstrate that his benefits were terminated because of the strike activities of other employees. It is also clear that Respondent at no time throughout the duration of the strike inquired when Ravert would be able to return to his duties and refrained from making such a determination and did not state any reasons for its failure to do so. The failure of Respondent to permit Ravert on the premises to continue treatments precluded by its own actions the Company from having a fair assessment by its own medical staff as to when Ravert would be ready to return to work. Accordingly, the only clear evidence of record that Ravert was released to return to work was dated March 24, and it is found that entitlement to accident and sickness benefits terminated on March 24, 1980.

Ravert, like Wergin, also filed a charge concerning his loss of accident and sickness benefits. Ravert stated that he felt that he should have been paid his premiums and was inquiring about the propriety of the termination of such benefits. One of the individuals he talked to was Ralph W. Newman, chairman of the workmen's committee for the Local of the Union. As was the case with Wergin, there was no clear showing that the Union recruited Ravert or otherwise acted improperly so as to abrogate any of the employees' rights to seek redress through the instant proceeding. In fact, Newman credibly testified, that during the negotiations of the strike settlement, the Union stated that it was willing to withdraw the charges alleging unfair labor practices by Respondent for failure to pay accident and sickness benefits, but stated that they would continue to assist the membership if they wished to file charges alleging violation of the Act for Respondent's failure to pay them their accident and sickness benefits.[11]

The strike settlement agreement executed March 29, 1980, between Respondent and the Union states as follows:

> It is further understood that: (1) Each party will dismiss any and all litigation now pending against the other or its agents, i.e., injunctions, damage suits, etc. (including arbitrations, unfair labor practice charges, lawsuits and grievances related to any of the benefit plans); (2) that such dismissal will be at each party's own cost; and (3) that it is agreed that no new litigation growing out of or related to the strike will be filed.

The strike settlement agreement further provides, under the section entitled "Accident and Sickness Benefits":

> It is understood that employees who are unable to report to work due to sickness or accident which commenced after the strike began will be eligible

> The Union stated that they cannot bargain away an employee's individual rights for a $150 lump-sum payment. If an employee, on an individual basis, wished to file an NLRB charge or grievance on the A & S benefits lost during the work stoppage, would an employee have the right to do so? Management advised the Union that any employee on an individual basis could do so by law. It must be pointed out, however, that the Company would take a dim view of our bargaining relationship if any faction of the Union, local or international, were involved in such a complaint after the culmination of an agreement. Management would want this understood before any agreement is reached. Upon signing the agreement, the Union would be precluded from representation in any form or manner.

Newman stated that the Union was not representing these people, but was assisting them and that Newman was at the hearing on his own and not as a union representative. As the memorandum indicates, the individual employees retain the right to file charges which they have done so in this proceeding, and the evidence does not adequately show that there was any basis for making a finding as to whether the Union did or did not abide by the strike settlement agreement as reflected in the memorandum quoted above.

> for A & S benefits beginning with the termination of the strike, provided satisfactory evidence of disability is established, except that the first scheduled work day after the strike ends will serve as the customary 1-day waiting period in accordance with the terms of the Company's Accident and Sick Benefit Plan. In addition, for employees who were disabled before the strike began and were receiving A & S benefits, such benefits shall be resumed at the time the strike is officially discontinued if satisfactory evidence of continuing disability is established.

This document was signed March 29, 1980, by A. K. Sherer, acting plant manager, the chairman of the workmen's committee, Ralph Newman, the president of Local 2-230, John J. Kennedy, the International representative, Ronald D. Holloway, and a workmen's committee of four individuals. As Administrative Law Judge Ricci found in his Decision in Emerson Electric,[12] a contention that the settlement agreement requires dismissal of the instant complaint is without merit for the public right supersedes the private agreement. Furthermore, the language of the agreement does not clearly abrogate the rights of union members or other employees from filing charges. There is no explicit waiver of these rights.

D. Discussion and Conclusions

The Board, in Emerson Electric Co., supra, held that termination of sickness and accident benefits to employees who were physically unable to work on and after the date the strike commenced because other employees went out on strike, immediately upon commencement of the strike, was violative of the Act on the basis of the reasons given by the then Chairman Fanning's dissent in Southwestern Electric Power Company, 216 NLRB 522, 523 (1975), which states as follows:

> The Respondent takes the simplistic position that, as wages "under the law" are not continued for strikers, they are not continued for those on continuing sick pay unless the recipients disavow the strike. In essence, my colleagues agree. This ignores Section 7 and the right of an employee to join in or refrain from concerted activity. Granted, these employees on sick leave were entitled to no wages once their excused absences expired and they failed to return to work. It is a far cry for this Board to require that they disavow legal strike action by their Union during their sick leave in order to receive their sick pay. Not only is it contrary to the statute, but it lacks support in Board precedent. Cases where the Board has sanctioned the discharge of presumed strikers in the context of strikes in violation of no-strike provisions are inapplicable.
> In short, these employees had a Section 7 right to refrain from declaring their position on this strike while they were medically excused. That they exhibited some strike support after medical release, and testified that if physically able they would have joined the strike, is irrelevant in my view. To the extent, however, that some evidenced strike support by visiting the picket line and/or picketing before medical release, I would limit the amount of continued sick pay to the period ending with the date of such supportive action.

In overruling the inconsistent holdings of Southwestern Electric Power Company, supra, the Board stated, in Emerson Electric Co.:

> Accordingly, we now hold that for an employer to be justified in terminating any disability benefits to employees who are unable to work at the start of a strike it must show that it has acquired information which indicates that the employee whose benefits are to be terminated has affirmatively acted to show public support for the strike. [246 NLRB at 1144.]

The fact that the Company herein determined to terminate all accident and sickness benefits prior to the commencement of the strike does not abrogate the efficacy of the Emerson Electric case decision nor does it result in a determination that the decision was for a proper motive and therefore cannot be found violative of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. As then Board Member Fanning indicated in his dissent in Southwestern Electric Power Company , the employee has the right to determine if he was going to join his counion members in their decision to withhold their services by joining in the strike. An individual who is on sick leave prior to the commencement of the strike and continues to be disabled to perform his work duties cannot be said to have ceased his work in connection with a current labor dispute and consequently cannot be considered a striker.[13]

As the Court recognized in N.L.R.B. v. Fansteel Metallurgical Corp., 306 U.S. 240, 255, 256 (1939):

> The conduct thus protected is lawful conduct. Congress also recognized the right to strike—that the employees could lawfully cease work at their own volition because of the failure of the employer to meet their demands.

Therefore, it is concluded that the six employees named above did not cease work as strikers, but were deemed unable to work due to sickness and disability and, until they were afforded an opportunity to exercise their right to determine if they were going to cease work or continue work, the presumption on the part of Respondent that they exercised their right of choice or would be treated as if they had exercised their right of choice deprives them of their options guaranteed under Section 7 to join or refrain from joining others in protected activity. An individual who is receiving sickness or disability payments when a strike commences, by definition, is not ceasing to withhold services as are the strikers, and therefore must be afforded the protection of Section 7 to exercise his option of joining or refraining from joining the strikers. By terminating the sickness and disability payments, Respondent in fact presumed such an election, based on the actions of the other employees.

Wiegand Division, Emerson Electric Co.*, 246 NLRB 1143 (1979), citing National Licorice Company v. N.L.R.B., 309 U.S. 350 (1940); Amalgamated Utility Workers (C.I.O.) v. Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, 309 U.S. 261 (1940); Agwilines, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 87 F.2d 146 (5th Cir. 1936); J. I. Case Co. v. N.L.R.B., 321 U.S. 332 (1944); and Harold A. Boire v. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America [Pilot Motor Freight Carriers, Inc.], 479 F.2d 778 (5th Cir. 1973).

[13] Since individuals who have not announced their support for the Union who were on sick or disability leave prior to and continuing during the strike cannot be said to have voluntarily determined to withhold their services and to strike, the cases dealing with the cessation or continuation of benefits to strikers are held inapplicable.

The fact that in the instant case Respondent notified all employees that their benefits would be terminated at the commencement of the strike does not present a situation so distinguishable from Emerson Electric as to warrant the application of a different standard of behavior warranting a different result. In the instant situation, the motivating factor for the termination of the payments was the strike. Work would have been scheduled for all hourly employees except for the strike. Respondent, admittedly, did not ascertain whether all employees supported the strike. Furthermore, Respondent failed to demonstrate that the situation had such a potential for violence or that the strikers' conduct was so egregious as to warrant abrogation of the normal protections afforded under Section 7 of the Act. Furthermore, even if some of the strikers' activities were shown to be egregious, that would have been subsequent to the deprivation of the benefits and also is deemed irrelevant in the instant situation since the workers could not be termed to be strikers until their position regarding the strike was ascertained or they publicly demonstrated their support for the strike. There was no showing that the strikers or the Union caused Respondent any concern that the continuation of sickness and disability payments would have resulted in the lengthening of the strike or caused objectionable activity. Accordingly, it is concluded that Respondent has failed to present a valid business reason for abrogating these employees' rights to election under Section 7 to join or refrain from joining the strike for valid business reasons that outweigh the injury done to these employees by denying them such an election. It is also concluded that there is a direct link between the decision not to schedule work, not to pay sickness and disability payments to these employees solely because of the strike, which is a protected concerted activity.

Initially, Respondent argues that under the Texaco accident and sickness benefit fund, which was negotiated into the labor agreement, Texaco has reserved the right to terminate accident and sickness benefits and to require the employee to come forward and present satisfactory evidence of entitlement to such benefits. The notice posted at the plant and distributed to all the employees provides, as pertinent:

> 1. If you are unable to report for work as a result of accident, illness or for any other reason, you must call your supervisor, or the Night Foreman, when applicable, as early as possible and give the reason for the absence, the expected duration of the absence, and any other information the supervisor may need to plan for coverage for your vacant shift.
> 2. If you are unable to contact your supervisor or the Night Foreman, you may contact the Employee Relations Department. If you are unable to contact any of these, you must leave a number where you may be reached.
> 3. You should personally report your absence unless you are physically unable to do so. If you are unable to make the call yourself, your spouse or other family member may call for you following the procedure outlined in 1. and 2. above.
> 4. Failure to report an absence, or failure to properly notify supervision, will result in the absence being considered as AWOL.

At the inception of the various illnesses of the six employees here under consideration, they abided by the reporting of absence procedures as outlined in the above-quoted memorandum, which is Respondent's Exhibit 1. There is no showing regarding a frequency of reporting requirement being imposed by the supervisors or other individuals to whom the initial reports were given.

The argument that the negotiation of accident and sickness benefits into the agreement permitted obviating such terms of the provision in the benefit plan[14] is unpersuasive. The rules governing the plan provide:

> 4. Illness or accident occurring when an employee is not on duty will not serve to disqualify such employee for benefits under this plan except where such illness or accident occurs while he or she is on leave of absence granted for military service or leave of absence granted for personal business or layoff or vacation.
> 12. This plan is entirely voluntary on the part of the Company and benefits hereunder shall not be subject to assignment, garnishment, attachment, or execution. Neither shall this Plan be construed to give any employee the right to be retained in the service of the Company or entitle him or her to benefits hereunder after his or her separation from service.
> 13. In the application of this Plan, the records of the Company shall be conclusive in determining an employee's length of service, salary, and wages.
> 14. The decision of the Company shall be final and conclusive with respect to every question which may arise relating to either the interpretation or administration of this Plan.

All employees are covered by the plan, and the rules do not create special exceptions for strikes or strikers.

That the Union agreed to article VIII, section 2, of the applicable agreement prior to seeking reopening of the contract does not denote an express waiver of employee rights to accident and sickness benefits. That section of the contract provides that the accident and sickness benefit plan is incorporated "and made a part of this Agreement subject to all the provisions of the Plans which we will determine all the questions arising under it in connection with the Plans, except that the Company agrees it will not voluntarily discontinue, change or modify such Plans during the term of this Agreement in such a way as to decrease the benefits under said Plans to any employee covered by this Agreement."

The Company's position that this provision is a waiver of employees' rights because the protections of the agreement were abrogated by the request for reopening and the strike pursuant to the reopener clause is unpersuasive. It is well established that any waiver of rights protected by Section 7 of the Act must be clearly and explicitly expressed. And there was no showing that such clear explicit expression had been agreed to by the Union. The Company acknowledges that, if any of the six employees involved herein called the Company and disavowed the strike, the entitlement to benefits may have been preserved. The Emerson Electric decision expressly discontinued this requirement which Respondent now seeks to reinstitute.

It is further found that the Company's argument that the failure of the employees to keep the Company informed as to their status on disability was in contravention of company policy, that the company policy was a proper requirement that the Union bargained away, and that the failure to meet this bargained-away requirement made it a matter of the Company's right to terminate the accident and sickness benefits and to refuse to pay them after the failure to declare they were disabled at the commencement of the strike is unpersuasive. As previously indicated, the company policy does not clearly describe the frequency of such reporting but does state that such reporting is necessary for coverage of vacant shifts. During the strike, the need for continued reporting may have been obviated under the provisions of section 1 of the notice posted by the Company and the fact that the Company has not established a clearly expressed procedure for notifying the Company in the event of a continuing absence in any or all of the cases here under consideration, it cannot be assumed that in each of the cases here involved the employee failed to comply with the company policy. In this proceeding, it was shown that all six employees totally qualified to receive accident and sickness benefits. There was no clear showing that there is a set procedure for the retention of eligibility in the event of a strike under the reporting of absence policy or otherwise, that was explicitly violated by all or any of the six employees whose benefits were terminated.

In fact, the Company did not choose to suspend the accident and sickness benefit plan as to all employees, as previously indicated; it terminated the accident and sickness benefit plan only to those employees whose injuries were not industrial injuries. As a practical matter, the decision in Emerson Electric does not prevent the Company, as indicated in the contract, from terminating accident and sickness benefits during the strike.[15] The Board's decision, rather, requires the Company to follow a certain procedure to insure the protection of Section 7 rights prior to making the determination regarding the individual employees' qualification for these benefits. According to the testimony of Floyd M. Chaney, the Company made its decision to terminate the benefits to the six employees predicated upon the assumption that the employees supported the strike. It was this basis for the termination of a particular employee's benefits, i.e., the assumption that they supported the strike, that was found objectionable in the Emerson Electric decision.

Respondent also argues that to require the Company to continue paying the strikers accident and sickness benefits would require the Company to finance the strike. This argument is not persuasive because Emerson Electric only requires the Company to ascertain if the employees receiving accident and sickness benefits do, in fact, support the strike. The fact that the Company could pick and choose whom it wishes to retain as beneficiaries under the accident and sickness benefit plan as indicated by its statement made January 8 that it would continue paying a certain class of employee beneficiaries demonstrates that it could similarly ascertain which employees were in fact supporters of the strike rather than assuming that all employees did, in fact, support the strike. The failure to ascertain what the employees' positions were with regard to the strike, cojoined with Chaney's admission that if an individual wished to return to work he would permit them to return to work, and considering that these employees could not be considered willfully withholding services while deemed medically unable to work, or until they publicly demonstrated support for the strike, leads to the imposing of sanctions because other employees in the unit went out on strike, an action found violative of the Act in the Emerson Electric decision. Inasmuch as the Emerson Electric and Southwestern Electric cases found the employees have a Section 7 right to refrain from revealing their strike sympathies when sick or disabled, there must be a clear, unmistakable, and unequivocal waiver of such right to refrain from revealing their sympathies. See, for example, Keller-Crescent Company, a Division of Mosler, 217 NLRB 685 (1975), enforcement denied 538 F.2d 1291 (7th Cir. 1976).

That Respondent indicated that the Union may discipline a member if they acted to hinder a strike does not, even absent a union-security provision in the collective-bargaining agreement, infer that the employees who join the Union did so voluntarily and, therefore, were inferentially in support of the strike. The Board, in the Emerson Electric decision, specifically overruled this reasoning in the Southwestern Electric Power Company decision. As then Chairman Fanning noted in his dissent in the above-quoted portion, "it is a far cry for this Board to require that they disavow legal strike action by their union during their sick leave in order to receive their sick pay." For that reason, the Board, in Emerson Electric, supra, requires the employer to first acquire information indicative of the employees' public support for the strike prior to the termination of sickness and disability benefits.

[15] As provided in art. XV of the agreement, "should the union exercise its right to strike as provided under 2(b) above, all obligations imposed upon the parties to this Labor Agreement will be suspended with the commencement of such strike and shall continue to be suspended, unless and until it is mutually agreeable to both parties to reimpose said obligations."

The argument by Respondent that the history of 100-percent support of the membership previously in other strikes of the bargaining unit's decision to strike, cojoined with the admission by the six employees involved herein that they would have honored the picket line had they not been sick or disabled, and the fact that work was available but these employees did not seek it, does not modify or abrogate the requirements of Emerson Electric.[16] As indicated above, the violation of the Act as found in Emerson Electric is the termination of accident and sickness benefits to employees who were found to be unable to work at the commencement of the strike because other employees actively struck based upon the determination that the employees whose benefits were terminated were assumed to have ratified or supported the strike. This assumption, as admitted in the record, violates the employees' Section 7 rights to refrain from announcing their position with regard to a strike. For the above reasons, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discontinuing sickness and disability benefits for the six employees from January 8 to the dates set forth above.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, found to constitute unfair labor practices, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union and its Local No. 2-230 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by informing employees that it was withholding payment of sickness and disability and occupational illness and injury benefits during a strike, and withholding such payments from the employees named below in "The Remedy" section of this Decision for periods when these employees were not participants in the strike.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it will be recommended that Respondent be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

It having been found that Respondent unlawfully withheld sickness disability, occupational illness, and injury benefit payments from the six employees listed during a strike at times when they were not strike participants, these employees should be reimbursed for benefits lost under these plans from January 8, 1980, the date the strike began, when these benefit payments were discontinued, until the dates shown next to the names of the respective employees: Peter J. Gottfried, February 11, 1980; Michael L. Wergin, February 21, 1980; William B. Noell, March 24, 1980; James T. Lake, January 13, 1980; Robert G. Ravert, March 24, 1980; and John Vin, Undetermined.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[17]

The Respondent, Texaco Oil Company, Casper, Wyoming, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Withholding or announcing the withholding of sickness, disability, occupational illness, and injury benefits from employees during a strike for the purpose of coercing them or other employees in the exercise of their rights to belong to a union and engage in other protected concerted activities.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Make whole the employees listed in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy," in the manner set forth therein, by paying to each whatever sickness and disability or occupational illness and injury benefits were due them during the period January 8, 1980, to April 1, 1980, with interest, provided that no such payment shall be due for the periods subsequent to any employee's active participation in strike activity or public support thereof.

[16] Respondent argues that certain representations by the Union should be binding on the employees on sickness and disability leave including the fact that they did not protest the termination of the payments and that the six employees were scheduled for picket duty. These arguments overlook the fact that the Union, in its failure to protest, cannot be construed as explicitly waiving any rights and the fact that the Union scheduled the six employees in question for picket duty was done at a time preceding their ascertaining who was on sickness and disability at the time of the strike but was done weeks preceding the strike. This argument also overlooks the uncontroverted testimony that once it was learned that an employee in the unit was considered disabled or sick, or otherwise unable to work, the employee was explicitly not scheduled for picket duty nor was he required to engage in picket duty because such requirement was considered too dangerous for his safety, and the medical determination of his disability or sickness was to be respected and was, in fact, respected by the Union.

[17] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Preserve and make available to the Board or its agents, upon request, all records necessary to analyze the amount due in the effectuation of this remedial order.

(c) Post at the Respondent's place of business in Casper, Wyoming, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[18] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 27, after being duly signed by its representatives, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by it to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 27, in writing, within 20 days from the date of Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

> WE WILL NOT withhold or announce that we will withhold payment of sickness and disability and occupational illness and injury benefits from you during a strike to discourage you or our other employees from belonging to a union or from engaging in other protected concerted activities.
> WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

WE WILL make the following employees whole, with interest, for sickness and disability or occupational illness and injury benefit payments due them from the time such payments were withheld until their recovery and active participation in strike activity or the resumption of benefit payments, whichever is earlier:

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On September 15, 1980, Administrative Law Judge Norman Zankel issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith.

The facts, as more fully set forth by the Administrative Law Judge, show that Respondent hired Lawrence Thomas as a die-cast machine operator in October 1978. In March 1979, Thomas was the leader of a brief work stoppage. In addition. Thomas openly distributed union literature at Respondent's plant. Throughout the spring and early summer of 1979, Thomas requested a transfer to the die maintenance department. Respondent granted Thomas' request and transferred him in July 1979. Respondent laid off Thomas on November 27, 1979. The layoff occurred only 1 day after Thomas engaged in protected activity by again distributing leaflets to Respondent's employees.

In Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), the Board stated that in 8(a)(3) discharge cases the General Counsel must first "make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a 'motivating factor' in the employer's decision" and "[o]nce this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct."

Here, the evidence produced by the General Counsel, and cited by the Administrative Law Judge, warrants an inference that Thomas' protected conduct caused his discharge. Thus, Thomas' open union activity, the precipitous nature of the layoff, and Respondent's earlier unlawful conduct lend support to establishing the General Counsel's prima facie case. Nonetheless, we find that Respondent rebutted the General Counsel's evidence and met its burden, under Wright Line, of demonstrating that the layoff would have occurred even absent Thomas' protected conduct. As recited more fully by the Administrative Law Judge, Respondent, in support of its economic defense, clearly established that: (1) Thomas received a requested transfer subsequent to his protected activities in March 1979; (2) the first shift in the die maintenance department where Thomas worked had regularly been staffed by one employee who was senior to Thomas; (3) there was a need for a layoff in die maintenance and Respondent, since June 1979, had been laying off employees. In fact, Thomas was only 1 of 33 employees laid off during Respondent's reduction of its production and maintenance work force; (4) the layoff was made in conformity with preexisting and customary standards; and (5) no one was hired to replace Thomas.[2]

The Administrative Law Judge concluded that "the sum of Respondent's economic evidence is impressive." Nevertheless, the Administrative Law Judge concluded that Respondent's asserted defense was "pretextual."

In Limestone Apparel Corp., 255 NLRB 722 (1981), we noted that "a finding of pretext necessarily means that the reasons of the employer either did not exist or were not in fact relied upon, thereby leaving intact the inference of wrongful motive established by the General Counsel."

Here, it is beyond dispute that Respondent's proffered economic reasons for the layoff, in fact, existed. Indeed, the Administrative Law Judge stated that "[t]he evidence establishes the need for a layoff in die maintenance." As noted, Respondent presented compellng and substantial evidence that economic conditions forced a significant cutback in its production and maintenance work force.[3]

Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, we cannot conclude that the economic reasons were not relied upon by Respondent in deciding to lay off Thomas. Neither specific evidence adduced by

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] Later, in April 1980, a promotion created a vacancy in the die maintenance department. The parties stipulated that Thomas, in April 1980, received a bona fide, unconditional offer of reinstatement, which he declined.

[3] Before Thomas' transfer, the die maintenance department was staffed by one worker per shift. At the time of the transfer, the department had a backlog in its work. However, when Thomas' layoff occurred, the backlog had diminished. Richard Courtois, the senior die maintenance employee who worked with Thomas on the first shift, confirmed that it was "not busy at all" in the die maintenance department at the time of Thomas' layoff.

the General Counsel[4] nor the record as a whole warrants a finding that Respondent's economic reasons were not genuine and served only to mask Respondent's antiunion reasons. Respondent specifically established the need for a layoff in the die maintenance department—where Thomas was the least senior and least experienced employee.

Further, as previously noted, Thomas engaged in substantial protected activities in March 1979. Additionally, though not specifically alluded to by the Administrative Law Judge, Thomas' leafletting of November 26 did not constitute the first time he enaged in such activity. Rather, Thomas acknowledged that, after March 1979, he had leafletted and posted union notices on six or seven occasions at Respondent's gate as well as in the shop. However, his employment was not adversely affected by his earlier protected activities and, in fact, he subsequently received the transfer he had requested. This factor, to an extent, undercuts the General Counsel's contention that Respondent was motivated by antipathy to Thomas' protected activities, and bolsters Respondent's economic defense.

The General Counsel has the burden of proving, by a preponderance of the credited evidence, that a respondent acted on the basis of improper motivation in disciplining or discharging an alleged discriminatee. In light of Respondent's unrebutted showing that legitimate business considerations caused it to lay off Thomas, the General Counsel failed to carry the burden of proof, and thus the complaint must be dismissed as to the alleged 8(a)(3) violation in the layoff of Thomas.[5]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Magnesium Casting Company, Inc., Hyde Park, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Delete paragraph 1(a), reletter subsequent paragraphs accordingly, and substitute the following for paragraph 1(c):

"(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

2. Delete paragraphs 2(a) and (b), and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

Accordingly, we give you these assurances:

WE WILL NOT tell you to keep a low profile regarding the exercise of any of the rights described above.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce any of you because you engage, or refuse to engage, in any of the protected activities described at the top of this notice.

MAGNESIUM CASTING COMPANY, INC.

DECISION

NORMAN ZANKEL, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me on June 24 and 25, 1980 in Boston, Massachusetts.

Upon a charge filed on November 29, 1979,[1] by United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE) Local 262 (the Union), Robert S. Fuchs, Regional Director for Region 1 of the National Labor Relations Board, issued a complaint and notice of hearing on January 18, 1980, against Magnesium Casting Company, Inc. (Respondent).[2]

[4] Unlike the Administrative Law Judge, we find no basis in the record for concluding that Respondent's reasons for selecting November 27 as the date for Thomas' layoff were "unconvincing." The Administrative Law Judge surmised that Respondent's permitting the need for layoff in die maintenance to become "critical" would demonstrate a lack of "business acumen" by Respondent's officials. However, it was not shown that Thomas' layoff was decided upon or implemented in a fashion or manner different from Respondent's other numerous layoffs. We would not—on the basis that it showed a lack of "business acumen"—question the date selected by Respondent for the layoff.

[5] We will also substitute a narrow cease-and-desist order for the broad one in the recommended Order (see Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979)), and will conform the notice accordingly.

The complaint alleges that Respondent engaged in violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act). Specifically, it is alleged that Respondent interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees by warning an employee, Lawrence Thomas, to keep a "low profile" in his union activities, and discriminatorily laid off Thomas on November 27.

Respondent filed a timely answer to the complaint. The answer admitted certain matters but denied the substantive allegations and that Respondent committed any unfair labor practice.

All parties appeared at the hearing. Each was represented by counsel and was afforded full opportunity to be heard, to introduce and meet material evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to present oral argument, and to file briefs. I have carefully considered the contents of the briefs filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondent.

Upon consideration of the entire record and the briefs, and my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Massachusetts corporation, maintained its principal office and place of business in Hyde Park, Massachusetts, at all material times. At that location, Respondent, at all material times, has been engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of castings, electrical fixtures, and related products.

In the course of its business, Respondent caused large quantities of metal used by it in its manufacturing process to be purchased and transported in interstate commerce from and through various States of the United States other than Massachusetts. During the calendar year immediately preceding issuance of the complaint, Respondent derived gross revenue in excess of $50,000 from the sales of castings, electrical fixtures and related products which it manufactured.[3]

Respondent admits, the record reflects, and I find it is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The parties agree, the record reflects, and I find the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Thomas began working for Respondent on October 2, 1978. He worked continuously until November 27, 1979. On the latter date, Thomas was laid off.

Thomas worked as a die-cast machine operator until July 1979. He was then transferred, at his request, to a die maintenance job.

As a die-cast machine operator, Thomas was paid $4.69 per hour, plus an incentive rate of 125 percent. He received a $5-per-hour wage rate upon transfer. Thomas' wage rate was $5.43 per hour at the time of his layoff.

There is a distinction between die-cast maintenance and die maintenance. The former involves operation of die-cast machines. The latter job requires an employee to work on the dies which are placed into the die-cast machines. Thus, die maintenance work includes such functions as changing, repairing, painting, cleaning, and storing dies.

For at least 2 years before the incidents herein, only one or two employees regularly had been assigned to work in the die maintenance department. In February, a third employee, Gartman, was added to that department. Gartman worked in that department until the week ending July 22. Gartman then quit.

Throughout the spring and early summer, Thomas made several requests of Respondent's personnel manager, Ray Nichols, for transfer into die maintenance. Thomas was transferred to replace Gartman.

In March, Thomas was a leader of a brief work stoppage of the die-cast maintenance employees. Those employees stopped working to protest a change in Respondent's computation of the incentive rate and elimination of relief personnel. Thomas was a spokesman for the employees who stopped work. He met with Die-Cast Manager Mal Emack to discuss the problems.

On January 5, 1978, a Board complaint issued against Respondent. The complaint alleges Respondent had engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), (4), and (5) of the Act. A hearing was conducted by Administrative Law Judge Abraham Frank. On November 20, 1979, Administrative Law Judge Frank issued his decision. Respondent was found to have violated the Act by engaging in unlawful interrogation; threatening employees with plant closure, discharge, and other economic reprisals; creating impressions that employees' union activities were under surveillance by Respondent; suggesting to employees that they testify in Respondent's interest at a Board proceeding; threatening employees with severe punishment if they attended a Board hearing; coercively directing employees not to sign union authorization cards; soliciting employees not to sign union cards or attend union meetings; promising economic benefits contingent on defeat of the Union's organizational efforts; promulgating and maintaining an unlawful no-solicitation-distribution rule and discriminatorily implementing it; discriminatorily discharging two leading union adherents one of whom was the principal initiator of union activity; discriminatorily suspending employees; discriminatorily giving employees less remunerative work; and denying them overtime.

[2] The caption of an earlier case (250 NLRB 692 (1980)) bears the designation "Inc." in the employer's name. The pleadings in the instant case omit the corporate reference. Nonetheless, Respondent herein clearly is the same party as respondent in the matter decided by the Board. Assuming the earlier case caption more directly identifies Respondent, I hereby amend the name of Respondent in the instant case to read "Magnesium Casting Company, Inc."

Administrative Law Judge Frank's findings and conclusions have been affirmed by the Board.[4] Thus, the Board issued a cease-and-desist order addressed to the above violations and provided a remedy for the various instances of discriminatory conduct. Additionally, the Board ordered Respondent to recognize and bargain with the Union as exclusive representative of Respondent's production and maintenance employees. Further, the Board issued a broad proscriptive cease-and-desist order.

On November 26, Thomas, two union organizers and Leonard Lamkin distributed leaflets to employees coming to work.[5] Those leaflets announced the issuance of Administrative Law Judge Frank's decision.

Thomas testified that Plant Manager Harry C. Thornton drove by the gate during Thomas' leafleting activity on November 26. Thornton testified he did not recall seeing Thomas at the gate that day. This testimonial conflict needs no resolution. The testimony of Union Organizer Philip Mamber remains uncontradicted that Thornton and other supervisors passed through the gate when Thomas was engaged in distributing the Union's literature. Mamber's testimony is that he saw Supervisors Gangini and Herb Davis, in addition to Thornton at the gate that morning. There is evidence that Thomas met and spoke with Mamber at various times at the gate since March. Thomas solicited other employees' signatures on union authorization cards. However, that activity was negligible. He testified he signed up only three or four employees. (The Union's organizing campaign took place in 1977. See 250 NLRB 692.) This was before Thomas began to work for Respondent. Nonetheless, Thomas was outspoken at departmental meetings in his pursuit of improved safety, health, and wage issues. Nichols presided at those meetings.

B. Interference, Restraint, and Coercion

1. Facts[6]

It is alleged that, sometime in June, Nichols interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees by telling an employee he should keep a low profile regarding his union activities.

This allegation emanates from one of the conversations between Thomas and Nichols during which they discussed the possibility of Thomas' transfer. Specifically, Thomas testified that he and Nichols discussed those possibilities sometime in June. According to Thomas, Nichols told Thomas that transfer possibilities were good, but Thornton and Emack had reservations about Thomas being a troublemaker. Thomas asserted Nichols said, "[I]t would be in his [Thomas'] best interest if he [Thomas] were to keep a low profile regarding union activities." Further, Thomas testified Nichols said he would deny making such a statement. Finally, Thomas claimed Nichols explained the term "troublemaker" referred to Thomas' various conversations with Mamber at the plant gate.

Nichols testified he spoke with Thomas in June concerning the transfer. Nichols appeared as a witness on behalf of Respondent. He recalled speaking with Thomas in June concerning the transfer. The complete text of Nichols' testimony regarding the alleged unlawful comment follows:

> Q. (By Mr. Corcoran): Did you ever tell Mr. Thomas that the possibility for a transfer looked good but that Emack and Thornton had reservations about moving a troublemaker into die maintenance and that it was in Thomas' best interest to keep a low profile regarding union activities?
> A. Not really. Nobody's ever mentioned anything about being a troublemaker. He [Thomas] was never known as a troublemaker. [Emphasis supplied.]
> Q. Did you ever say that to Mr.—[Emphasis supplied].
> A. No, I didn't.
> Q. And you never told Mr. Thomas that you deny ever having said that? [Emphasis supplied.]
> A. No.

I credit Thomas. His account of the June conversation was direct, forthright, comprehensive, and inherently consistent. He narrated the substance of that conversation with ease and in response to the general question, "[W]hat happened next and when?" Regarding credibility, Thomas' response to my question about the subject conversation was impressive. Specifically, I asked whether Thomas had responded to Nichols' alleged unlawful motivation. Thomas answered he told Nichols that "as long as I did my job I had the right to associate with whatever people I wanted to and get involved in whatever kind of activities I felt was important to do." I consider this response entirely consistent with Thomas' description of what was said by Nichols. It bears the mark of probity. Clearly, Thomas is a vigorous union proponent. The response he claimed he gave Nichols may be expected from one whose union advocacy has been challenged. Moreover, Nichols, who testified after Thomas, was not asked to deny that Thomas responded to the alleged unlawful remark or to give a different version of Thomas' response. Thus, Thomas' account is uncontradicted.

[4] 250 NLRB 692. At the hearing, I denied the General Counsel's request that I take official notice of Administrative Law Judge Frank's decision. On July 17, 1980, after the instant hearing closed, the Board issued its Decision and Order upon Administrative Law Judge Frank's decision. In her post-hearing brief, counsel for the General Counsel renewed her former requests. It is now proper for me to take official notice of the prior case. Delchamps, Inc., 234 NLRB 262 (1978); West Point Manufacturing Company, Wellington Mill Division, 142 NLRB 1161, fn. 3 (1963); Plant City Welding and Tank Company, 123 NLRB 1146, 1150 (1959).

[5] Judge Frank found Lamkin was "the employee primarily responsible for initiating the Union's organizational drive." The Board adopted Administrative Law Judge Frank's conclusion that Lamkin had been discriminatorily discharged. Thus, the Board ordered that Lamkin (among others) be offered immediate and full reinstatement and be made whole for all losses incurred as a result of the discriminatory discharge.

[6] The recitation of facts relevant to the allegations of independent 8(a)(1) violations and those pertaining to Thomas' alleged discriminatory layoff are a composite of factual stipulations, unrefuted oral testimony, supporting documents and other undisputed evidence. For the sake of brevity, only those facts deemed material are set forth. Not every bit of evidence is discussed. Nonetheless, I have considered all of it together with all arguments of counsel. Omitted matter is considered irrelevant or superfluous.

I find Nichols vague, equivocal, and selective in his testimony of the June conversation with Thomas. Thus, as the above transcript abstract shows, Nichols answered "not really" to a multifaceted question regarding the conversation. Nichols' response then only was directed toward whether he made reference to Thomas as a troublemaker. Next, Respondent's counsel asked, "Did you ever say that to Mr.—"(Emphasis supplied.) Nichols' reply, "No, I didn't," is rendered meaningless because he prevented counsel from completing the question by interrupting him and because the ambiguity appearing by virtue of the italicized word creates uncertainty as to just what it is that Nichols sought to deny. Finally, Nichols ended his testimony of the conversation with a plain self-serving denial. Even the final denial was in response to a rather ambiguous question.

In its totality, Nichols' testimony of the subject conversation falls short of controverting the more lucid and straightforward version of Thomas. Indeed, careful scrutiny of Nichols' account shows he did not explicitly deny he made the alleged "low profile" comment.

In crediting Thomas over Nichols, I am not unmindful of evidence tending to show discrepancies in Thomas' testimony. Most noteworthy is Thomas' initial assertion that the only time he distributed leaflets at Respondent's gate was on November 26. During Thomas' cross-examination, he conceded his pretrial affidavit reflects he had engaged in such distribution "on six or seven occasions . . . since March. . . ." I consider this testimonial variation of slight value. It does not detract from Thomas' overall credibility. A trier of fact is not required to believe the entirety of a witness' testimony. Maximum Precision Metal Products, Inc., Renault Stamping Ltd., 236 NLRB 1417 (1978). The stark specific differences in the respective presentations of Thomas and Nichols regarding the June conversation is the more accurate indicator of the relative veracity of those witnesses.

Finally, I find it plausible and likely that Nichols made the remarks attributed to him. The June conversation centered around Thomas' previous transfer requests. At the time of the conversation, Gartman, whom Thomas replaced, was still employed. Thus, whether Thomas would be transferred was still in doubt. During cross-examination, Nichols was asked whether he saw Thomas at the gate speaking with Mamber. Nichols answered, "There's a very good possibility, yes." All these circumstances make it probable Nichols would have counseled Thomas in the manner asserted by the General Counsel. Nichols virtually admitted knowledge of, and concern for, Thomas' association with Mamber. This conclusion is enhanced by reference to the Board decision of which I have taken official notice. In the earlier case, Nichols was found to have unlawfully created an impression that the employees' union activities were under surveillance. Though not dispositive of the issue, I consider Nichols' previous unlawful conduct a relevant factor in assessing his conduct herein. The Board left undisputed Administrative Law Judge Frank's conclusion that Nichols promoted Respondent's course of conduct which was held by the Board to be egregious. Such predisposition indicates that Nichols, subjectively, understood that vigorous pursuit of union activities by employees might hinder their employment opportunities. In this context, it is logical that he would have cautioned Thomas in the manner depicted by Thomas.

Upon all the foregoing, I find that, sometime in June, Nichols told Thomas he should keep a low profile regarding his union activities.

2. Analysis

The question presented by the independent 8(a)(1) allegation is whether Nichols' remark reasonably tends to have a proscribed effect. Hanes Hosiery, Inc., 219 NLRB 338 (1975); Impact Die Casting Corporation, 199 NLRB 268, 271 (1972). Thomas' response to Nichols reflects he was unshaken by what Nichols said. However, Thomas' reaction is irrelevant. El Rancho Market, 235 NLRB 468, 471 (1978).

I conclude Nichols' words impart fear that Thomas might not be granted his requested transfer because he was active on behalf of the Union. The clear implication of Nichols' comment is that continued union activities by Thomas would prevent or impede his transfer. In Fetzer Broadcasting Company, 227 NLRB 1377, 1380 (1977), an employer was held to have violated Section 8(a)(1) when its plant manager warned nonstriking employees they "would just be jeopardizing [themselves]" by associating with strikers or pickets. Herein, Nichols issued an analogous warning. In effect, he was warning Thomas his transfer request was in jeopardy because of his union activities. The evidence shows that, at that time, Nichols knew Thomas' union activities consisted of association with Mamber at Respondent's gate. Thus, it is virtually inescapable that Nichols' words connote a fear and apprehension that continued union activity could be detrimental to Thomas' request for transfer. Nichols' status as a supervisor and agent of Respondent is undisputed. Accordingly, his activities are imputable to Respondent.

Upon the foregoing, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by Nichols' telling Thomas, sometime in June, he should keep a low profile regarding his union activities.

C. Thomas' Layoff

1. Facts

During the morning of November 27, Emack walked through the die maintenance department. Thomas and employee Richard Courtois, Sr., were present. Courtois had been in Respondent's employ for 26 years. He had been a die maintenance employee for the past 19 years. Since his transfer into die maintenance, Thomas was being trained by Courtois.

While in the die maintenance department, Emack remarked die maintenance employees were not busy and there was not enough work to do.

After lunch on November 27, Thomas was called into Emack's office. There, Emack told Thomas he was laid off. Thomas testified, without contradiction, he asked Emack if he could work the remainder of that week. According to Thomas, Emack rejected that suggestion. Thomas testified that Emack, instead, said his terminal checks had already been prepared. Emack indicated Thomas could leave the premises immediately, but would be paid for a full day's work.

Respondent's records reveal the existence of a heavy backlog of die maintenance work in July. As noted, Gartman quit his die maintenance job during that month. Undisputedly, Thomas had been a competent worker. His transfer request was outstanding. Apparently, the combination of these factors resulted in his transfer to the die maintenance department.

Before Thomas' transfer, Respondent began to reduce its work force. Thus, between May and November 27, the total employee complement in the production and maintenance unit was reduced from 246 to 158 employees. Thirty-three employees had been laid off between June 28 and November 27.

The amount of work required in the die maintenance department is directly proportional to that available in the die-cast department. From May through November there was a steady decline in die-cast man-hours worked. During that time, those man-hours were reduced from 1,776 per week to 717 man-hours per week.

Concurrently, the number of hours the die-cast machines were operating was reduced. Those hours were reduced to less than 600 per week from 931 hours during the week ending May 6. They sharply dropped from an average of 851 hours per week in May, to 802 hours per week in June, to 735 hours per week in July, to 623 hours per week in August, to 615 hours per week in September, to 543 hours per week in October, and to 471 hours per week in November.

On October 12, seven die-cast machine operators were laid off. At that time, a backlog of die maintenance work existed. Courtois and Thomas worked in die maintenance on the first shift. Keith Mohammed worked in die maintenance on the second shift. Courtois' seniority was the greatest. Next, came Mohammed.[7]

Thornton testified he knew of the slowdown in die-cast operations. Thornton regularly monitored Respondent's inventory. Based on his observations, Thornton "recommended" to his supervisors and departmental managers that they effectuate an increase or decrease in production. It was left to the subordinate managerial officials to implement Thornton's recommendations in the way most appropriate to them.

According to Thornton, it was not until November 26 that he personally saw the full extent of the reduction in die maintenance backlog. Thornton testified the reduction was at "a critical stage." On that date, Thornton instructed Emack to reduce the overhead in die maintenance. There is no direct evidence that Thornton specifically directed Emack on the way this should be done.

Emack made the decision to lay off Thomas. Emack testified that layoffs are made on seniority when all other factors are equal. In essence, Emack's determination who should be laid off are based on his personal judgment of overall competence of the employees. He engages in no prescribed review of records. Thus, Emack testified, "I have a pretty good idea of who the best man is."

Emack decided to lay off Thomas after consideration of abilities and length of employment of the employees in die maintenance. He particularly used the following factors as to Thomas: (a) the greater departmental seniority of both Courtois and Mohammed, (b) the fact Mohammed was the sole second-shift die maintenance employee, and (c) the fact Thomas was still in the learning stages of die maintenance work and functioned as Courtois' helper. Emack testified a review of these elements made Thomas "the logical man to go."

The record reflects Thomas had not been replaced. Only Courtois and Mohammed worked in die maintenance after Thomas' layoff until April 1980. Then, Mohammed was promoted to foreman in die-cast maintenance. Thomas was then offered reinstatement to replace Mohammed. Thomas declined. Since then, Courtois remained the only die maintenance employee.

2. Analysis

Respondent contends Thomas was laid off solely due to lack of die maintenance work. The General Counsel claims the asserted reason for the layoff is pretextual. Resolution of these positions is governed by the following applicable legal principles.

The General Counsel must prove certain elements to establish a prima facie case of discrimination. Those elements are that (1) the affected employee had engaged in activity protected by the Act, (2) the Employer had knowledge of that activity, (3) the adverse personnel action imposed upon the employee was motivated by union animus, and (4) that the discipline had the effect of encouraging or discouraging membership in a labor organization. The General Counsel has the burden of proving his case by a preponderance of the evidence. Gonic Manufacturing Company, Division of Hampshire Woolen Company, 141 NLRB 201, 209 (1963).

The 8(a)(1) violations support findings of unlawful motivation. I have found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) when Nichols told Thomas to keep a low profile in his union activities. Assuming I am in error in that finding, 8(a)(1) violations are not necessarily a requirement of an 8(a)(3) finding. "Actual motive, a state of mind, being the question, it is seldom that direct evidence will be available that is not also self-serving. In such case . . . the trier of fact may infer motive from the total circumstances proved. . . . If he finds that the stated motive for a discharge is false, he certainly can infer that there is another motive. More than that, he can infer that the motive is one that the employer desires to conceal—at least where . . . the surrounding facts tend to reinforce that inference." Shattuck Denn Mining Corporation (Iron King Branch) v. N.L.R.B., 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966). The Shattuck Denn principle was quoted with approval by the Board in Best Products Company, Inc., 236 NLRB 1024, 1025 (1978).

[7] There is evidence that two other individuals were working in die maintenance on the first shift immediately preceding, and on the day of, Thomas' layoff. I conclude that fact tangential, inasmuch as I credit Respondent's claim they were working there temporarily to set up shelving and their performance of regular die maintenance functions merely was incidental to the reason for the temporary assignment.

Support for a finding of unlawful motivation "is augmented [when] the explanation of the [employer's conduct] offered by the Respondent [does] not stand up under scrutiny." N.L.R.B. v. Bird Mach. Co., 161 F.2d 589, 592 (1st Cir. 1947).

The instant allegation requires me to determine, from the totality of evidence, whether the asserted reason for Thomas' layoff actually motivated it. Signal Delivery Service, Inc., 226 NLRB 843 (1976).

Undeniably, there is ample record evidence Thomas had been engaged in a variety of protected activity. Thus, he was a leader of the walkout in March and a spokesman for other employees, he was vocal regarding working conditions during departmental meetings, and, finally, he engaged in distribution of leaflets on behalf of the Union on November 26. In any event, Respondent does not seriously argue an evidentiary failure of this prima facie element.

Respondent's knowledge of Thomas' protected activity is disputed. Emack and Thornton disclaimed they saw Thomas leafleting on November 26. Thomas and Mamber testified Thornton went through the gate during the leafleting. I credit them. When asked whether he saw Thomas at the gate on November 26, Thornton was equivocal. He responded, "I do not recall seeing him [Thomas] at the gate." There was only one gate to Respondent's plant. Given Respondent's concern over the union activities of its employees manifested by its earlier violations (250 NLRB 692), it is unlikely the leafleting activities of November 26 and the participants in it would have gone unnoticed. Accordingly, I infer Respondent had direct knowledge of Thomas' leafleting activities on November 26.

Assuming, arguendo, Thornton is credited, there is other evidence of Respondent's knowledge. Thus, other supervisors, such as Gangini, passed through the gate during the leafleting. Gangini was Thomas' immediate supervisor. Gangini did not testify at the hearing. In these circumstances, it is reasonable to infer, as I do, that Gangini's testimony would have been adverse to Respondent had he testified. Interstate Circuit, Inc., et al. v. United States, 306 U.S. 208 (1939); Monahan Ford Corporation of Flushing, 173 NLRB 204 (1968); Crow Cravel Co., 168 NLRB 1040, 1047 (1967).

As to knowledge, the parties have focused their arguments on the November 26 activities. However, my conclusions are predicated on the entire record. I cannot isolate Thomas' earlier activities. Accordingly, I further conclude that Nichols' unlawful remark to Thomas in June is additional evidence that Respondent knew of Thomas' union activities. Still further evidence of Thomas' protected activities exists by virtue of Emack's participation in a conversation with Thomas as spokesman for the other employees who walked out in March and also from Thomas' vocal expressions concerning working conditions in Nichols' presence, during departmental meetings.

I conclude that the General Counsel has established the requisite element of antiunion hostility. Two bases are present for this conclusion. First, I have found Nichols' statement that Thomas should keep a low profile a violation of the Act. Second, Administrative Law Judge Frank's decision, approved by the Board in 250 NLRB 692, is replete with evidence of animus. The Board will take official notice of its own prior decisions which involve the same parties and similar issues. Moulton Manufacturing Company, 152 NLRB 196, 207 (1965). Thus, I take official notice the Board has approved Administrative Law Judge Frank's findings. Moreover, the Board agreed with Administrative Law Judge Frank's conclusion the unfair labor practices committed by Respondent warranted a broad cease-and-desist order. There is no evidence in the instant record to show any alteration in Respondent's position regarding union activities of its employees from that exhibited in the cases before Administrative Law Judge Frank.

The General Counsel's claim that Respondent's defense is a pretext poses a close question. Respondent's able counsel adduced considerable evidence in support of Respondent's economic defense. That unrefuted evidence includes impressive elements of proof. Additionally, there are other significant factors which militate in favor of finding merit to Respondent's contentions:

(a) Thus, though Thomas was an employee leader during the March work stoppage, Respondent later granted his transfer request. This reduces the strength of an inference that Respondent was motivated by antipathy toward protected activities.

(b) Historically, the first shift in the die maintenance department regularly was staffed by Courtois as the only employee working there. This fact supports Respondent's claim that no more than one employee was needed during a period of reduced backlog.

(c) The evidence establishes the need for a layoff in die maintenance. Since June, Respondent engaged in a program of staff reduction. The backlog in die maintenance which existed at Thomas' transfer virtually had been diminished. Thomas was only 1 of 33 employees laid off during the implementation of the overall program to reduce the production and maintenance work force. Indeed, the General Counsel concedes the existence of Respondent's premise of staff reduction.

(d) The decision that Thomas would be the employee to be laid off apparently was made in conformity with preexisting and customary standards. Thus, where competency was not in question, seniority governed layoffs. Undeniably, Thomas was both the least senior and experienced die maintenance employee.

(e) No one was hired to replace Thomas. This fact lends support to Respondent's claim that the reduced workload in die maintenance necessitated a layoff.

(f) When Mohammed was promoted, Thomas was offered reinstatement. This fact has some slight impact upon the existence of Respondent's animus.

(g) Respondent was consistent. No attempt has been made to provide a variety (shifting) of reasons for its action against Thomas. At his terminal interview, Thomas was advised by Emack that his layoff was for lack of work. Also, Emack told Thomas he might be recalled if business improved. The documentary evidence (payroll change form) confirms Emack's testimony in this regard. That document contains notations that the layoff was attributed to lack of work and confirms Emack's remark concerning potential for recall.

Viewed in isolation, the sum of Respondent's economic evidence is impressive. It shows the existence of a need to reduce die maintenance overhead. Further, Respondent's evidence shows such a need was dictated by a general decline in Respondent's production requirements. Arguably, then, the layoff in the die maintenance department simply was a continuation of the layoff pattern in progress since May. In these circumstances, the selection of Thomas for layoff could be a natural consequence.

However, the situation does not rest on the foregoing discussion. The validity of the economic defense is not to be determined by such superficial analysis. Thus, Respondent's evidence must be assessed together with that presented by the General Counsel. If such examination reflects the existence of valid business reasons for the layoff but nonetheless reasonably demonstrates that a substantial and motivating ground for Thomas' layoff was his protected activity, the General Counsel should prevail. Dilene Answering Service, Inc., 222 NLRB 462 (1976); KBM Electronics, Inc., t/a Carsounds, 218 NLRB 1352, 1358 (1975); N.L.R.B. v. Whitin Machine Works, 204 F.2d 883, 885 (1st Cir. 1953).

Evaluation of the record, in its totality, persuades me the General Counsel should prevail. In reaching this conclusion, I am particularly influenced by the following considerations:

(1) Thomas' layoff was precipitous. It followed Thomas' November 26 leafleting by only 1 day. Coincidence in protected activity and adverse personnel actions against employees is a strong factor supporting an inference of unlawful motivation. McGraw-Edison Company v. N.L.R.B., 419 F.2d 67 (8th Cir. 1969); N.L.R.B. v. Harry F. Berggren & Sons, Inc., 406 F.2d 239, 245 (8th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 396 U.S. 823.

(2) The reason propounded by Thornton and Emack for selecting November 27 as the layoff date is unconvincing. Each of these managerial officials impressed me as responsible and alert officials. Thus, characteristically, Thornton signified he regularly monitored the production and maintenance workload. He described the situation in the die maintenance department as "critical" on November 26. It is illogical that Thornton permitted the die maintenance department to deteriorate to the deplorable condition he asserted. I find this circumstance contrary to the apparent business acumen otherwise demonstrated by Thornton. It suggests that the asserted discovery of the severe conditions in the die maintenance department on November 26 (the very day of Thomas' leafleting) is a fabrication. Moreover, the failure to grant Thomas' request to complete his workweek is unexplained.

(3) Respondent has not satisfactorily explained why the date of November 27 had been selected for Thomas' layoff. As already noted, I have found it implausible that the die maintenance workload was not more accurately observed before November 26. Respondent's brief asserts that a layoff in that department was "inevitable" since October 12. On this date, several die-cast machine operators had been laid off. In this context, I find there has been no satisfactory explanation for a 6-week delay in effectuating Thomas' layoff.

(4) Respondent displayed an adverse reaction to Thomas' protected activities. Nichols' June "low-profile" remark, found unlawful, reflects Respondent's predisposition to interfere with the exercise of his Section 7 rights. Thomas' first overt exercise of those rights after Nichols made his comment was on November 26. Respondent's reaction was swift. In all the circumstances, I find Nichols' remark interrelated with the layoff.

(5) Respondent has a propensity to violate the Act. The Board's decision in 250 NLRB 692, involving Respondent and the instant Charging Party, may be considered herein. Indeed, I consider it unrealistic to ignore Respondent's past misconduct. I have accorded it some, but not dispositive, weight. Metlox Manufacturing Company, 225 NLRB 1317, 1325 (1976); Tama Meat Packing Corp., 230 NLRB 116 (1977).

(6) Thomas was the only employee currently at work whose union activity was notorious. Mamber was assisted in the November 26 distribution of literature by Thomas and former employee Lamkin. At that time, Administrative Law Judge Frank had declared Respondent violated the Act, in part, by having earlier discharged Lamkin.[8] I consider Thomas' open association with the Union and Lamkin on November 26 somewhat significant in establishing Respondent's true motivation for Thomas' layoff. It is circumstantial evidence which provides some insight to the impetus for Respondent's precipitous conduct.

In sum, I conclude the record sufficiently demonstrates the asserted defense is pretextual. It follows the reason ascribed by Respondent for Thomas' layoff is unlawful. Keller Manufacturing Company, Inc., 237 NLRB 712, 717 (1978) (as to Alice Meyers). Accordingly, I find the record contains a preponderance of evidence to show that Thomas' November 27 layoff was in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

Further, I conclude the consequence of Thomas' layoff reasonably has the proscribed effect of discouraging employee union activity. The layoff, having occurred only 1 day after Thomas distributed union literature, surely signaled to other employees the potential risks of freely expressing union sympathies. This is precisely the inhibiting effect the Act is designed to protect against.

Upon the basis of the above findings of fact and upon the entire record in the case, I make the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when Nichols, its personnel manager, told Thomas, its employee, to keep a low profile regarding his union activities in June 1979.

4. By laying off Lawrence Thomas on November 27, 1979, Respondent discriminated against its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend it cease and desist from engaging in such conduct in the future and affirmatively take such action as will dissipate the effects of its unfair labor practices.

Because Thomas' November 27 layoff has been found unlawful, the Order shall require Respondent to offer him full and immediate reinstatement to his former or substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges; and to make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination by payment of a sum equal to that which he would have earned, absent the discrimination, to the date of Respondent's offer of reinstatement. Loss of earnings shall be computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

As previously noted, the Board (250 NLRB 692) held Respondent engaged in such extensive and egregious unfair labor practices as warranted a broad cease-and-desist order. The events of the earlier cases occurred more than 1 year before those litigated herein. As earlier noted, no evidence was adduced to show Respondent's labor relations posture had changed before Thomas' layoff. Thornton, Emack, and Nichols were all Respondent's supervisors during the earlier ligitated matters. Each was involved, directly or indirectly, in the activities which the Board has held unlawful.

Herein, I have found that Respondent has once again committed an independent 8(a)(1) violation. Also, it has been found Thomas' layoff is another example of Respondent's continued discriminatory treatment of its employees.

The events herein cannot be judged in isolation. I view Thomas' leafleting activity as an extension of the organizational efforts of 1978 as fully described in Administrative Law Judge Frank's decision. That decision was the subject of the leaflet distributed by Thomas.

Herein, there simply is no basis to find Respondent has recanted from its previous strenuous and illegal opposition to its employees' union activity. Indeed, the swift layoff imposed on Thomas reflects the continuing vitality of Respondent's aversion to free exercise of Section 7 rights. As shown hereinabove, Respondent's warning to Thomas and his subsequent layoff are further evidence of its complete disregard for employees' statutory rights. This is especially true when coupled with the Board's determination in 250 NLRB 692.[9] Moreover, the repetitious character of the discriminatory conduct found unlawful in the instant matter punctuates the need to eliminate future recurrences. Accordingly, I conclude it is necessary that the Order herein be coextensive with the degree of past misconduct and the threat of prospective reiteration.

The demonstrated proclivity to violate the Act warrants a broad proscriptive order. Thus, the Order shall require Respondent to refrain from, in any other manner, interfering with, restraining, and coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

Upon the above findings of fact, conclusions of law, the entire record in this case, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[10]

The Respondent, Magnesium Casting Company, Inc., Hyde Park, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discriminating against its employees for engaging in union or other activity protected by the Act.

(b) Telling its employees to keep a low profile regarding their union activities.

(c) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act, except to the extent that such rights might be affected by a lawful union-security agreement in accord with Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which it is found will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer Lawrence Thomas immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position of employment, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges,[11] and make him whole in the manner described above in the section entitled "The Remedy" for any loss of pay or other benefits suffered by reason of his discriminatory layoff on November 27, 1979.

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay and interest due under the terms of this Order.

[11] If it is determined the reinstatement offer made to Thomas upon Mohammed's promotion in April 1980 was bona fide, no additional offer of reinstatement need be made and the backpay hereunder shall be computed in accordance with the Board's procedures in such cases. Similarly, if the reinstatement offer was bona fide the next-to-last paragraph of the notice attached hereto as an Appendix should be deleted and the following paragraph substituted:

> "WE HAVE OFFERED LAWRENCE THOMAS reinstatement to his former or substantially equivalent job with us, without loss of seniority or other rights, privileges and benefits; and we will make him whole, with interest, for all loss of pay and other benefits he suffered as a result of his discriminatory layoff on November 27, 1979."

(c) Post at its Hyde Park, Massachusetts, location copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being duly signed by an authorized representative of Respondent, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 1, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS JENKINS AND HUNTER

On March 16, 1981, Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondents, the General Counsel, and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondents, Puerto Rico Hotel Association; San Juan Hotel Corporation, d/b/a El San Juan Hotel and El Conquistador Hotel; The Puerto Rico Hotel Corporation d/b/a The Palace Hotel; Hilton International Company d/b/a Caribe Hilton Hotel; Condado Holiday Inn; and Hilton International Company d/b/a La Concha Hotel-Condado Beach Hotel, all of San Juan, Puerto Rico, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.[3]

DECISION

JAMES F. MORTON, Administrative Law Judge: These consolidated cases were heard by me between April 21 and May 16, 1980, in San Juan, Puerto Rico.

Based on unfair labor practice charges filed by Federacion de Musicos de Puerto Rico, Local 468, American Federation of Musicians, AFL-CIO (herein called the Union), the amended complaints allege violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (herein called the Act). The principal issue in these cases, precisely stated, is whether the band leaders and the leaders of the smaller groups of musicians who perform in the large hotels in Puerto Rico on a steady engagement basis[1] are supervisors employed by the hotels to direct their musicians-employees or whether these leaders are independent contractors who themselves, and not the hotels, are the employers of these musicians. At the hearing, the parties referred to this issue more concisely as whether the musicians were independent contractors or employees of the hotels. On the premise that the musicians involved have been employees within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act of the respective hotels and have been supervised by leaders who are part of the hotels' management structures, the General Counsel set forth in the consolidated complaint the allegations summarized below. All the Respondents challenge the validity of that premise and urge dismissal of the complaint on the ground that none of the musicians are hotel employees. The other issues and the respective positions of the parties thereon are now discussed. The

[1] The Charging Party and Respondents Hilton International Company d/b/a Caribe Hilton Hotel, and Hilton International Company d/b/a La Concha Hotel-Condado Beach Hotel have excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] For the reasons stated by the Administrative Law Judge in his Decision, we agree that the regular engagement musicians employed by the Respondent hotels are employees of said hotels within the meaning of Sec. 2(3) of the Act, and that the leaders of such musicians are supervisors within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act. In this regard we note the following specific incidents of the exercise of control over the musicians by the hotels which were not specifically noted by the Administrative Law Judge: the granting of "ledger privileges" whereby musicians could obtain food and beverages by signing the check and having the cost deducted from their paychecks; the granting of a 25-percent discount on purchases made by musicians; granting a leave of absence to a musician because of illness; imposing deductions on musicians as a result of absences; and paying for advertisements for musical groups currently performing.

[3] Because of the large number of Spanish-speaking persons employed by the Respondent hotels, we hereby direct that the notices to be posted pursuant hereto be posted in both English and Spanish.

[1] An engagement is said to be "steady" when done for 5 or more days in 1 week or for 2 or more days in each of 2 or more weeks. Anything less is said to be a "single engagement."

259 NLRB No. 58

Union's positions throughout are the same as the General Counsel's.

The General Counsel alleges that Respondent, Puerto Rico Hotel Association (herein called the Respondent Association) in the course of bargaining collectively with the Union vis-a-vis a renewal contract covering the unit of musicians employed on a steady basis by, inter alia, the Caribe Hilton Hotel, the El San Juan Hotel, the El Conquistador Hotel, The Palace Hotel, the Condado Holiday Inn and lastly the La Concha Hotel-Condado Beach Hotel, acted in derogation of the Union's representative status and in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by:

> (a) conditioning further collective bargaining at various times, upon the Union's conceding that the musicians in the unit are not hotel employees,
> (b) suspending bargaining at another point because the Union had filed unfair labor practice charges with the Board's regional office against the Respondent Association,
> (c) changing unilaterally the wording of the recognitional clause of the renewal collective bargaining contract after agreement thereon had been reached, and
> (d) encouraging its member hotels to use types of form contracts when employing musicians so as to make it appear that the musicians are not employees of the respective hotels.

The Respondent Association and its member-hotels contend that, even if it were found that the musicians are employees of the hotels, the 8(a)(1) and (5) allegations of the complaint against the Respondent Association should still be dismissed on the ground that:

> (a) the unit of musicians is inappropriate as historically the group negotiations included all the leaders whom General Counsel would exclude as supervisors and as the leaders also actively participated in the Union's internal affairs.
> (b) the Union never represented an uncoerced majority of musicians because the Union operated a de facto closed shop whereby no musician could perform in any hotel in Puerto Rico unless he first had joined the Union.

The General Counsel further alleges that Respondents El San Juan Hotel, El Conquistador Hotel, and The Palace Hotel, as a single enterprise, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by their untimely withdrawal from the collective bargaining that had been underway between the Respondent Association as their joint bargaining representative and the Union respecting the musicians' unit involved herein and by thereafter refusing to bargain collectively with the Union. These three hotels, by their joint counsel, deny that they ever designated the Respondent Association as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining and thus aver that they never withdrew in an untimely manner from any negotiations.

The General Counsel also contends that Respondents Caribe Hilton Hotel, Condado Holiday Inn, and La Concha Hotel-Condado Beach Hotel, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, executed contracts with leaders of musicians employed respectively by them, which contracts purport to classify those musician employees as employees solely of the leaders who also are purported therein to be "independent contractors."

The General Counsel separately asserts that one of the Respondent hotels, the Caribe Hilton Hotel, also violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by having, through its supervisor, Band Leader Jose Juan Pinero, discharged Pedro Chiclana, a musician in its employ, because of his activities on behalf of the Union and in order to discourage membership in the Union. In addition, Respondent Caribe Hilton Hotel is alleged to have violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by having, through Pinero, (a) threatened musicians to induce them to refrain from supporting the Union, (b) created the impression that their union activities were under surveillance, and (c) engaged in other independent acts, as specified in the consolidated complaint. Respondent Caribe Hilton Hotel avers that Chiclana was never in its employ and seeks dismissal of these allegations on that basis. Alternatively it contends that Pinero's termination of Chiclana's employment was unrelated to any union considerations and that the absence of proof of unlawful discrimination requires dismissal of the allegation involving Section 8(a)(1) and (3). It also seeks dismissal of the allegations of the independent 8(a)(1) violations on the ground that the record evidence does not support any findings of such violations.

I have considered the entire record in these cases,[2] the demeanor of the witnesses at the hearing and the briefs filed by the parties. Based on these considerations, I make the following:

I. THE PARTIES

The Respondent Association was incorporated in 1950 as a nonprofit association to promote the business interests and welfare of hotels in Puerto Rico, to promote legislation on their behalf, to promote tourism, to promulgate matters of interest to persons engaged in the hotel and restaurant business, and to do "any and all things . . . to effect objects." There is no express statement in its articles of incorporation or its bylaws authorizing it to negotiate collective-bargaining agreements for its member hotels.[3] Nevertheless, the General Counsel asserts that the Respondent Association has in fact represented its member hotels in a multiemployer unit in the course of its dealing with the Union over the years as the representative of the musician employees of these hotels. The merits of that contention and the determination as to whether the Respondent Association or any of its member hotels is an employer as defined in Section 2(2) of the Act vis-a-vis the musicians involved in these cases must await a consideration of the relevant evidence, set out below. The hotels involved in these cases each have gross annual revenues exceeding $500,000, principally cater to tourists or commercial guests, and purchase items each year which are valued at more than $50,000 and which are delivered to the respective hotels directly from outside Puerto Rico.

[2] After the hearing had closed and in accordance with the procedure set on the last day of the hearing, counsel for the General Counsel submitted to me a copy of an affidavit sworn to in the course of an earlier case, by the general manager of the El San Juan Hotel. Counsel for the El San Juan Corporation objects to the affidavit being in evidence. That affidavit had at a previous point in the hearing been marked for identification as G.C. Exh. 112 and was offered in evidence then by the General Counsel to insure that the record in this case would contain in its entirety the contents of par. 12 thereof. The General Counsel, however, had immediately thereafter withdrawn G.C. Exh. 112 when it was obvious that the hotel's general manager had just read the whole of that paragraph into the record. I shall sustain the objection as apparently the affidavit is now being offered for a broader purpose than was contemplated when the general manager was available as a witness. G.C. Exh. 112 is being placed in the file containing the rejected exhibits.

Pursuant to the arrangements also established on the last day of the hearing, I shall take administrative notice of secs. 3141 and 3143 of Title 13 of the laws of Puerto Rico and shall receive in evidence copies thereof as G.C. Exh. 138. Further administrative notice will also be taken of secs. 3119 and 3411 and copies thereof are received in evidence as Resp. Assoc. Exh. 60.

The San Juan Hotel Corporation is a corporation organized under the laws of Puerto Rico. It owns and operates the El San Juan Hotel in Carolina, Puerto Rico, and the El Conquistador Hotel in Fajardo, Puerto Rico. The Puerto Rico Hotel Corporation is a corporation formed under the laws of Puerto Rico; it owns and operates The Palace Hotel in Carolina, Puerto Rico. Louis Puro is the principal stockholder of both the San Juan Hotel Corporation and the Puerto Rico Hotel Corporation. These corporations, through Puro, formulate and administer a common labor relations policy and comprise a single business enterprise.

Hilton International Company is a Puerto Rico corporation which owns and operates the Caribe Hilton Hotel in San Juan, Puerto Rico, and also a complex known as the La Concha Hotel-Condado Beach Hotel on Ashford Avenue, San Juan.

Condado Holiday Inn is a corporation organized under the laws of Puerto Rico and it owns and operates a hotel under its corporate name on Ashford Avenue in San Juan.

The Union was founded in 1938 to advance the interests of the professional musicians in Puerto Rico. It affiliated with the International Federation of Musicians, AFL-CIO, in 1951. Respondents challenge its status as a labor organization within the definition of Section 2(5) of the Act based on their view that the musicians are not employees of the hotels and also based on the alleged improper involvement into the Union's internal affairs by the leaders. That issue is discussed and resolved, infra.

II. THE ALLEGED UNLAWFUL REFUSALS TO BARGAIN

A. The Class AA Hotels and Their Use of Musicians

As of the date of the hearing the Respondent Association had about 28 member hotels of which about 9 had gambling casinos. Those 9 have been referred to in the record in this case at various times as Class AA hotels. The General Counsel alleges that the Class AA hotels have bargained collectively through the Respondent Association with the Union. Six of those Class AA hotels are named in the caption above—the Caribe Hilton, El San Juan, El Conquistador, Palace, Condado Holiday Inn, and La Concha-Condado Beach Hotels. The other three Class AA hotels, Dupont Plaza, Cerromar, and Dorado Beach, had been part of this proceeding but they have been severed as parties.

The responsibility for providing food, beverages, and entertainment in the nightclub rooms and lounges of the Class AA hotels belongs to the food and beverage managers of the respective hotels. Each such club room or lounge is directly supervised by a maitre d'. Some hotels refer to the maitre d' as the room manager or the floor manager. In a typical large nightclub room, the maitre d' is assisted by head waiters who in turn oversee the work of the waiters and busboys in that room. The maitre d' also must insure that musical entertainment is provided in his room as required by the contract between the hotel and the musical group engaged to perform there. The maitre d' is responsible for maintaining the ambiance of the room and for insuring that the customers there are promptly and properly served and entertained. In the typical clubroom, an orchestra directed by its leader and comprised of himself and nine other musicians plays soft music as background during the dinner hour. After dinner, a star performer—usually a well-known singer from the mainland United States—appears to entertain. The 10-piece orchestra, with some modifications discussed below, accompanies the performer using sheet music furnished by that performer and plays in the style required by that performer or the performer's manager. After the performer has completed his show, the 10-piece orchestra plays dance music. The maitre d' does not select the music or the musicians and does not monitor their individual performances. Instead, the leader of the group, who is also at times termed the conductor or the director, is the one who directs the musicians, decides the tempo of the music, and the instruments to be played. The maitre d' can ask the leader to lower the volume of the music if, in the judgment of the maitre d', the orchestra is playing too loud and such requests are routinely honored.[4] The matter as to volume surfaces normally during the dinner hour when sometimes patrons have difficulty conversing when the background music is played too loud. The maitre d' can stop the music in order to speed up the service of food and can also send the musicians home before normal quitting time in those situations where virtually all the patrons have left the room. There are also occasions when the start of the show by the star performer may be delayed in order to accommodate a late arriving group of patrons. This could occur when a cruise ship is late in arriving and a large party on that ship is expected in the room. In such an instance, the food and beverage manager will notify the leader that the opening of the show is being delayed and the orchestra continues to play background music until the show is ready to begin. Musicians are compensated in accordance with the contract between the Respondent Association and the Union for any overtime hours they work. Their normal workweek consists of a 6-day, 28-hour week.

[3] A nonprofit organization known as the Metropolitan Hotel Association of Puerto Rico, Inc., was formed in 1960 to foster the best interests of its member hotels (which include the Caribe Hilton, Condado Holiday Inn, and apparently all the other large hotels in Puerto Rico) and "to serve as collective bargaining agent" for its members "with all local unions and groups of employees." The Metropolitan Hotel Association has negotiated contracts for its member hotels involving classifications, e.g., culinary workers, as to which there is no dispute concerning employee status.

[4] A leader testified that he always chooses to honor such requests. He had been asked on cross-examination whether he was free to honor or reject such requests.

The Class AA hotels also have cocktail lounges each under the direction of a maitre d'. There, groups of two or three or sometimes more musicians play. Some of the Class AA hotels also engage musicians to play at a poolside lounge during the daytime. The contracts between the Union and the Respondent Association require Class AA hotels to have a minimum number of musicians as specified therein; e.g., their 1975–78 agreement provided that the Caribe Hilton and five other hotels of comparable size shall each "employ a minimum of (18) eighteen musicians during the entire year." This "guaranteed group" included leaders.

B. The Contractual Arrangements Between the Hotels and the Leaders

Up until the end of the strike on April 30, 1979, as discussed infra, all of the local musicians in Puerto Rico, including leaders, were members of the Union. All other musicians are generally referred to as "travelers" and, except for the five members of the Pat Mills group discussed below, they have been members of sister AFM locals.

The hotels in Puerto Rico routinely used a variation of the printed AFM Form B contract which has blanks to be filled in. In practice in Puerto Rico, those forms have not been filled out meticulously but usually with just enough data to satisfy the signatories; e.g., the group's name, the total amount of their weekly compensation, the date the engagement begins, and sometimes the room where the group is to play.

The total weekly compensation has been referred to at times in the record in this case as "lump sum." That sum is not the total amount of the contract as the term of the contract is for all practical purposes indefinite. In addition, the weekly total does not include compensation for overtime hours worked by the musicians each week or other extra compensation. The total weekly compensation in most cases is calculated according to the formula set out in the contract between the Respondent Association and the Union. This requires that each musician shall be paid a minimum salary for the normal 6-day workweek. That minimum is termed "scale." The leader of each group receives twice the minimum salary or "double scale." Assuming "scale" is $200 and a group is comprised of a quartet, the total weekly compensation excluding overtime and other extras would be $1,000 dollars. The leader of the quartet gets double the scale or $400 and each of the three musicians, called sidemen, receive $200. On occasion the hotels and the musicians will use the services of a booking agent. In those situations, the booking agents' commissions, usually 10 percent, are added on to the total compensation to be paid to the musicians; those commissions are paid by the hotel, not the musical groups.

More recently, certain hotels have been using "personal services" contracts or contracts different in form from those that had been used in past. The General Counsel alleges that the use of those "personal services contracts" or variations thereof is unlawful insofar as they purport to identify the leader as an independent contractor or assert that the musicians are not employees of the hotels. The hotels now using those new form contracts are the Caribe Hilton, the Condado Holiday Inn, the El San Juan, El Conquistador, and The Palace.

C. Administrative and Other Policies of the Hotels Towards Musicians

The contracts between the Respondent Association and the Union, discussed in more detail infra, have required the Class AA hotels to deduct from the gross weekly earnings of each musician performing at the respective hotels social security taxes, unemployment taxes, workers' compensation contributions, and also income taxes for Puerto Rico. Musicians have routinely filed unemployment claims when out of work in which they have named the Class AA hotels as their employers since the hotels have made the employer contributions on their behalf to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

The contracts between the Respondent Association and the Union also require the hotels to provide free meals to the musicians. The musicians use ID cards furnished to them by the hotels to gain entrance to the employees' cafeterias and for other purposes; e.g., use of employee parking facilities.

A memorandum of understanding signed by representatives of the Respondent Association and the Union on April 30, 1979, states that the hotels provide administrative services to assist the band leaders as the leaders do not have the means or the personnel to undertake the task of deducting and transmitting, inter alia, social security taxes. As noted herein, some of the hotels have in 1979 and 1980 attempted to have the leaders make the payments of workers' compensation premiums directly to the Commonwealth for their respective groups.

The hotels, as required by the provisions of the contracts between the Respondent Association and the Union and by virtue of the laws of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, are required to furnish the musicians with paid holidays, paid vacations, and sick leave pay.

The hotels have extensive personnel procedures applicable to individuals whose employment status is not in dispute; e.g., maids, porters, and maintenance employees. These employees fill out job application forms, undergo orientation training, are issued employee manuals and copies of rules and regulations governing their employ, punch timecards, and follow detailed grievance procedures. All the foregoing procedures are not generally applicable to musicians performing at the hotels. Further, a musician who is unable to perform due to sickness is expected to furnish a competent replacement. In that regard, the Union's president testified that he has occasionally filled in as a replacement. The hotel pays the regular musician not the replacement. It appears that musicians have made arrangements among themselves to "cover" each other in emergencies.

The Class AA hotels use different internal accounting procedures. Some, such as the El San Juan, charge the weekly disbursements made to the musicians to accounts-payable ledgers while other hotels record such contributions as part of their employee payroll accounts. For budgetary purposes also these moneys are assessed against the sums allocated for the operating cost of the room where the musicians perform or against the overall dining/entertainment budget. One of the witnesses called by the Respondent Association testified that the music presented by the hotels is part of the overall entertainment package that the Class AA hotels provide for guests and that the hotels make decisions as to what restrictions are to be put on the musicians' movements. Another witness called by the Respondent Association stated in this regard that some hotels impose restrictions on the use by musicians of the public areas of the hotels and that most hotels discourage the use by musicians of casinos and bars as the musicians are "on a duty state . . . what they [are] employed for."

A considerable part of the record in this case pertains to the functions performed by the musicians in the respective hotels over the years. The significant testimony thereon is set down below for each hotel:

1. Condado Holiday Inn

The general manager of the Condado Holiday Inn testified that he frequently meets with the band leaders on his own to discuss market trends and to discuss the responses furnished by guests on questionnaires they have completed. The general manager also testified that the two principal areas of concern he has discussed with the band leaders are lulls in the music and complaints that the music is too loud.

One of the General Counsel's witnesses testified that he had been hired by a group leader at this hotel in 1977 to play piano. In 1979 he was asked by the hotel's food and beverage manager to take over that group. He took over the group as leader and hired another musician. That group played at this hotel until March 1980. While playing under the former leader, he earned "scale" and was also given, by his former leader, an extra $20 a week to compensate him for special musical arrangements he prepared for the group. He has used the ID card given him by the hotel not only to collect his weekly pay check but also to get employee discounts. That card has a notation on it that it is the property of the hotel.

The Respondent Association called the hotel's director of personnel to describe at length procedures followed in hiring through its personnel department employees whose status is not disputed; e.g., maids. His testimony indicated that the details of the hiring procedure, orientation, steps, etc., as set out above are applicable. Such employees must furnish health and good conduct certificates; such certificates are not required to be furnished by musicians. The personnel director further testified that ID cards are issued to construction contractors, subcontractors who are engaged to perform refurbishing work in the hotel, and concessionairies or stores located in the hotel.

One of the General Counsel's witnesses, Angel Pena, testified that he has been a member of the Union for over 35 years and has for many of those years led a 15-piece orchestra known as Lito Pena and his Pan American Orchestra. That orchestra performed in the single engagement field, e.g., at a private party, and has also performed on television. In 1976, Pena contracted with the hotel to lead a 10-piece orchestra on a steady engagement basis in its large dining room. Of the 15 musicians in the Pan American Orchestra, he retained only 6. The 10-piece orchestra, during the time it played at the hotel, was known simply as the Lito Pena and His Orchestra. Pena testified that it was necessary for him to change the whole style and character of his music in order to accommodate the mood of the room in the hotel in which his group played. Thus, while his 15-piece Pan American Orchestra played vibrant Latin-American music, his 10-piece hotel orchestra played soft dinner-dance music and accompanied star performers on sheet music provided by those performers in the manner required by those performers. Pena testified that the style of the music played by his 15-piece Pan American group and that played by his 10-piece hotel orchestra were diametrically opposed as he had to adjust his own style to "the needs" of the hotel. During the years he played at the Condado Holiday Inn, he always complied with the requests of the maitre d' to provide special music to please a guest. Pena testified that on one occasion he objected to the fact that one of the star performers had required him to use a particular individual as the drummer of his 10-piece group. Pena stated that he found that individual's performance unacceptable but the complaints he made thereon went unheeded and he was required to retain that drummer as part of the 10-piece orchestra.

In the off season for tourists, Pena has had to reduce his 10-piece group to 8 musicians; he laid off 2 of the musicians and recalled them when the next tourist season began, in December. He and all his musicians, while performing at the Condado Holiday Inn, received salaries in excess of the minimum scale provided for in the Association-Union contract. Whenever a star performer required additional musicians, the hotel sent Pena a memorandum to that effect; Pena then obtained the necessary extra musicians whose salaries were paid by the hotel and were not deducted from the weekly sum stated in Pena's contract with the hotel.

The Union's president testified that all 10-piece hotel orchestras sound identical and they all play the same type dinner-dance music. One of the leaders called by the Respondent Association as a witness, Jose Juan Pinero, testified that his group plays the same style whether in the hotel or elsewhere.

As of the date of the hearing, there were four quartets playing at the lounges in the Condado Holiday Inn. Three of these groups had been there about 3 years; the fourth had been there 3 months. The leaders of two of those groups had, sometime after April 30, 1979, and pursuant to the hotel's request, obtained employer-numbers from the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico's tax office. One of those leaders now receives a disbursement weekly from the hotel and issues his own checks to the musicians in his group while remitting withholding taxes and other moneys deducted from their gross earnings to the appropriate tax authorities. Apparently, however, the hotel still makes contributions on behalf of all musicians in the hotel to the pension fund established pursuant to the Union-Respondent Association contract.

The hotels use records kept and furnished by the leaders to calculate, inter alia, overtime earnings of the musicians in each group. In that regard, the General Counsel placed in evidence a document with the heading, "Inter-office Correspondence" on the letterhead of the Condado Holiday Inn. That document contained instructions directing leaders to submit written notice of overtime earnings due so that delays in payroll processing would be avoided.

The general manager of the Condado Holiday Inn testified that he once resolved a dispute between a leader of a musical group at his hotel and the casino manager there. He talked with these two persons and with hotel security employees to find out what the problems between those two individuals were. He determined that it was essentially a personality clash and he testified he was successful in smoothing out the differences between those two individuals so that he did not lose the services of either. He testified further that a similar situation had occurred previously between the leader of that musical group and with the hotel's food and beverage manager and that problem had surfaced when the group leader, to the annoyance of that manager, began to sit out the last musical set instead of singing as scheduled. The general manager apparently was successful in persuading that group leader to perform throughout the last musical set.

2. Caribe Hilton Hotel

Roberto Lugo, vice president of Respondent Hilton International Company, d/b/a Caribe Hilton Hotel, engages the musical groups who have performed on a more or less permanent basis at this hotel. In doing so, Lugo has dealt with Felix Alegria, a booking agent. Alegria's commissions have been paid by the Caribe Hilton and have been calculated as a percentage of the total earnings of the musicians in each of the groups engaged. The commissions are added on to the contract between the hotel and the group leader. One of those groups had been led for many years by Miguel Miranda. At one point, Miranda had hired a fourth trumpet player in place of a vocalist and had taken it upon himself to leave the bandstand before the last set was finished. Alegria then advised Miranda that the Caribe Hilton management found that the fourth trumpet player was not needed, that he was to be replaced by a singer, that Miranda was to remain on the bandstand during the hours scheduled, and that he was to comply strictly with the schedule set by the hotel except when the maitre d' ordered him to cease playing. Miranda was further advised that the hotel's management wanted Miranda to supervise the musicians and to be present at all rehearsals.

Another group Lugo engaged through Alegria has been led by Jose Juan Pinero. On December 4, 1979, an official of the hotel wrote Pinero, who then held the "honorary title" of musical director for the hotel, on "interoffice correspondence" to make "a concerted effort to appreciably reduce the volume of [his] music" and that the hotel will "make periodic checks to ascertain improvement." One musician in this group testified he was instructed by Pinero to discontinue the use of amplification equipment as the hotel's management was dissatisfied with the volume and quality of the sound it produced. Pinero stated in his testimony that he ordered the musician to discontinue the use of that equipment on his own.

Testimony was adduced by the General Counsel that, on one occasion, Pinero left for vacation but the remainder of the group continued to play in his absence and that there was no change in the overall presentation. Incidentally, it appears that Pinero has approved vacation requests for members in his group but must obtain the approval of the hotel's general manager before taking his own vacation.

Several years ago, a musician brought a civil action against the Caribe Hilton for damages pertaining to a personal injury he allegedly suffered as a result of the hotel's negligence. In contesting that suit, the attorney for the hotel provided by the insurance company which insured the hotel against the suit prepared an affidavit which was signed by a hotel official. That affidavit, used as a defense in that suit, related that the plaintiff musician, as a hotel employee, was covered by the workers' compensation act and that he was injured "in the course of his employment" with the hotel. The hotel's comptroller at that time testified that, pursuant to the guidance of the attorney furnished by the insurance company, he stated in his affidavit that he, the comptroller, was fully in power to supervise, direct, and control the services provided by plaintiff musician as well as the means and the details connected with the rendering of musical services. The General Counsel adduced other testimony to the effect that one of the musicians in Pinero's group was told by the hotel's maitre d' that, as a hotel employee, he was to abide by the hotel's rules governing his right to bring guests on to the hotel premises. On another occasion, the maitre d' instructed that musician to see to it that the rear curtain did not remain open during the dinner hour.

The General Counsel adduced testimony to the effect that, on one occasion, the Caribe Hilton hotel had a problem with one musician in the 10-piece orchestra of the hotel and the hotel thus instructed the leader to replace the individual forthwith. It appears however that that individual was not let go immediately.

It is undisputed that the specific rules and regulations governing porters, maids, and all other such employees are not applicable to the musicians at the Caribe Hilton, that the musicians were paid by the checks drawn by the hotel using computerized payroll operations, and that the earnings of the musicians are charged for cost-analyses purposes to those departments—food beverages and casino—responsible for the entertainment of guests.

3. La Concha Hotel—Condado Beach Hotel

The General Counsel placed in evidence copies of 16 interoffice memorandums by this hotel's food and beverage manager and by other staff officials which are addressed to leaders of musical groups performing there, or to accounting department heads concerning those musical groups. Typical of these memorandums was a memorandum of May 3, 1977, by the food and service manager to three separate musical groups advising them that "[C]ommencing Friday, May 6, 1977, please comply with the following schedule at Mi Sitio lounge." The memorandum then notified one group that it will play on Wednesday through Friday 5 p.m. to 9:30 p.m. and that it will have "Tuesday off"; another group was scheduled to play on Tuesdays from 9:30 p.m. to 2 a.m., from Wednesday to Sunday from 10 p.m. to 2:30 a.m. and that it would have "Monday off." Other memorandums reflected that one group's hours were being reduced by 2 hours because of a "lack of business" and that another group was notified that there was a change in the rooms in which it would play and in their "work schedule" as reflected therein. On another occasion, a musical group was advised that its services would be required on an overtime basis for 1-1/2 hours at a cocktail party 8 days hence; the hotel's comptroller was simultaneously instructed to remunerate the group accordingly.

The Respondent Association developed testimony from the hotel's executive assistant manager who had been promoted to that post from the position of food and beverage manager that he did not screen musicians for hiring or impose on them their style of playing and that he does not direct them in any of the technical aspects of their musical performances. The Respondent Association also called as its witness a dancer, Marcello Palacios, who stated that he heads a group of six dancers who perform at the hotel and that he also pays three musicians who accompany his dancers. Palacios testified on cross-examination that, for the first 4 months, the overall group of 10 performed at the hotel beginning in December 1977, he paid all 10. However, from early 1978 and until the week preceding the hearing in this case, the hotel had paid these musicians directly. In rebuttal, the General Counsel's witness, Jose Torres, testified that he was the leader of the group of musicians who played as part of that Flamenco dance group and that the hotel's general manager had, on one occasion, told him that Palacios had no authority to "dismiss him" but that only the hotel's manager could do so. The hotel on April 24, 1980, advised Torres that his services would no longer be needed as of May 10, 1980, because of a change in the dance program and as the hotel "would not contract anymore musicians for that presentation."

4. El San Juan Hotel

When the strike began in 1979 and for over 10 years previously, the El San Juan Hotel had a group of 10 musicians playing at its Tropicana Club Room. Eduado Gerena testified for the General Counsel that he was hired as a first saxophonist in December 1972 by Anselmo Sacacas, the leader then of that orchestra. In 1976, Sacacas retired and he was replaced as leader of the Tropicana Club band by Jesus Caunedo. The rest of the orchestra was unchanged except that Caunedo hired a pianist as a replacement for Sacacas who had been the pianist. Another musician testified that he had joined that group at this hotel in 1962 as a trumpet player and that Sacacas was the leader for about 15 years. A third musician, also a trumpet player, joined the group in 1966 and has, in recent years, replaced Caunedo as leader whenever Caunedo took a vacation. He stated that, throughout the years he performed with this group at the hotel, there was no essential change in the group's performance.

In common parlance, a large group that plays in the main entertainment room of a Class AA hotel, such as the El San Juan, is sometimes referred to as the "house band."

Leaders at the El San Juan maintain records of the overtime hours worked by members of their respective groups and also as to which members are entitled to additional compensation by reason of their having played more than one instrument during a performance; i.e., pay for "doubling." The hotel's general manager testified that he has to trust these reports of these leaders. Counsel for Respondent El San Juan developed testimony that the contract between the hotel and the group leader contained a "lump sum" amount of money. This figure was the total weekly cost to the hotel of the regular salaries of the members of a group and of the agent's commission fee. It was not the total contractual sum as the length of the contract was for all practical purposes indefinite and it did not include "doubling" costs or overtime costs or moneys paid to extra musicians hired by the leader at the direction of the hotel. In that regard, the testimony is clear that, on occasion, it was necessary to augment the usual 10-piece band with extra musicians as required by a star attraction. The leader hired the extra musicians but their salaries were paid by the hotel which also deducted therefrom the usual taxes. It appears that here, also, the hotel relied on the leader's judgment inselecting the musicians and in setting the gross weekly earnings of the extra musicians so engaged.

The General Counsel proffered other testimony and exhibits to establish that the hotel's management issued memorandums to a leader whereby he was instructed to advise the musicians in his group that they are not to place their instruments against the walls of the hotel and that they are not to go into the kitchen to get coffee but are to use the employee cafeteria instead. The leader of the group and also the hotel's maitre d' informed the musicians that they are not to "warm up" in the dining area but that they should tune their instruments in the room provided for them in the hotel. Gerena testified that his group was "frequently" told by the maitre d' to lower the volume of the music to obtain a subdued sound.

The General Counsel also called the hotel's general manager as a witness. He testified that he had signed an affidavit submitted during the investigation of the underlying unfair labor practice charge in this case and that his affidavit related that the hotel "had 15 regular employee musicians who are paid directly by the hotel . . . 13 of whom performed at the Tropicana Club room and

2 performed at the Right Knight room." Respondent El San Juan Hotel called its president, its vice president for finance, its general manager, its personnel director, and also accounting supervisors as witnesses. They testified that the only instruction given the maitre d' as far as the musicians are concerned is to make sure that a musical group performs according to the contract between the leader and the hotel, that each musical group is paid a lump sum which is charged to accounts payable and not to payroll, that the hotel's personnel department does not maintain any personnel file for any musician appearing at the hotel whereas it does maintain such files for maids and all of its other regular employees and that the musicians do not have to comply with regulations established for the hotel's regular employees, e.g., those requiring employees to punch time cards. Its data processing manager, when asked a preliminary question respecting the way "sidemen," i.e., the musicians, were paid, stated that they "get paid like the rest of the employees."

5. Other Class AA hotels

The complaints in these consolidated cases identify the Respondent Association and the six Class AA hotels discussed above as the actual Respondents. Testimony was adduced at the hearing respecting the operations of other Class AA hotels vis-a-vis the musicians in order to throw further light on the employee versus independent contractor issue and as such evidence pertains to other issues; e.g., the appropriateness of the unit.

The food and service manager of the Dupont Plaza Hotel, a Class AA hotel, testified that he selects musical groups by evaluating whether their style fits in with the ambiance of the room to which he assigns the group. He prepares the working schedules for all musical groups of that hotel. Each group normally performs as per the hours set in the contracts between the Respondent Association and the Union; i.e., on a 6-day, 28-hour week basis. The food and service manager at the Dupont Plaza assigns these groups to perform in designated rooms or lounges. On one occasion, a leader of a group in the Parado 30 lounge used a female trumpet player who in the judgment of the food and service manager did not dress appropriately for that lounge and who, in his judgment, should be replaced by a saxophone player. He spoke directly to the trumpet player about improving her appearance and advised the leader that he had 30 days to improve the group's performance. When the trumpet player's performance did not improve, the group resigned. The food and service manager approves all vacation requests made by musicians performing at the Dupont Plaza. In 1979, members of one musical group asked to take their vacations all at the same time; this would necessitate the hotel's engaging a new group to substitute for them. Their request was denied and instead they were required to take their vacations on an individual basis with each member having to furnish a substitute for himself during the period he was away. On February 29, 1980, the food and service manager issued a memorandum setting forth "rules and regulations" for musicians; these included instructions that the musicians list their repertoire which should be updated periodically, that the musicians must not consume liquor "on premises while working," that they should follow the instructions of the lounge manager and inform him of all changes, lateness, new equipment, etc. One of the musical groups played for over 4 years in one of the Dupont Plaza lounges before the food and service manager shifted that group to perform at another lounge.

A predecessor Class AA hotel, the Hyatt Puerto Rico, issued nine rules in 1973 governing the conduct of its musicians—one of which provided for "immediate dismissal for . . . intoxication."

Another hotel, the Holiday Inn at Isla Verda, had completed in March 1977, a questionnaire sent in by a bank to verify "the employment" of the musician named therein who was seeking a loan. In responding to the questionnaire the hotel's personnel manager noted that prospects for that musician's continued employment at the hotel were good. He testified that he based this answer on the fact that the term of the musicians contract was indefinite. In 1978, the personnel manager of that hotel wrote a letter on behalf of a musician in which he referred to the musician as an employee who works for the hotel. The testimony of the Isla Verda's hotel personnel manager was to the effect that a group of six musicians had played there for 7 years and that their leader is paid on a "lump sum" pursuant to his request. It was not made clear whether that leader received an advance on his contract or payment of the total of the respective weekly gross earnings of the musicians in his group or payment for the total of their respective weekly net earnings; i.e., after income, social security, and other taxes had been deducted by the hotel.

The General Counsel called a witness who testified that, in 1979, he had played in an orchestra in a Class AA hotel, the Cerromar. While there, the musicians in that orchestra had changed their uniform attire from a black jacket to rust colored jacket pursuant to the request of the hotel's manager and that the hotel paid for those new "uniforms." On one occasion, the maitre d' of the room in which the orchestra played restricted the musicians from smoking while near the bandstand.

A leader called by the General Counsel testified that his group had been playing at the Dorado Beach Hotel for 3 years, that the hotel's food and beverage manager prepares the schedules as to hours and locations which are followed by his group, that the maitre d' of the room in which his group plays has told them, at various times, to play softer, and that the maitre d' "might" let them go home early if the lounge is "empty."

D. History of the Contract Negotiations Between the Union and the Respondent Association

In September 1961, Abraham Pena, who was president of the Union from 1961 to 1977, approached the then president of the Respondent Association and requested that negotiations for a collective-bargaining agreement covering the musicians who work in hotels in Puerto Rico which had gambling casinos should begin. His proposal was accepted. Pena had obtained from other AFM locals copies of agreements they had so that he could borrow some of the language from those agreements in the course of his negotiating meetings with the Respondent Association. The first such meetings took place in 1961. They were attended by representatives from each of the hotels plus four or five lawyers as their respective counsel. Agreement was reached and the agreement was apparently reduced to writing; however, neither the original of the 1961 agreement nor a copy of it is now in existence.

A new round of negotiations took place in 1964. By then three new hotels with casinos (Ponce de Leon, Sheridan, and the Americana) had opened. Pena testified that the representatives of the Respondent Association made it clear that it was representing in those negotiations all the hotels which had casinos. Another 3-year agreement was reached on December 19, 1964, to be effective from December 1, 1964, to November 30, 1967. Copies of schedules A and B referred to therein were not located; it appears that they were similar to schedules A and B annexed to the 1967–70 contract, discussed in detail below. The 1964–67 contract contained a recognition clause which stated that "the hotels recognized the [Union] as the exclusive collective bargaining representatives of all musicians employed by the hotels." There were 13 hotels[5] referred to therein as "employers of musicians."

A copy of the written contract for the period 1967–70 was received in evidence. It recites that it is the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the Respondent Association, bargaining for all its members listed therein; i.e., Caribe Hilton, Puerto Rico Hilton, San Jeronimo Hilton, La Concha, Condado Beach, Americana, El Flamboyan, El San Juan, Dorado Beach, Conquistador, Dorado Hilton, Miramar Hilton, and Ponce International. The agreement provided that it was to be applicable "to the classifications of employees listed in . . . attached . . . Schedule (A) and also to conductors, featured instrumental musicians and orchestras employed within the premises of the hotel whose services are rendered in connection with entertainment and dancing, under the supervision of the hotel's executives managing its facilities," all of whom were referred to therein collectively as "musicians." Schedule A annexed to that agreement contained "wage scales, hours of employment and working conditions" for the steady engagement of musicians. By the terms of the 1967–70 agreement the hotels recognized the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of all musicians within the hotels. This language is different from the language of the recognition clause in the previous contract. The then president of the Respondent Association testified that he proposed the change as he did not want the musicians to be characterized therein as employees of the hotels. He stated that the Union's president, Pena, did not care which way the contract read, apparently because the change did not in Pena's view, interfere with his ability to represent the musicians. Other relevant provisions of that 1967–70 contract required (a) the hotels to make appropriate deductions in payments of social security taxes and unemployment contributions to the pertinent government agencies, (b) the hotels to keep a minimum number of local musicians under contract as set out in schedule B therein, (c) that the Union's constitution and bylaws and those of its International were incorporated into the agreement to be extent permitted by law, and (d) that the agreement shall be in effect from December 1, 1967–November 30, 1971. The agreement was signed by the respective presidents of the Union and of the Respondent Association; officers of each of the hotels signed copies of the agreement to verify that they "ratified" it. Schedule A, annexed to that contract, provided inter alia, that nothing therein shall prohibit "any" (AFM) members from contracting for a higher price, that members must receive at least 20 minutes rest per hour, that an orchestra's day off may not be changed without the Union's consent, that musicians must be paid for rehearsals called by the hotels, that a musician who plays more than one instrument in an orchestra shall receive additional payment therefor (this is termed a doubling charge), that the musicians shall be served hot meals by the hotel and shall receive vacation pay as specified therein, that each hotel shall make contributions to the AFM pension welfare fund and that each hotel shall provide an air-conditioned room for use by musicians during intermissions. The minimum wage scale in the 1967 contract provided that a musician in the first year would receive $114 for a 6-day week consisting of 28 hours of performing, that the leader of the musical group would receive double that amount, that overtime would be paid at the rate of $6 an hour and rehearsals at the rate of $4.05 an hour. Each year thereafter under the contract, the weekly minimum was raised $6 so that in 1971 a musician received a minimum of $132 for a week.

In 1967, a disagreement arose respecting the application of the vacation clause in the agreement. On behalf of the Union, Pena wrote a letter to the hotels indicating that they must schedule vacations for each group of musicians so that the whole group would be off during the same period and that the hotels were not to schedule vacations for musicians on an individual basis. The president then of the Respondent Association, Roberto Lugo, wrote Pena that he was writing on behalf of all hotels and objected to the attempt by the Union to interfere with a matter "obviously . . . within the scope of the management prerogative" and to the Union's effort to unilaterally amend the agreed-upon contract language. Lugo further related that he had told the Union that because of their "operational needs," hotels desired to "retain the flexibility to grant vacations to musicians as they see fit." Lugo concluded his letter to the Union by stating that the Respondent Association considered Pena's letter to the hotels as "void."

Aside from few areas of minor disagreements such as that pertaining to the schedule of vacations, the relations between the Union and the Respondent Association until most recently were characterized by witnesses for the General Counsel and also for the Respondent Association as harmonious.

On December 15, 1971, a renewal contract from December 1971 to November 20, 1975, was signed by the Union and the Respondent Association. The form and contents of that contract closely parallel the prior agreements; "the minimum wage" scale as of the last year of the 1971-75 contract was $202 for each musician for the standard 6-day, 28-hour workweek. Another 3-year contract for the period December 1, 1975, to November 30, 1978, was reached on January 27, 1976. The law firm which represented the Respondent Association at the hearing made its first appearance as its representative when it participated in the bargaining that gave rise to that contract. The format and contents were substantially the same as those of the prior contracts except for the minimum wage rates. The member hotels as listed therein were the Americana, Caribe Hilton, Condado Holiday Inn, El San Juan, Hyatt Puerto Rico, Puerto Rico Sheridan, Cerromar, Dorado Beach, and El Conquistador. In this contract, the musicians received an additional holiday—San Juan Bautista Day Eve. The scale for musicians in 1978 was $238. That 1975-78 agreement stated that the hotels retain the sole authority to change orchestra personnel in case of misconduct.

A new contract was signed in 1979. There is a dispute, inter alia, as to whether that signed contract reflects accurately the terms actually agreed upon in the negotiations. Nevertheless the signed contract effective by its terms from April 1979 for a 3-year period closely tracts prior agreements. The current contract is captioned "Agreement" and not "Collective Bargaining Agreement" as were the prior contracts; "wage rates" are now termed "compensation scales." The current contract no longer simply states that the hotels shall make the appropriate deductions (from the earnings of the musicians) and remit the required payments to the pertinent government agencies as before. Instead it provides that the hotels are now doing these things "on behalf of the band conductors." The current contract contains a grievance-arbitration clause. Schedules A and B annexed thereto are similar in format to the schedules annexed to the earlier agreements. For example, both provide for a 20-minute rest each hour for the musicians. The doubling charge has been increased to $5; another holiday was added as was a sick leave clause, termed an "incentive clause." The "scale" for musicians was increased to $248 and will be $282 in 1981.

E. Background to the 1979 Negotiations

In the 1960's, the number of Class AA hotels in Puerto Rico grew and reached a climax around 1970. In the 1970's, some of these Class AA hotels closed, others were taken over by an agency of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and others were consolidated. Still others were sold to new management. Other changes were made. Thus, Condado Holiday Inn no longer imported highly paid entertainers to attract guests but found it more productive to provide a more informal atmosphere in its entertainment functions. It has done away with its 10-piece orchestra and now has numerous musical groups playing in its rooms in an effort to attract a stable local following. The El San Juan Hotel still uses headliners from the mainland as attractions but the accompaniment for those entertainers is now taped. The El San Juan no longer uses the standard 10-piece orchestra.

By 1977, union membership had numbered about 2,700; however, only about 125 of these worked in the Class AA hotels. Of the Union's overall membership, only 25 percent performed on a full-time basis, that is, in symphony orchestras, on a single-engagement basis, or in hotels. The great majority of the Union's members perform on a part-time basis. All professional musicians in Puerto Rico had been until sometime in 1979 members of the Union for one or all of the following reasons: (a) it was the accepted wisdom that a performer had to belong to the Union in order to work, (b) it was necessary in order to promote the status of professional musicians' attempts to upgrade their profession, and (c) union membership was essential to enhance the status of the Puerto Rican musician especially in relation to the professional musician coming from the mainland. In actual practice, it appears that no one gave much thought to the reason for joining the Union. It seems that, if a musician were accepted by his peers as a professional, he was readily admitted to union membership and was thus assured of being paid "scale" whenever he played.

In the course of the hearing, the parties alluded regularly to the "Pat Mills" case. That case is discussed in detail below. It appears that it was the result of that case that the Union, on advice of its International's counsel, decided to press in the course of the most recent contract negotiations to have the local musicians declared to be employees of the hotels and that this declaration was to be expressly incorporated into the contract.

A brief look at the Pat Mills case will help put those negotiations in better perspective. Based on a secondary boycott charge filed by Pat Mills doing business as Pat Mills and Company, a complaint had issued against the Union. The hearing was held in December 1978. The Board issued its decision on December 5, 1979.[6] The decision indicates that in July 1978 the El San Juan Hotel contracted, through a booking agent in New York City, to bring down to perform in the El San Juan Hotel Pat Mills and Company for a 4-week engagement. That group consisted of Pat Mills, her husband, and five other musicians and a lighting operator and was nonunion. At the hearing in the instant case, the General Counsel referred to the Pat Mills group as "travelers" who are not covered by the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the Respondent Association. At the hearing in the Pat Mills case, the General Counsel contended that Pat Mills and her husband were self-employed persons under Section 2(6) and (7) and Section 8 of the Act. Based on the uncontroverted testimony of Pat Mills at the hearing in that case that she and her husband were individual proprietors with an office in West Nyack, New York, and that they provide musical services outside the State of New York in excess of $50,000 a year, they were found to be self-employed. The Union had argued in that case that its threat to strike the El San Juan Hotel was aimed at a lawful object, that is, the preservation of unit work. Administrative Law Judge Plaine held, however, that its real object was to force Pat Mills and others in her company to join the Union's sister local in New York City and that the Union's threat thus violated the Act as alleged.

For reasons not clear but apparently related to some of the issues in the Pat Mills case, the Union decided to seek separate negotiations in December 1978 with the Class AA hotels in Puerto Rico and also to obtain express language in the collective-bargaining agreement that the local musicians were employees of the hotels, subject to a union-security clause, entitled to representation by stewards and also to receive sick leave pay. As discussed below, the Pat Mills case has a bearing on the language used in the recognition clause of the 1979-81 contract.

F. The Most Recent Negotiations

The Union's president, Angel Nater, testified that in September 1978 he told the executive director, Miguel Domenech, of the Respondent Association that the Union wanted to negotiate individually with the hotels involved in this case and that Domenech responded in effect that the hotels wanted the Respondent Association to act as their joint representative. It appears that Nater himself conducted the Union's negotiations directly with an advisory group in the background. The Union's advisory group consisted of three individuals, one of whom was Juan Pinero, who also had been the Union's vice president. Pinero, as discussed below in another section, is alleged in this case to be a supervisor employed by the Caribe Hilton Hotel.

On September 28, 1978, Domenech wrote Nater to state that the contract "which established working conditions for the contracting of musicians" will expire on November 30, 1978, and therein he asked Nater to set forth the Union's demands, an obvious invitation to the Union to begin negotiations for a renewal contract. Domenech wrote the Union on October 17 to note that he had not received a written reply to his September 28 letter and he stated therein that, instead, Nater had left two telephone messages which appeared to be in conflict with each other—in one, Nater reportedly said that the Union would negotiate with each hotel individually and, in the later call, Nater reportedly indicated that the Union would forward its demands to Respondent Association on or about October 15, 1978. Nater responded by letter of October 19, and enclosed with it a list of what the parties termed the Union's "non economic" demands. On November 3, Domenech wrote Nater asking that the Union's "economic demands" be made as soon as possible. On October 2, representatives from hotels belonging to the Respondent Association had met and drafted a "Mutual aid and protection agreement" which recited that these hotels "desired to continue engaging in collective bargaining negotiations with the Union on a multiemployer basis." The draft further recites that the Respondent Association's board of directors was empowered to "establish a labor relations policy" for the musicians. That mutual pact referred to the possibility of a "whipsaw strike against one of the employers" and to a lockout response thereto.

On November 10, 1978, the Union set forth its economic and noneconomic demands in Nater's letter to Domenech. By letter of November 17, Domenech replied that the noneconomic demands were completely unacceptable; he stated that the members of Respondent Association "do not employ musicians," that Respondent Association has always rejected the Union's proposals "to have the hotels incorporate musicians into their regular work force," and that the musicians are "employees of leaders." Domenech noted that the Respondent Association and the Union have always discussed "certain minimum wage" scalee for musicians to work at the "member hotels." Domenech also observed in that letter that the Union's proposals respecting those minimum (wage) scales were "to say the least unrealistic," and he suggested that the Union "present realistic proposals." Also, on November 17, the mutual aid protection agreement referred to above was signed inter alia by representatives of the Caribe Hilton Hotel, Condado Holiday Inn, LaConcha-Condado Beach, and by Sam Sweitzer for El San Juan Hotel.

On November 27, 1978, Sam Sweitzer, the president of El San Juan Hotel, wrote the Union stating that he was writing on behalf of El San Juan, the El Conquistador, and the Palace Hotels. These hotels are owned by one individual, Louis Puro. Sweitzer stated in that letter that these hotels deny the statement in the "collective bargaining agreement" for the period December 1, 1975, to November 30, 1978 (which covered the musicians at those three hotels), that the services of those musicians are "under the supervision of the hotels" and its executive managing its facilities. Sweitzer wrote that these three hotels were not employers of the musicians and that they "refused to recognize the Union or to bargain with it for any type of labor contract covering musicians who perform in these hotels." He concluded his letter with the statement that the El San Juan, El Conquistador, and the Palace Hotel have advised the Respondent Association of their dissent from certain parts of the Respondent Association's letter to the Union dated November 17, 1978.

The first negotiation meeting for a renewal contract for 1979 took place on November 28, 1978, and was attended by the Union's president, Nater, and by the Respondent Association's president, Juan Santoni, its executive director, and two members of the law firm representing the Respondent Association. Nater testified that the Respondent Association's representatives told him then that the Union's demands included matters that implied that the parties were negotiating a collective-bargaining agreement. Nater testified that he thereupon responded that was exactly what the Respondent Association and the Union had been doing since 1961. Nater, in his testimony, characterized the Respondent Association's position as analogous to that of a "half pregnant" woman in that, from Nater's viewpoint, the Respondent Association was engaged in collective bargaining while, at the same time, denying it. The Respondent Association's representatives stated at those negotiations that it was amenable to Nater's suggestion that the National Labor Relations Board resolve their controversy as to whether the hotels employ musicians. The Respondent Association also observed that it is aware of the increased cost of living and that its position in adjusting the earnings of the musicians should not be in variance with adjustments that "may be directly agreed upon by the different hotels with the orchestras leaders performing under contract in their facilities." (There was no testimony that any of the member hotels had direct discussions with the leaders thereon from then and until the Union and the Respondent Association ultimately reached a new agreement, as discussed below.)

The Union then filed an unfair labor practice charge with Region 24 of the Board. On December 7, its president, Nater, wrote Domenech and enclosed with his letter the Union's new contract proposals. The enclosed documents omitted reference to a "collective bargaining agreement" and simply referred to this "agreement." The proposals therein recited that they shall be applicable to the classification of employees listed in the "wage scale, hours of employment and working conditions" attached thereto as schedule A and to those who are "employed within the premises of the hotel whose services are rendered into the connection with the entertainment and dancing, all of whom will be [therein] collectively referred to as "musicians"—and that "all such musicians shall be in the bargaining unit covered by this agreement." Among the provisions sought by the Union as set forth in the proposed agreement were a union-shop clause, a grievance and arbitration clause, a no-lockout clause, a clause for free parking facilities, additional paid holidays, 12 days sick leave each year, a clause providing for payment of a Christmas bonus, coverage for family medical expenses, a no-subcontracting-out clause, and provisions for an increase in the weekly wage scale to $353 in the last of a 3-year contract.

Nater met with the Respondent Association's representatives and its legal counsel on December 8, 1978. Nater testified at the hearing that, to get the negotiations going then, he signed a letter prepared by the Respondent Association whereby Nater acknowledged that he has "reached the moral conviction that the position assumed by (the Respondent Associaton) in relation to the issue of whether or not the musicians are employees of the hotels is reasonable" and that the Union was willing not to insist on "integrating the musicians as part of the [hotel] labor force" provided agreement could be reached on a commercial compulsory arbitration clause in the contract in order to protect the musicians adequately.

In late December 1978, when the 1975-78 agreement was scheduled to expire, the Union agreed in a meeting with representatives for the Respondent Association, which was also attended by officials from the Puerto Rican Conciliation and Arbitration Bureau, to continue bargaining without calling a strike.

On December 31, 1978, Nater and other union representatives met with Louis Puro at his office in the El San Juan Hotel and informed him in effect that the November 27 letter the Union received from Sam Sweitzer on behalf of the El San Juan Hotel, the El Conquistador, and the Palace Hotel was an untimely attempt to avoid associationwide bargaining. Nater said that Puro told him that he was willing to "deal with the hotel association" and that, on Puro's general assurance that things would be all right, the Union decided not to go on strike at the El San Juan hotel.

Nater testified that on January 8, 1979, he was advised by the Respondent Association's attorneys that the Union had to withdraw its unfair labor practice charge before negotiations could resume and that the Respondent Association continued to assert that the hotels were not the employers of the musicians. Nater informed them that the hotels were in fact the employers of the musicians; he testified that, nevertheless and in order to be able to negotiate, he accepted the Respondent Association's demands.

On January 15, when the Union and the Respondent Association met again, Nater advised the Respondent Association that he had not yet withdrawn the unfair labor practice charge. He was then given a letter by the Respondent Association and was requested to sign it. He did so. The letter recited that he had agreed on January 8 that musicians are not employees of the hotels and that consequently the Union agreed to withdraw the unfair labor practice charge it had filed.

On January 22, 1979, the Respondent Association presented Nater with another document and requested that he sign that one. He did so. That document recited that the hotels had made deductions including social security taxes from the compensation paid musicians as an administrative service to band leaders who do not have the means and personnel to undertake those tasks.

The next meeting was held on January 23. Present for the Association were its president, Juan Santoni, its executive director, Miguel Domenech, its attorney, Milagro Soto, and two hotel officials, Roberto Lugo and Arne Orenstein. For the Union were its president, Nater, its treasurer, and a trustee. The Respondent Association presented its draft of the agreement. Nater and Santoni on behalf of the respective parties initialed a number of clauses on that draft to indicate their agreement as to those clauses. The recognition clause as so approved read "the hotels recognize the Union as the exclusive representative of all musicians performing within the hotel." (The General Counsel contends that subsequently the Respondent Association unilaterally inserted the letters "AFM" before the word "musicians" in that clause to suggest that the Union had agreed to represent only union members; the Respondent Association asserts that the clause was in fact later modified by agreement.) On February 15, the Union and the Respondent Association met. The parties reached agreement respecting a "fondo incentive" whereby the hotels would contribute to a fund a certain amount of money each month for musicians to compensate them for days lost because of illness and to provide an incentive for a musician not to feign illness and to perform although not perfectly well. Under this clause, each musician would receive at the end of each year the balance of the money credited to him in that fund. The Union asserts that the hotel in essence granted their demand for sick leave pay. The parties reached agreement on a number of other items including increased earnings, or other type pay raises, on the number of vacation days and they also agreed that travelers shall not be part of the contract. Roberto Lugo signed a memorandum on behalf of the Respondent Association on February 15, as did Nater for the Union, which sets out those areas of agreement. No reference is made in that memorandum as to the insertion of the letters "AFM" in the recognition clause of the contract.

Counsel for the Respondent Association, Maria Soto, explained how those letters came to be included in the final draft of the agreement. She testified that she attended the February 15 meeting and that, after Lugo and Nater signed the memorandum of agreement, she had a discussion with Nater respecting problem areas in obtaining ratification from the board of directors of the Respondent Association. The notes she had made while at that meeting were then received in evidence. These reflect that Nater indicated that "all musicians was not accepted but AFM was in order to prevent a repetition of the Pat Mills case." The Respondent Association's executive director, Domenech, was unable to recall any of the particulars of the conversation between Soto and Nater; he testified that there was general acceptance of the language changes. Earlier in the hearing, Attorney Soto had observed that the Respondent Association did not make the reference to "AFM" musicians to change the makeup of the group covered by the contract as at that time all of the local musicians were members of the Union.

It is undisputed that both the members of the Respondent Association and the Union had to ratify the agreement before it would go into effect.

G. The Union's Ratification Meeting

Although the Union had over 3,000 members, only about 150 worked in the hotels, a number of whom were leaders. On February 19, 1979, about 100 of the members who performed in the hotels attended a union meeting to vote on whether to ratify or reject the agreement reached between Respondent Association and the Union on February 15. Objections were voiced at the union meeting based on the failure of the agreement to guarantee that a 10-piece orchestra would continue to perform at the Condado Holiday Inn, and the fact that the provisions of the contract were not retroactive to the effective date of the contract and to the amount of the increases provided for in the weekly earnings of the musicians. The contract was rejected. A strike vote was proposed. Jose Juan Pinero, a band leader at the Caribe Hilton Hotel whom the General Counsel contends is a supervisor there, was present at the meeting and voiced objections to certain members being allowed to participate in the voting. Another individual, James Stevens, also alleged to have been an agent of a member hotel, objected to a strike vote. The membership nevertheless voted to strike, which began on February 19. It lasted until April 20, 1979, when the respective presidents of the Respondent Association and the Union apparently resolved their differences as discussed below.

H. The 1979–81 Contract

In the middle of April, Nater called the Respondent Association's office and asked to meet with its president, Juan Santoni. This call led to a meeting between Nater and Santoni on April 18 in Santoni's apartment. Santoni informed Nater that all the Respondent Association's prior offers had been withdrawn. Nater observed that there were three matters that had created the impasse, referring to the (1) guarantees that the hotels would have specified minimum numbers of employees, (2) salaries, and (3) retroactivity of the contract. Santoni said that the hotels had been able to function by having "hired nonunion members and foreign musicians." Nevertheless, Santoni said that he would try to get the Respondent Association's board of directors to accept the Union's proposals respecting the guaranteed number of musicians to be used by the Class AA hotels. They discussed the retroactivity issue and other matters. When the discussion ended, Santoni arranged a meeting with the Respondent Association's board of directors to review the points he and Nater had discussed.

On April 19, Nater came to the offices of the attorneys for the Respondent Association. After discussing the provisions of the incentive fund clause, i.e., that relating to benefits for sick leave, used and unused, and discussing the clause guaranteeing the use of the minimum number of musicians, Nater and Santoni signed "an agreement in principle" adopting the agreements reached on February 15 and on seven further points, including those pertaining to the guaranteed number of musicians, salary scales, and retroactivity. There was no reference therein to the language of the recognition clause. On April 27, Nater received from the Respondent Association a final draft of the agreement dated April 30, 1979, to be effective as of April 19, 1979, for a 3-year period. The recognition clause therein stated that "the hotels recognized the Union as the exclusive representative of all AFM musicians performing within the hotels." Nater apparently took no notice then of the letters AFM. He stated that he did notice then a discrepancy with respect to the amount of the contributions for the sick leave provisions. He called those figures to the attention of the Respondent Association's representatives and these were corrected. On April 30, he and Santoni signed the contract and the strike ended.

On August 7, 1979, a meeting of various members of the Respondent Association was held respecting questions as to whether the contractual provisions relating to their guaranteeing the use of a specified minimum number of musicians required them to have a minimum number of AFM musicians or whether the minimum number pertained to both union and nonunion musicians. (It appears that, at that time, a number of musicians had been dropped from union membership.) The Respondent Association's counsel advised its member hotels then that the minimum guarantee applied to all musicians, regardless of union membership; he further advised the hotels that they cannot establish a distinction between musicians that belong to the Union and those who did not and that the hotels "for all purposes do not even inquire whether the musicians are or are not Union musicians."

I. Further Discussion Between the Union and the Owner of the El San Juan, El Conquistador, and Palace Hotels

Louis Puro owns these three hotels and actively participates in their operations. He has controlled the El San Juan Hotel for 19 years, the El Conquistador for 15 years, and the Palace Hotel for 2 years.

The Union's president, Nater, testified that on April 30, 1979, he met with Puro and Samuel Sweitzer, president of the El San Juan Hotel. Nater said that Sweitzer had told him that he had read the proposals sent him by the attorney for the Respondent Association and that he believed they were acceptable. According to Nater, Puro then said that he did not know about that but, after further discussion, Puro agreed to guarantee that the El San Juan and the Palace would jointly use a minimum of 18 musicians. Nater related that he and Puro discussed the employment of nine musicians, a matter now the subject of a separate civil action in Puerto Rico.

J. Use of Personal Services Contracts

It is undisputed that the Respondent Association has recommended that its member hotels use a new form of contract to be signed by them with their leaders which states that the leader is the employer of the musicians not the hotels. It is also clear that the Condado Holiday Inn, the Caribe Hilton, El San Juan, El Conquistador, and the Palace hotels have, since the execution of the last agreement, been using that form of contract or one similar to it.[7]

III. ANALYSIS OF EVIDENCE AS TO ALLEGED REFUSALS TO BARGAIN

A. The Employee vs. Independent Contractor Issue

The parties in their respective briefs have discussed the guidelines I am to use in deciding whether or not the steady engagement musicians in Class AA hotels are employees as defined in the Act or are excluded thereform as independent contractors. It will be helpful to state those guidelines. Thus, the common law agency test must be applied.[8] Under this test, an employer-employee relationship exists where the person for whom the services are performed reserves the right to control not only the ends to be achieved but also the means to be used to achieve such ends.[9] All of the facts must be analyzed in applying the test.[10] Each case is determined on its own facts.[11] It is the right, not the exercise of control, that is important.[12] The test applies to individuals who may be supervisors as well as to those who may be employees.[13] While the test may be simple to state, it is not easy to apply.[14]

Respective counsel for the Respondents considered and discussed the relevant factors set out in Restatement of Agency 2d, §220, in applying the common law agency test to the facts in the instant case. This approach seems to me to be a sound one as it permits a detailed consideration of those factors in conjunction with the comments provided in the Restatement. My evaluation of the evidence in the context of those factors, as discussed below, does not accord with the arguments they urge, however.

I am aware that the applicable common law agency test was developed in tort cases to decide issues as to the liability of a master where a negligent act was committed by an individual, other than one of his regular servants, whom he had used in performing a service for him. On that premise, it would seem that my determination in this case should be based on the very same concept. That is, a steady engagement musician in a Class AA hotel would be an employee covered by the Act if that hotel were held to be liable for a negligent act by that musician during a performance at the hotel and which caused injury to a patron; conversely, if the hotel were exonerated from liability for such negligence by the musician, the musician would be an independent contractor.[15] That may be an awkward way to view the issue but I believe that it does put the specific issue in its proper legal perspective. That is not to say, however, that my determination must be identical to the results of such a tort action. The Restatement of Agency, 2d, observes that where the inference to be drawn from the relevant facts (as to whether or not an independent contractor or a master-servant relationship exists) is clear, the court should decide the matter as purely a legal issue; if the inference to be drawn is not so clear, the issue should be submitted to the jury for a factual determination pursuant to appropriate instructions. In the instant case, I do not think it can be said as a matter of law that the inference to be drawn from the testimony respecting the status of the musicians as employees or as independent contractors is clear. Rather, and as is evident from the discussion below, I think that reasonable men may differ thereon. Consequently, the issue involves a factual determination.[16] In deliberating on the question, I have considered the factors viewed by the Restatement as appropriate for that purpose. These are now discussed according to the headings used in the Restatement:

[7] The Caribe Hilton has used the services of a booking agent, Jimmy Stevens, to handle the bookkeeping and the disbursement of paychecks to musicians. Thus, it pays Stevens each week a lump sum of the total of the moneys due the musicians and gives him its records as to the hours they worked, including overtime. The payment to Stevens also includes a commission for himself. Stevens then draws checks on his own account to pay the musicians each week and transmits taxes and other required deductions to the appropriate authorities.

In that case, the Court discussed its holding in N.L.R.B. v. Hearst Publications, Inc., 322 U.S. 111 (1944), where it had approved the Board's holding that the Act had been intended to cover "employees in the conventional as well as the legal sense . . ." as "the primary consideration" was whether the purpose of the Act would be effectuated by providing tothe individuals whose status was in dispute (i.e., newsboys alleged to be independent contractors) the protection guaranteed by the Act. The Court further observed that since the issuance of the decision in that case, the Hearst case, the Act itself was amended to reflect the intent of Congress that the common law agency test would control in determining whether individuals are employees or independent contractors.

[16] In N.L.R.B. v. United Insurance Co. of America, et al., 390 U.S. 254 (1968), the Court viewed the employee vs. independent contractor issue as essentially factual and on that basis affirmed the Board's holding.

1. Extent of control

The Respondents stress the fact that none of the hotels' top or middle management officials—the general manager, the food and beverage manager, and so on—have the technical competence to direct a band with respect to tempo and other musical attributes. The General Counsel and the Charging Party places considerable weight on the testimony that the managers of the Class AA hotels insist on a particular dinner-dance style of music to blend in with the character that these hotels strive to achieve for purposes of attracting patronage and on other testimony that the hotels possess and exercise significant control over the musicians in scheduling their workhours and overtime, in changing work locations, in regulating the volume of the music, and in the conduct and appearance of the musicians.

The comment set out in the Restatement states that the right of control needed to establish the relation of master and servant may be very attenuated, that in some cases there may be an understanding that an employer shall not exercise control, citing as an example the status of a full-time cook as a servant, although it is understood that the employer will exercise no control over the cooking. On that basis and because of the nature of the evidence presented, I give more weight to the areas relied on by the General Counsel. The hotel management sets the ambiance of the room and, through subordinates, including the respective maitre d's, the preparation and service of food and beverages is blended with the decor of the room and the entertainment provided therein to achieve a unified object—to provide a delightful evening for its guests. The testimony of a witness called by the Respondent Association is worthy of note in that regard. Jimmy Stevens, a bandleader-booking agent-entrepreneur with many years of experience in Puerto Rico, stated the maitre d' of a room where music is provided to accompany food and beverage service is "the boss of his room [and] coordinates the elements that go towards a successful presentation of food and entertainment [and he] has full operational authority within his specific room." Testimony of other witnesses which I credit further establishes that the maitre d' can and does direct leaders to lower the volume of the music if he considers it too loud to permit guests to talk while eating. The maitre d' can stop the music to speed up service, he can instruct the leader to have the musical group work overtime, and he occasionally has the band play a particular style of music to appeal to a party of guests; e.g., he will call for Mexican music should he feel that it will please guests from that country. One of the very experienced leaders was asked on cross-examination whether he could choose not to follow the maitre d's request for him to play a certain type of music. He answered with a smile and the statement that he always chose to play as the maitre d' had requested. I have no doubt from the overall testimony that the bandleaders are delighted to receive such requests, that they frequently select certain songs to appeal to an ethnic group dining at one of the tables in the room, and that they invite guests to suggest the songs to be played. I also have no doubt that they would never consider refusing to comply with a maitre d's wishes.

The record is replete in this case with examples of the control exercised by a Class AA hotel vis-a-vis the musicians. It schedules the days and hours of work of the musicians, assigns them to the rooms in which they perform, approves the vacation requests of the leaders and not infrequently also those of the sidemen in their groups, restricts them from using the gambling casino between musical sets, directs them to rehearse with featured performers and schedules their hours of rehearsal, prohibits them from leaving their musical instruments against a wall, requires them to wear appropriate attire to fit in with the ambiance of the room, reduces the number of musicians in a group where feasible in its judgment, insists on a leader remaining on the bandstand to accept applause, and so on. The hotels control the style of the music as they require soft background music during dinner, livelier dancing music afterwards, followed by playing sheet music for featured performers, and in the late hours more dance music. One leader testified that he had a 15-piece orchestra which played vibrant Latin-American music on club dates; i.e., a one-night concert or the like. When he began as a leader of a band in a Class AA hotel, he kept only six of the musicians and had to hire four others. In addition, he had to modify his musical style so that it became indistinguishable from the style played by all other 10-piece hotel bands in Puerto Rico.

Respondents argue that the contracts between the hotels and the leaders in essence provide for all the foregoing. As I understand it, they are asserting that, because the band is performing in accordance with the contract its leader signed with the hotel, the musicians are contractors whose skills make them independent. That is not all that is to be evaluated. The Restatement clearly indicates that what is being evaluated is the relationship of the parties arising out of their agreement. No one suggests that the master-servant relationship as viewed in modern agency law retains the elements of serfdom out of which the common law principle evolved. It is assumed that the relationship is a consensual one and that the agreement could well be in writing. The matter before me is, as the Restatement indicates, the determination as to the nature of the relationship.

Respecting the element of control, the Respondents point to record testimony that the leaders do the hiring and firing of sidemen in their respective groups, that the musicians do not file the standard employment application forms at the hotels' personnel offices as do individuals seeking jobs as porters, desk clerks, and so on and that musicians are not given orientation training or detailed rules regulating their work duties as are maids, maintenance employees, and the like. That testimony is of relevance on the ultimate issue, as observed below, but the fact that the hotels closely control the work environs of certain classifications does not mean that I must disregard the extent of control hotels possess over the group whose status is in dispute, simply because the control is not of equal magnitude.

Let me close the discussion under this factor by observing that the Class AA hotels do possess considerable control over the details of the work environs of the musicians in this case.

2. Engaged in a distinct occupation

All the parties acknowledge that the musicians performing in the Class AA hotels are highly skilled and are in a clearly distinct occupation. The significance of this factor may not be as great today as it was in the early common law when servants were assigned to unskilled tasks and entrepreneurs performed the skilled work. In that regard, the Restatement notes that modern technological developments are having an impact on agency law. Thus, the Restatement observes that the captain of a ship can disregard the orders of the ship's owner and still the owner will be liable for the captain's negligence in controlling the ship. In view of this, I am inclined to give less weight to the fact that the musicians have a distinct occupation than to the element of control, discussed above.

3. Whether, in the locality, the work is usually done under the direction of the employer or by a specialist without supervision

The comment provided in the Restatement as to this factor is not, in my view, too helpful in deciding the issue posed in the instant case. The Restatement notes that area custom is a factor and then qualifies that observation by pointing out that skilled employees who resent interference are still servants if regularly employed, referring for example to cooks and gardeners. On the other hand, the Restatement observes that an individual employed for a specific job would not be a servant. It seems to me the emphasis is as much if not more on tenure than area custom.

Insofar as tenure is a consideration hereunder, the testimony discloses that, while the written contracts are for specific periods, they often are renewed and on frequent occasions, for year after year. In effect then the tenure is generally indefinite and often for many years.

4. The skills required

The musicians in this case are highly skilled and it is rare for an official of the hotel to impose his views on a leader respecting the performance of the group although there have been situations where a food and beverage manager has insisted on and obtained changes in the makeup of a group to satisfy his wish for a different musicial style or format.

5. The supplier of the instrumentalities, tools, and workplace

The Restatement comments that the fact that an individual supplies his own tools is some evidence that he is not a servant whereas, if he uses his employer's tools, it is normally understood that he will follow the owner's direction in their use and that indicates that the owner is a master. In the instant case, the musicians furnish their own instruments to a great extent, e.g., the saxophone and other small pieces, but the hotel furnishes the piano and often the sound-amplifying system. The leaders own and use their own sheet music; when performing with a featured star performer, the musicians use sheet music provided by the manager of the star performer.

Respecting the locale of the workplace, the hotels obviously provide the rooms in which the musicians perform. For that matter, the hotels set aside rooms to be used by the musicians during their rest periods. The Restatement, relative to this factor, contains an illustrative example. It states that coal miners who furnish their own helpers and their own explosives, but who are furnished with the larger machines and the means of ingress and egress by the owner of the mine who pays them for each ton of coal mined, are servants of the mine owner. That illustration suggests the analogy that, as the hotels in the instant case furnish the rooms where the musicians play, the piano and the amplification system which comprise the larger pieces of equipment, and the means of ingress and egress and as the hotels pay the musicians on an hourly basis, the musicians are servants within the meaning of the common law agency rules.

6. The length of the engagement

As noted above, the length of an engagement is normally indefinite insofar as the steady engagement musicians are concerned. Some groups have been with the same hotel for many years. It appears too that more than a few of the musicians have worked steadily for many years at one or another of the Class AA hotels in Puerto Rico.

7. Method of payment

Respondents have characterized the method used by the hotels to pay the musicians as "lump sum" payments. The method used is in fact virtually identical to the way an employee is paid. Regular weekly paychecks less the usual deductions are issued. The so-called lump sum figure set out in the Form B contract in essence establishes the regular weekly salary of each group member and does not cover overtime pay or other extras. My concept of a lump sum payment is one in which an owner pays a builder a total amount for a project at its inception or completion or at specific stages and no accounting is kept by the owner as to hours worked by the workers engaged by the builders, their rates of pay, and so on.

About the only area where the method of payments between a hotel and a musician can be said to be analogous to that between an owner-builder, as described above, pertains to the practice in Puerto Rico whereby musicians cover for each other in emergencies. On those occasions, it appears that the hotels and, for that matter, the leaders are not aware of the substitution until a group is ready to perform on a particular night. The hotels keep no record of such substitutes but treat the matter just as if the regular musician had appeared. This exception is a consideration. It also highlights the normal procedures which, inter alia, involve a musician showing his ID card at a payroll window each week to collect his paycheck.

The contract between a leader and a hotel occasionally provides the payment of a specified commission to a booking agent. That commission is not deducted from the so-called lump sum for the musicians but is paid by the hotel directly to the booking agent.

Respondents urge that little weight be given to the fact that hotels deduct income tax and other sums from the weekly paychecks of the musicians as it contends that the laws of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreements between the Union and the Respondent Association require that such deductions be made. The General Counsel disputes the assertion that Puerto Rican law expressly requires the hotels to make such deductions. On that point, it appears that a leader could obligate himself under Puerto Rican law to deduct such moneys and transmit them to the local tax authorities but he would first have to obtain an "employer" number from the tax officials and follow the requisite regulations not detailed in the record in this case. It is evident, however, that this procedure is not a practical one. The Respondent Association's own proposal during the last negotiations with the Union provided that the hotels would make such deductions on behalf of the leaders because the leaders do not have the facilities to handle those details.

With respect to the argument put forth by Respondents as to the reason why the hotels have made tax and other deductions from the musicians' weekly paychecks, it seems to me that I should accord significant weight to the fact that, for all practical purposes, the hotels are obligated to deduct and transmit such moneys and even more weight to the fact that the hotels have for years obligated themselves to do so under the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreements between the Union and the Respondent Association.

8. Whether the work is a part of the regular business of the employer

Respondents contend in the briefs they filed that the main primary business of the hotels in this case is to furnish lodging, not music. I am not sure that that statement is entirely accurate. The Class AA hotels in Puerto Rico are hardly wayside inns where weary travelers may find rest at night. Their distinguishing feature is that they operate gambling casinos and, in conjunction therewith, appeal to tourists by offering food, beverages, and musical entertainment. In that context, it seems clear that the work performed by the musicians is part of the regular business of the hotels.

9. The belief of the parties

The nature of the negotiations between the Union and the Association for many years in executing collective-bargaining agreements pertaining to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, the internal operations of the Respondent Association insofar as they pertain to its dealingswith the Union, including the fact that the member hotels entered into a mutual aid and protection pact to guard against whipsaw tactics by the Union, the use of conciliation services by the Respondent Association and the Union; the language used by hotel officials in directing musicians, in contesting civil actions brought by musicians, in responding to inquiries from banks and from local agencies—all these point strongly to a belief by the parties that a master-servant relationship existed. It is true that whenever this belief surfaced, the Respondent Association denied that the hotels were employers of the musicians. Also, the Union's president did sign a statement prepared by the Respondent Association which provided that the parties agreed that the hotels were not employers of musicians.

I think that more weight should be given to their acts rather than to their conclusionary denials or admissions in determining what they actually accepted as to the nature of the relationship of the hotels vis-a-vis the musicians.

10. Whether the principal is in business

The Restatement does not provide any comment as to this factor. Presumably, this factor refers to the likelihood that one who is not in a regular business, e.g., an owner of a house, normally enters into contracts with independent contractors as to house maintenance and does not normally hire employees to perform such work. That factor has no bearing on the issue in this case.

11. Other factors

Section 220(2) states that the foregoing 10 factors, among others, are to be considered in resolving the agency issue. In this section I will discuss those aspects of the evidence which do not fall readily under any of the above 10 listed factors.

(a) Comparison of working conditions

Respondents note that there are significant differences between the working conditions applicable to the musicians and to individuals whom it concedes to be regular hotel employees; e.g., maids, desk clerks. I suppose that differences must exist in order for the issue in this case to be raised. Voluminous testimony and numerous exhibits in evidence demonstrate these differences, and also a number of similarities in the way the hotels dealt with the musicians and with individuals they view as employees. The differences in great part had to do with personnel procedures in that applicants for jobs as porters filled out personnel forms, and were interviewed and hired by personnel department officials and then were given orientation training, job training and booklets containing rules and regulations; musicians were not given any of these forms or booklets and obviously already had competence in their particular area. The similarities may, however, be entitled to greater weight. Thus, the leaders of musical groups were often the recipients of interoffice memoranda which indicated that they were part of the supervisory structure of the hotels. Also, the records kept by the leaders as to regular hours worked by musicians, overtime hours, and as to "doubling" moneys due are akin to duties traditionally performed by a supervisor. Further the musicians were given ID cards by the hotels, free meals in the employee cafeterias, employee discounts, and so on.

(b) Use of the Form B contract

Another miscellaneous area involves the language and use of the Form B contract. The General Counsel stresses the language therein that refers to the hotel as an employer. The record evidence is clear however that the only parts of that form that ever meant anything were the weekly salaries, the starting date of an engagement, and the signature lines.

(c) The Association's legal status

The Respondent Association notes that its own articles of incorporation and bylaws contain no provision whereby it is authorized to negotiate collective-bargaining agreements. I am not sure I understand the import of that observation; the doctrine of ultra vires is used to prevent corporate acts but not to excuse them. In any event, I attach significant weight to the provisions of the mutual aid pact drafted by the Respondent Association.

(d) Entrepreneurial risk

The Restatement, strangely, does not refer to entrepreneurial risk in determining whether one is a servant or an independent contractor. In any event, the musician in the instant case is an hourly wage earner protected by unemployment and disability insurance with provision for sick days and allowances for a vacation. The hotels even assume liability if his musical instrument is stolen from the musician's room. There is virtually no risk of pecuniary loss for a Class AA hotel musician, in the ordinary business sense.

(e) The "Pat Mills" case

In a decision issued in 1979, the Board found that the leaders of a musical group that performed at one of the Class AA hotels, the El San Juan, were self-employed persons.[17] That case was referred to by the parties at the hearing before me as the "Pat Mills" case as the name of the musical group in that case consisted of Pat Mills and Peter LaJeunesse, d/b/a Pat Mills and Company. In that case, as discussed above, the Pat Mills group came from New York to put on a show at the El San Juan and were forced to leave by the Union, the Charging Party in the instant case, when it threatened to call a strike among its members performing at the El San Juan hotel. There was no issue raised in that case as to the independent contractor status of the Pat Mills group. The Union admitted that the leaders of that group were self-employed persons. It sought to defend on the ground that its object was purely work preservation; however, it was held that the evidence showed that the Union violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) and (B) and Section 8(e).

Counsel for Respondent El San Juan stated in his brief, relative to another point, that all musical groups are self-employed whether they perform on a single engagement basis (i.e., one-night shows, also called a club date) or a steady engagement basis (as do the musicians in the Class AA hotels). He observes that a steady engagement is simply an extended club date.

The question that concerned me is whether the General Counsel could contend, as he did successfully in the Pat Mills case, that the musical group there was engaged by the Hotel El San Juan on an independent contractor basis and still argue before me that the regular musical groups are employees. The short answer is that he can as it is settled law that each case turns on its own facts. In that regard, I note that there are some apparent differences between the Pat Mills group and the Puerto Rican musicians involved in the instant case and that, in any event, the independent contractor issue was not litigated in the Pat Mills case.

It is my finding, after weighing all of the relevant facts in this case in the light of the guidelines set out by the Restatement, that there exists an employer-employee relationship between the Class AA hotels and the musicians involved in this case, rather than that of an independent contractor arrangement. The attributes of the status of these musicians vis-a-vis the hotels are closely akin to those of individuals who concededly are hotel employees, despite the obvious lack of any real community of interest between the musicians and those employees. Further, the long history of collective bargaining, the significant areas of control possessed and exercised by the hotels over the musicians, the close integration of their work with the hotels' operations and functions, the fact that the musicians run virtually no risk of pecuniary loss, the fact that the leaders of the musical groups perform functions substantially equivalent to a first-line supervisor in charge of a departmental unit of skilled individuals, and the other points noted above—all persuade me that a master-servant relationship exists, as contemplated by the common law rules of agency, between the musicians and the Class AA hotels in this case. In accordance with established principles, the musicians are thus found to be employees as defined in Section 2(3) of the Act and not independent contractors. I further find that the leaders of the musical groups in this case, inter alia, responsibly direct the work of the musicians and that they are thus supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

B. The Appropriate Unit

There are three matters to be considered in determining the scope of the appropriate unit. The first relates to the General Counsel's contention that three of the Class AA hotels attempted to withdraw from the association, wide unit in an untimely manner; the second involves the claim of the Respondent Association that the leaders' historical inclusion in the unit rendered it inappropriate; the third has to do with defining the overall scope of the unit.

The complaint alleges that the appropriate unit consists of all steady engagement musicians employed by the hotel members of the Respondent Association exclusive of bandleaders and independent contractors. The General Counsel contends that Respondents El San Juan hotel, El Conquistador Hotel, and The Palace Hotel were members of the Association for purposes of bargaining collectively with the Union and that they sought to withdraw from that unit after negotiations for a renewal contract were well underway. These three Respondents, through counsel, have asserted that they were not members of the Association and hence that they have no obligations as to anyone with respect to the unit alleged in the complaint. The evidence is clear that these hotels are commonly owned and controlled and administer a common labor relations policy. In that regard, their representatives (principally Louis Puro and Sam Schweitzer) have signed contracts negotiated by the Respondent Association and the Union covering steady engagement musicians and had aligned themselves with officials of other Class AA hotels in formulating and implementing a mutual aid and protection pact designed to counter any whipsaw tactics that the Union might attempt. These three hotels made no effort to withdraw from the unit until after the Union had, as requested by the Respondent Association, presented its list of bargaining demands. Moreover, Puro made it clear before the strike began that he would follow the Association's lead and he made it clear too when the strike ended that the contract negotiated with the Association was acceptable to him and he even agreed to the minimum number of musicians his hotels would use. I thus find that, at all times material to this case, Respondents El San Juan, El Conquistador, and The Palace were part of the Associationwide unit for purposes of collective bargaining with the Union.[18] Their refusal to honor the commitments made on their behalf by the Respondent Association constitute unlawful bargaining.[19]

The next consideration involves the fact that for years the bandleaders were part of the recognized unit. Respondents contend that their inclusion compels a finding that the unit is inappropriate. I note that the unit placement of leaders was never an issue in the negotiations. To invalidate the substantial impact of those negotiations now after so many years, especially where it is well settled that the inclusion of supervisors in a unit does not render it inappropriate,[20] would undermine the stability reached in that whole area. Rather, the exclusion now of the leaders is appropriate as either party to the negotiations may opt, at any time, to exclude them without destroying the employee unit itself.[21]

The third matter to be considered pertains to the scope of the unit. In the complaint, it was alleged that the musicians employed by all 34 hotel members of the Respondent Association constitute an appropriate unit. The issue was more closely defined in the course of the hearing as the parties addressed themselves to the specific question as to the musicians employed by the Class AA hotels in Puerto Rico and the related contract negotiations. More specifically the signatory hotels to the mutual aid and protection pact in late 1978 and the participation of the Class AA hotels in negotiating through the Respondent Association establish the scope of the overall unit—all steady engagement musicians employed by the Class AA hotels in Puerto Rico excluding leaders, independent contractors, travelers, and all other employees.

C. The Union's Majority Status

The Respondent Association has denied that the Union has represented an uncoerced majority of the unit employees, noting in that regard that the Union had never been certified by the Board as their bargaining representative and that some of the musicians had joined the Union years ago because, in their view, no musician would work with them if they did not join the Union. It appears too that some of these musicians, and others, were of the view that the Union enhanced their status as musicians. Throughout the course of the negotiations in 1979, all the musicians in the unit involved herein were members of the Union. It was not until after the strike was over that some musicians resigned from the Union or were dropped from its membership rolls because of their failure to remain current in their payment of dues to the Union.

I see no basis to conclude that the Union did not represent an uncoerced majority. The evidence is clear that at all material times the Union has been the choice of the majority of the unit musicians. I had some pause by reason of the involvement of supervisory personnel, i.e., the leaders, in union affairs, but it is evident that the unit employees rejected the efforts of the leaders to block a strike. Union membership by leaders does not per se impair the Union's majority status.[22]

D. Alleged Unlawful Conditions Imposed by the Respondent Association as to Continuation or Resumption of Collective Bargaining

The Respondent Association maintains that it never expressly conditioned bargaining with the Union on its first withdrawing unfair labor practice charges or on its conceding that the musicians are not hotel employees. The Respondent Association nevertheless acknowledges that the status of the musicians as hotel employees was a threshold issue that had, by necessity, to be solved before bargaining could continue. While the Respondent Association's agents may not have stated that view in haec verba during the actual negotiations, there is no question that it insisted that the Union in essence must acknowledge that the unit employees were without the protection of the Act before any raise in wages or related matters could be considered or discussed. In view of the finding above that the musicians are employees of the hotels entitled to the protection of the Act, the actions of the Respondent Association and its member hotels in conditioning bargaining as indicated herein constituted unlawful refusals to bargain collectively with the Union.

The Respondent Association, Respondent Caribe Hilton, Respondent Condado Holiday Inn, and Respondent El San Juan, El Conquistador, and Palace all promoted the use of various forms of personal service contracts to be signed by the Class AA hotels and leaders of musical groups. In and of themselves those form contracts could not be violative of the Act as they represent, in the context of this case, simply arrangements between employers and their supervisory personnel. What is improper, however, is the acknowledged purpose of those personal service contracts. Their use was promulgated and obviously used and known in the music industry in Puerto Rico in furtherance of the position of the hotels that they are not employers of the musicians performing in the hotels. Simply stated, the personal service contracts were adopted and used to make it clear to all, including the employees themselves, that the hotels would not bargain collectively with the Union respecting the wage rates and other terms of employment of the hotel musicians. In effect, the use of the personal service contracts was but a variation of the method by which these Respondents unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union, as found above.[23] I shall, however, dismiss the allegation that the hotels' use of such personal service contracts constituted unlawful unilateral changes as the subject matter is not one requiring collective bargaining. Insofar as the personal service contracts pertain solely to arrangements among supervisory personnel, the Union would have no right to bargain thereon; insofar as they purport to deny that the musicians are hotel employees, the Union's bargaining cannot change that fact. While it is true as the General Counsel argues that the changes in the methods of paying musicians as contemplated by those personal services contracts constitute unilateral changes as to which bargaining should be required, those changes were but incidental to the basic violation found. The greater encompasses the lesser.

E. Alleged Unilateral Change in Language of the Recognition Clause

There was considerable dispute at the hearing as to whether the Respondent Association had unilaterally inserted the letters AFM in the recognition clause of the 1979-81 contract before it was signed. Thus, the Union's president testified that he had never agreed to that insertion and was not aware that those letters had been inserted into the final draft of the contract when he signed it. Counsel for the Respondent Association, Soto, testified that her notes at a negotiating session in February 1979 reflect that the Union's president and the Respondent Association's executive director reached agreement on a number of items which they then initialed and that, sometime later that day, the Union had agreed with the Respondent Association that the Union's contract would not apply to groups such as the Pat Mills group. (It appears that that the Respondent Association's members were concerned that somehow the 1978 contract might enable the Union to do legally what the Board had enjoined it from doing as a result of the Pat Mills case, discussed above.) The Union acknowledges that the contract does not cover such groups as Pat Mills, either because they are "travelers" or "independent contractors" but it maintains still that it never expressly agreed to the insertion of the letters, AFM, in the recognition clause. The Respondent Association notes that in the final drafts of prior contracts minor language insertions have been made to reflect informal understandings. It appears that neither side is contending that the parties agreed that the contract was a members-only contract.[24]

While the evidence is that the parties did not expressly agree to the insertion of the letters AFM, I find that the evidence is insufficient to establish that the Respondent Association unilaterally changed the agreed-upon contractual language by inserting those letters prior to final signature. The insertion was consistent with the intent of the parties, however informal the agreement was thereon. Similar modifications of minor points have been done before. I am not persuaded that the fact that the Union's president did not, when he signed the final draft of the contract, consciously assent to the use of that insertion, requires a finding that he did not assent to its use. In short, the Union and the Association reached an informal agreement as to the scope of the recognition clause, the Association sometime later made a change to reflect that agreement as has been the practice in the past, and the Union signed the document without objection. That does not add up to an unlawful unilateral change, notwithstanding that, at first blush, the recognition clause could easily be misread to indicate that the parties had signed a members-only contract.

IV. THE ALLEGED DISCRIMINATORY DISCHARGE OF PEDRO CHICLANA BY RESPONDENT CARIBE HILTON AND ALLEGED INDEPENDENT VIOLATIONS OF SECTION 8(A)(1) OF THE ACT

A. The Relevant Testimony and Related Credibility Resolutions

1. General background

The General Counsel alleges that the Respondent Caribe Hilton, by its supervisor, Bandleader Jose Juan Pinero, discharged its musician employee, Pedro Chiclana, because of his activities as a member of the Union and interfered with the Section 7 rights of its musician employees by reason of other conduct by Pinero, discussed in more detail below. The Respondent denies that Pinero is a supervisor in its employ and contends that, even if he were, none of his actions were violative of the Act.

Pedro Chiclana began working at the Caribe Hilton hotel on December 20, 1971, as a saxophonist and as a flutist. From about 1973 or 1974, he performed at the Club Caribe in the Caribe Hilton hotel under the leadership of Jose Juan Pinero as part of a group known as Pijuan and his sextet. He had been a member of the [23] As no evidence was offered that the La Concha-Condado Beach complex used such personal service contracts, the General Counsel's motion, made in its brief, to withdraw the complaint allegation thereon, is granted.

[24] One of the officials of the Respondent Association testified that he had expressed the opinion to other officials of the Association that the letters, AFM, indicated that the contract applied only to musicians who were members of the Union. On advice of counsel, the Association concedes that the contract covers hotel musicians, regardless of union membership.

Union for many years as had Pinero. For that matter, Pinero had been much more active in union affairs than Chiclana had been. Pinero had, for a 2-year period, held the position as vice president of the Union and had also been a member of an advisory council to the Union's president.

2. Alleged independent violations of Section 8(a)(1)

In February 1979, about 100 members of the Union gathered at its meeting hall to vote on contract ratification. The contract was rejected. A strike vote was then scheduled to be taken. Pinero protested and spoke out against the Union's calling a strike. In the absence of any evidence thereon, I assume that Chiclana took no active part one way or the other at that meeting. The strike vote was taken and, as a result, an immediate strike was authorized.

Chiclana testified that, after the strike vote was taken and while he was in the driveway outside the building in which the vote had been taken, Pinero approached him and others who were in the Pijuan sextet. Chiclana testified that Pinero said to them then that he did not want them on the picket line and that they were to meet with him later that evening in the musicians' room in the Caribe Hilton hotel. One of the other members of the Pijuan sextet at that time, Hector Negron, also testified at the hearing. However, he made no reference to such a meeting in the driveway that day. Pinero testified that he never had given any order to Chiclana to refrain from picketing; Pinero did not refer to any meeting of his sextet in the building's driveway, as Chiclana had. Although Pinero's denial is summary in nature and Chiclana's account is detailed, I am not persuaded, especially as Negron failed to corroborate Chiclana's testimony on the point, that the General Counsel has shown affirmatively that Pinero issued an instruction to members of his sextet on the day of the strike vote to refrain from picketing. Pinero's denial is thus credited.

Chiclana further testified that, when he arrived at the Caribe Hilton later that night, there were several pickets outside. He said that one of them recognized him as a member of the Pijuan sextet and pulled him onto the picket line. Chiclana related that, about 20 minutes later, Pinero arrived at the hotel and that, when he saw Chiclana on the picket line, he told Chiclana that he did not want to see him on the picket line. Chiclana further stated that after about 2 hours he noticed that he and a few other musicians were the only ones from the Caribe Hilton who were on the picket line then and that he decided to go into the hotel. He testified that he left the picket line and that, as he entered the musicians' room, he heard Pinero arguing with a union delegate, Chico Rivera, telling Rivera that he, Pinero, did not have to order his musicians to go outside; i.e., join the strike. Chiclana said that the leader of another group performing at the Caribe Hilton, namely, Mario Ortiz, intervened and suggested that everyone should go outside to discuss the matter on the picket line. Chiclana said that most of the musicians went outside to the picket line.

Pinero testified that he had told the union delegate that evening that he was in no hurry to get on the picket line but that later everyone did go out. Pinero said that he too "went out in the picket line" where he observed that one placard referred to him as "rat." Pinero denied ever expressly instructing members of his sextet to refrain from picketing. In view of the confusion respecting the precise sequence of events, the excitement caused by the first strike among musicians in the hotel industry in Puerto Rico and the fact that no witnesses were offered by the General Counsel to corroborate Chiclana's statements that the members of the sextet were ordered by Pinero not to picket, I am not satisfied that the General Counsel has sustained his burden of proving affirmatively that Chiclana's version is more credible than Pinero's denials.[25] In that regard, I note that a union delegate named Rivera testified at the hearing but on a point entirely distinct from any argument with Pinero, as recounted by Chiclana.

During the strike of the hotels' musicians, the Pijuan sextet (with some minor changes, e.g., the singer was replaced) performed at a television studio located adjacent to the Caribe Hilton. Chiclana continued to perform there with the sextet, notwithstanding that during those same months he was doing picketing duty at the hotels Sometime before the strike ended Pinero resigned from membership in the Union. The sextet, including Chiclana, resumed performing at the Caribe Hilton when the strike ended.

The General Counsel presented three witnesses, including Chiclana, who testified that, at a meeting in the musicians' room at the Caribe Hilton shortly after the strike ended in late April 1979, a union official sought to collect "taxes"; i.e., working dues to be paid to the union. At that meeting, according to these witnesses, Pinero said that he himself had discontinued paying "taxes" to the Union and that he wanted the musicians in his group also to stop paying "taxes." Pinero's testimony was general in nature and in essence was a statement that he never engaged in any action, as alleged in the complaint, that he had interfered with the musicians' right to pay "taxes" to the Union. Pinero acknowledged that there had been a meeting pertaining to the payment of taxes but did not elaborate on it. I credit the accounts of the General Counsel's witnesses as they were substantially consistent and detailed, in contrast to the summary nature of Pinero's version.

3. Chiclana's discharge

During the strike, the Pijuan sextet (with a different singer) began performing as part of an early evening television show. It continued with that show after the strike ended when it resumed playing at the Club Caribe in the Caribe Hilton hotel.

On June 27, 1979, Chiclana arrived at the television studio just prior to the start of the show featuring the Pijuan sextet. While he was chatting in the parking lot with some friends, Pinero drove in and a few minutes later walked by Chiclana and told him abruptly to go inside. Chiclana testified that whenever Pinero is in a mood, such as he was that day, his musicians "can't even breathe" for fear of being made the object of his wrath. In any event, it is undisputed that, soon after the sextet settled down to rehearse prior to the start of the show, a shouting match took place between Pinero and Chiclana. It is not entirely clear to me but I do not think the General Counsel is asserting that Respondent Caribe Hilton prearranged such a confrontation in order to have an excuse to discharge Chiclana. If somehow there is such a contention, I reject it as the event had the hallmark of an unanticipated confrontation between an unusually tense leader and a sideman, somewhat more relaxed in nature until, as unquestionably happened, Pinero ordered him to put on the appropriate attire. At that point, the only question was which one became the more excitable. The parties spent considerable time attempting to show which one of the participants was principally at fault. In my view it makes no difference as the argument was purely personal in nature and had nothing to do with Chiclana's membership in the Union. For that matter, it appears that Chiclana was at that time delinquent in his dues payments to the Union and had not, at that point, been involved in any union activities, other than his having picketed months previously along with many other musicians, including it seems other members of the Pijuan sextet. In any event, Pinero and Chiclana calmed down in time for the start of the TV show. At its conclusion, Pinero walked from the studio to the Caribe Hilton hotel which was nearby and where he composed a letter giving Chiclana 2 weeks' termination notice "in compliance with [Chiclana's] request." He gave this letter to Chiclana later on June 27.

[25] For the same reason, I am unable to credit Chiclana's further testimony that, on the same day of the strike, Pinero saw him on the picket line at the Caribe Hilton and told him to leave. Chiclana testified that, as a result, he moved to a picket line outside another hotel.

Chiclana took the letter to the Union's office the next day, paid his dues delinquencies, and obtained the assistance of a union official in drafting a response. On that same day, June 28, Chiclana gave Pinero a letter signed by him, Chiclana, which stated that Pinero's letter of June 27 was "completely erroneous."

Pinero read the letter. Chiclana testified that Pinero then told him that the letter was not prepared by Chiclana but was done by the Union and that he (Pinero) assumed that Chiclana had paid his taxes to the Union. Pinero testified that he simply told Chiclana that the Union's secretary had written the letter for him and Chiclana acknowledged that this was true.

On July 5, Pinero advised Chiclana that he was adhering to his decision to terminate Chiclana upon the completion of the 2 weeks' notification period; i.e., July 11. Chiclana testified that Pinero then told him in a loud voice to go look for another job and that he, Chiclana, told Pinero not to raise his voice. Thereupon, according to Chiclana, Pinero put his finger on Chiclana's chest and ordered him to be quiet. Pinero's account of that incident is that he saw Chiclana apparently "bragging" to other musicians and that he then spoke to Chiclana privately to urge him to let things quiet down and "to leave the door open." Pinero testified that Chiclana nevertheless called him vile names and asked him to step outside, apparently to settle the matter by fighting. On July 6, Pinero handed Chiclana a letter which related that he, Pinero, was adhering to his determination to discharge Chiclana as of July 11. The letter noted that "there does not exist any regulation at union level (or elsewhere) that forces" a leader to keep a person who is unable to comply "with the most elementary rules of ethics, discipline etc." The letter ended by Pinero's advising Chiclana that he has by his demeanor and language "ruined all chances of staying with the group."

Chiclana further testified that, upon the completion of the performance at the Club Caribe on July 11, Pinero told him that he was a good musician and that the other musicians wanted Pinero to give him another chance but that it was, in effect, necessary for Pinero to go through with his discharge of Chiclana because this was the "best example" to show that the Union's strike had been a "failure" and that the contract the Union had reached with the Association was also a "failure."

Pinero testified that on Chiclana's last day of employment he told Chiclana that he was sorry about it, that this was a hard lesson for him (Chiclana), and that perhaps some day Chiclana could return to the group when his behavior improved. Pinero said that Chiclana responded by saying he disagreed with Pinero and by assuring Pinero that he would be back to work the next day. (It appears that for several nights thereafter Chiclana did come to the Club Caribe lounge to sit near the sextet but he has not played with it since.)

In his pre-trial affidavit, Pinero related that he had stated that the fact that Chiclana had gone to the Union had created "more antagonism." At the hearing, he stated that this was true.

The General Counsel has failed to persuade me that Chiclana's account of his conversation with Pinero on the last night he worked with the Pijuan sextet was more credible than Pinero's account. It seems unlikely to me that Pinero would first have stated in writing, as he did, that Chiclana had by his behavior toward him (Pinero) ruined forever his chances of continuing with the sextet and then say, in effect, to Chiclana that he would have kept him as part of the group but for the fact that Chiclana had gone to the Union. Pinero's version is consistent with the preceding events. The impact of Pinero's statement that Chiclana's having gone to the Union had created "more antagonism" is discussed below in the following subsection.

It is undisputed that Chiclana was the first musician that Pinero has fired and that, since July 11, 1974, Chiclana has not performed at the Caribe Hilton hotel.

The General Counsel also proffered evidence respecting the status of Pinero as a supervisor for the Caribe Hilton Hotel. In good part, this testimony has been set out above in section III, under the subsection for the Caribe Hilton. In addition, the following data was submitted. In 1978, the hotel's managing director had a meeting of all the hotel's musicians and informed them that Pinero had been promoted to the position of musical director by the hotel's general manager and that refreshments were then served. Pinero testified that this was an honorary title. He received records from the leader of the 10-piece orchestra at that hotel pertaining to hours worked by the musicians in that group and turned those notes in to the hotel's controller for payroll processing. Pinero, according to one musician in his group, instructed him to stop going to the casino, as did the maitre d' of the room in which they played. On one occasion, Chiclana was given a device by Pinero which, when inserted in the mouthpiece of the saxophone, amplified the sound. According to Chiclana, Pinero directed him to cease using it and told Chiclana that the hotel wanted its use discontinued because it created too loud a sound which was not in keeping with the style of music desired. Pinero testified that the discontinuance of the device was his own decision. Pinero is given free parking space by the hotel; the musicians pay the same fee for parking as do other individuals; e.g., maintenance workers, whom all parties concede are statutory employees.

The Respondent Caribe Hilton offered testimony that Pinero was an independent contractor. Thus, Pinero testified that he arranges his own music and does not use stock arrangements which can be purchased at a music store. He rehearses his group each Saturday and decides what music will be played. He takes his group on cruises and on television assignments and generally takes his vacation from the hotel at the same time he lets his group go on vacation. In that regard, only he, Pinero, seeks approval from the food and beverage manager as to when to take his vacation but the musicians in his group deal only with him, Pinero, and not with the hotel's food and beverage manager. When the sextet vacations, Pinero arranges for a group to substitute for them at the hotel and pays that group himself. Pinero testified that he decides the amounts to be paid. The record does not disclose how long or how frequent are the vacation periods but, presumably, they are taken in accordance with the vacation provisions of the contract between the Respondent Association and the Union.

B. Analysis as to Alleged Discrimination and Interference

1. The alleged discriminatory discharge of Chiclana

The credited testimony establishes that on June 27, 1979, Chiclana and Pinero got into a heated argument which was unrelated to the Union and which resulted in Pinero's giving Chiclana notice that his employment would be terminated 2 weeks hence. In that interval, they had more arguments of a personal nature. Pinero made it clear that he viewed Chiclana's behavior as outrageous and discharged Chiclana at the end of the 2-week period. The foregoing discloses no evidentiary basis to support a finding that Chiclana was discharged for his union activities. The General Counsel contends that, in any event, Pinero's concession that Chiclana's having gone to the Union created "more antagonism" establishes that Chiclana's discharge was based on unlawful discriminatory motivation. I disagree. That statement must be taken in context. In that regard, the testimony of the General Counsel's own witnesses was that Pinero was a high-strung individual who could not brook the slightest challenge to his authority. The General Counsel further adduced evidence that Chiclana stood up to Pinero's attempts to intimidate him and that, in doing so, Chiclana referred to Pinero in vulgar terms. Whether or not he was justified in doing so is not my concern. There is no question but that Pinero was outraged by Chiclana's behavior. Pinero testified that Chiclana, in effect, "bragged" that Pinero could not discharge him. Chiclana's own conduct after his discharge suggests that Pinero's testimony on that point was accurate. In these circumstances, I infer that Pinero's comment that Chiclana's having gone to the Union for aid in retaining his job had created "more antagonism" referred not to discriminatory motivation but simply to Pinero's apparent belief that Chiclana was willfully disobeying him and that Chiclana was flaunting his contempt for Pinero in part because he, Chiclana, was assured of the Union's support. To take the phrase "more antagonism" out of context as clear evidence of unlawful discrimination would require me to ignore all the relevant evidence to the contrary. I find that the evidence is insufficient to establish that Chiclana's termination of employment was discriminatorily motivated.

2. The alleged independent violations of Section 8(a)(1)

The complaint alleges that on June 28, 1979, Pinero as a supervisory employee of Respondent Caribe Hilton had created the impression that the Respondent was engaging in surveillance of the union activities of its musician employees. In support thereof, the General Counsel submitted testimony that, when Chiclana handed him the letter dated June 28, that a union official helped him prepare, Pinero told him that the letter was prepared by a union official he named. If that were the only relevant evidence, there might be merit to the allegation. There is, however, evidence in the record that Pinero had been a vice president of the Union for 2 years and had been a member of its advisory council. Presumably, Chiclana as a long-time union member knew this. In that context, I more easily conclude that Pinero's statement did not create the impression of surveillance of union activities but simply revealed that Pinero was familiar with the respective styles in which Chiclana and the named union official communicated and that Pinero wanted Chiclana to know that he could not claim credit for it. I find no merit in the allegation that the Respondent Caribe Hilton had thereby created the impression that it was engaging in surveillance of union activities.

The General Counsel also asserts that Pinero's remark to Chiclana on July 11, as discussed in detail above, that the fact that Chiclana had gone to the Union for assistance created "more antagonism" independently violated Section 8(a)(1). In context with the surrounding events, as considered above, the statement was not violative of the Act in any way.

There is a separate allegation in the complaint that Pinero's orders to members of the Pijuan sextet at the outset of the strike to refrain from picketing constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1). Based on the credibility resolutions made, as set out above, I find that that allegation is without merit.

Lastly, the General Counsel contends that the statements by Pinero on two occasions to musician employees of the Caribe Hilton hotel that they were not to pay "taxes" to the Union were violative of Section 8(a)(1). I credited the General Counsel's witnesses as to only the second occasion, in June 1979.

I have also found above that the musicians in this case, including Pinero are employees of the Class AA hotels. I now further find that Pinero was a supervisor of the Respondent Caribe Hilton, as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act. Specifically, the evidence demonstrates that Pinero held the title of musical director of the Caribe Hilton hotel as given him by the hotel's manager at a cocktail party held to announce the event, that in his duties at the hotel he received communications in writing from the hotel's food and beverage manager on "inter-office" memorandum which pertained to the supervison of the musician emoloyees, that he collected and transmitted to the hotel's payroll section various records needed to compute the paychecks of the respective musicians, that he distributed to individual musicians paychecks drawn by the hotel to the order of each musician, that he responsibly directed the musicians in his group in the interest of the hotel's goal to offer food, beverages, dancing, atmosphere, and service to its clientel and that he possessed and exercised the authority to hire and discharge musicians performing with the Pijuan sextet at the Club Caribe in the hotel. It is apparent that Pinero meets at least one of the statutory criteria set out in Section 2(11) and thus is a supervisor as so defined.

I thus conclude that the Respondent Caribe Hilton violated Section 8(a)(1) when Pinero told the musicians in June 1979 not to pay their "taxes" to the Union. I find no merit as to the allegation that he had made substantially the same comment in April 1979 as there is no credible evidence thereon.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Puerto Rico Hotel Association, Hilton International Company d/b/a Caribe Hilton Hotel, Hilton International Company d/b/a La Concha Hotel-Condado Beach Hotel, Condado Holiday Inn, San Juan Hotel Corporation d/b/a El San Juan Hotel and El Conquistador Hotel, and the Puerto Rico Hotel Corporation d/b/a The Palace Hotel, are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Federacion de Musicos de Puerto Rico, Local 468, American Federation of Musicians, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All musicians employed by Class AA hotels excluding travelers, independent contractors, all other employees, leaders and all other supervisors as defined in the Act, comprise a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times material herein, the above-named labor organization has been and is now the exclusive representative of the employees employed in the unit described above in paragraph 3 for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By having refused, since on or about January 8, 1979 to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization in that it insisted, as a threshold issue in bargaining, that this labor organization admit that the employees in the unit it represents are not employees of the Class AA hotels and in connection therewith by insisting that the labor organization withdraw unfair labor practice charges it had filed which asserted that the unit employees are employees of these hotels, the Respondent Puerto Rico Hotel Association has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. The Respondent Puerto Rico Hotel Association and the following Respondents whom it represents for purposes of collective bargaining: Hilton International Company d/b/a Caribe Hilton Hotel, Condado Holiday Inn, San Juan Hotel Corporation d/b/a El San Juan Hotel and El Conquisdator Hotel, and The Puerto Rico Hotel Corporation d/b/a The Palace Hotel have, since on or about June 18, 1979, refused and are refusing to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization by promoting the use of and using personal service contracts with leaders of musical groups of employees of Class AA hotels in Puerto Rico in furtherance of its unlawful disclaimer that the said musicians employees are employees of the Class AA hotels.

7. The Respondents San Juan Hotel Corporation d/b/a El San Juan Hotel and El Conquistador Hotel, and the Puerto Rico Hotel Corporation d/b/a The Palace Hotel have refused and continue to refuse since on or about November 27, 1978, to bargain collectively in that they have stated then they no longer recognize the Union as the bargaining agent of their musician employees and also sought to withdraw the authority they issued to the Respondent Puerto Rico Hotel Association to negotiate a renewal contract with the above-named organization vis-a-vis the unit of employees described above in paragraph 3 despite the fact that, at that time, the renewal contract negotiations were substantially underway and in that the said Respondents have failed and refused and are failing and refusing to honor the collective-bargaining agreement reached on about April 30, 1979, between the said labor organization with the Respondent Puerto Rico Hotel Association notwithstanding that said Respondents have reached agreement with the said labor organization as to the minimum number of musicians to be employed by them and the said Respondents by the foregoing conduct have engaged in and are engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

8. The Respondent Puerto Rico Hotel Associaton did not, in violation of the Act, unilaterally change the agreed-upon recognition clause of its current agreement with the above-named labor organization.

9. The Respondent Hilton International Company, d/b/a Caribe Hilton Hotel, did not, in violation of the Act, (a) discharge its employee Pedro Chiclana because of his activities on behalf of the above-named labor organization, (b) create the impression that it engaged in the surveillance of activities of employees on behalf of that labor organization, (c) impliedly warn employees against supporting that labor organization, (d) direct its musician employees not to strike or picket, (e) instruct its musicians in April 1979 not to pay working dues to the Union but it has interfered with, restrained, and coerced its emoloyees with respect to their rights under Section 7 of the Act by having, through its supervisor, Juan Pinero, instructed its musician employees in June 1979 that they are not to pay working dues to the said labor organization and thus the Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

10. The Respondents Puerto Rico Hotel Association, San Juan Hotel Corporation d/b/a El San Juan Hotel and El Conquistador, The Puerto Hotel Corporation d/b/a The Palace Hotel, Hilton International Company d/b/a Caribe Hilton Hotel, and Condado Holiday Inn, did not in violation of Section 8(a)(1) or (5) of the Act unilaterally change the terms and conditions of employment of its musician employees by promoting the use of, or by using, personal service contracts with their respective supervisors.

11. By the refusals to bargain collectively with the Union as set out above in paragraph 5, 6, and 7, the Respondents named therein have interfered with, restrained, and coerced and are interfering with, restraining, and coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act and thereby have engaged in and are engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

12. The activities of each Respondent set forth above, occurring in connection with its operations also described above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondents have engaged in and are engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I find it necessary to order that they cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act. Those Respondent hotels found to have separately violated the Act will be ordered to post the notice to be signed by the Association in addition to the notices remedying the violations they committed as the areas found to be violative are overlapping. Those Class AA hotels not otherwise involved will not be ordered to post notices as copies of the Association's notice will be sent to the Union's office where all employees in the unit will have the opportunity to read it.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact and conclusions of law, upon the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[26]

I. Respondent Puerto Rico Hotel Association, herein called the Association, San Juan, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with Federacion de Musicos de Puerto Rico, Local 468, American Federation of Musicians, AFL-CIO, by insisting that the officials of the Union state or acknowledge in writing that musicians employed by the Class AA hotels in Puerto Rico are not employees of those hotels entitled to the rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the Act or by requiring the Union to withdraw unfair labor practice charges it filed to protect those rights.

(b) Refusing to bargain collectively with the Union by promoting the use of personal service contracts by Class AA hotels whereby hotel supervisors who lead and direct musician employees purport to be the employers of those musicians in derogation of the Union's status as exclusive collective-bargaining representatives of those employees.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Post at its principal office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[27] Copies of this notice, on forms to be provided by the Regional Director for Region 24, after being signed by a duly authorized representative of the Association, shall be conspicuously posted immediately upon receipt thereof and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in all places where notices to all employees are customarily posted.

(b) Return to the Regional Director as many additional copies of Appendix A, signed as indicated above, in order to allow for the further posting of those signed notices on the premises of those of the other Respondents in this case, as provided for below and to allow also for the Regional Director to forward to the Union three signed copies for posting at the Union's premises if it chooses to do so.

(c) Notify the Regional Director, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

II. Respondent San Juan Hotel Corporation d/b/a El San Juan Hotel and El Conquistador Hotel and Respondent The Puerto Rico Hotel Corporation d/b/a The Palace Hotel, San Juan, Puerto Rico, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, herein jointly called San Juan et al., shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with the Union by withdrawing recognition from it as the exclusive representative of a multiemployer unit consisting of, among others, musicians in the employ of those three hotels and by attempting to withdraw from Respondent Association the authority to negotiate a renewal contract with the Union covering, inter alia, musicians employed by Respondent San Juan, et al. after the Union has submitted its bargaining demands for that contract renewal.

[26] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[27] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(b) Refusing to bargain collectively with the Union by using personal service contracts with its leaders who supervise its musician employees which purport to identify those leaders as the employers of the musicians in derogation of the Union's status as the exclusive bargaining representative of those musician employees.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request by the Union, sign the collective-bargaining agreement reached between the Association and the Union on about April 30, 1979.

(b) Post the attached notice marked "Appendix B"[28] on the premises of the El San Juan, El Conquistador, and The Palace Hotels. Copies of this notice, on forms to be provided by the Regional Director for Region 24, after being duly signed by an authorized representative or representatives for Respondent El San Juan et al., shall be conspicuously posted immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in all places at these three hotels where notices to employees are customarily posted. Post also signed copies of Appendix A at these same locations and under the same conditions, immediately upon receiving such copies from the Regional Director for Region 24.

(c) Notify the Regional Director, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

III. Respondent Hilton International Company, d/b/a Caribe Hilton Hotel, San Juan, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Using personal service contract forms in employing or in retaining musicians in its employ and whereby its supervisors who lead those musicians are purported to be the employers of those employees, in derogation of the Union's status as their exclusive bargaining representative.

(b) Directing its musician employees not to pay working dues to the Union.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees respecting the exercise of the rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Post the attached notice marked "Appendix C"[29] on its premises. Copies of this notice, on forms to be provided by the Regional Director for Region 24, after being duly signed by an authorized representative, shall be conspicuously posted immediately upon receipt thereof and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, at all places where notices to its employees are customarily posted. Post also signed copies of Appendix A at these same locations and under the same conditions immediately upon receiving such copies from the Regional Director for Region 24.

(b) Notify the Regional Director, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

IV. Respondent Condado Holiday Inn, San Juan, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Using personal service contract forms in employing or retaining musicians in its employ and whereby its supervisors who lead musicians are purported to be the employers of those employees, in derogation of the Union's status as their exclusive bargaining representative.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees respecting the exercise of the rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Post the attached notice marked "Appendix D"[30] on its premises. Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 24, after being duly signed by an authorized representative, shall be conspicuously posted immediately upon receipt thereof and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, at all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Post also signed copies of Appendix A at these same locations and under the same conditions immediately upon receiving signed copies of that notice from the Regional Director.

(b) Notify the Regional Director what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

IT IS RECOMMENDED that the allegations of the complaint as amended that Respondent Caribe Hilton violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by reason of the discharge of Pedro Chiclana be, and they hereby are, dismissed, as are the alleged independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) found above to be without merit.

IT IS ALSO RECOMMENDED that the allegation that Respondent Association, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, reneged upon the agreement reached with the Union by inserting letters AFM in the recognition clause of that agreement in an attempt to limit its application to members of the Union only, or as a unilateral act, is dismissed.

IT IS ALSO RECOMMENDED that the allegation that Respondent Association unilaterally changed working conditions of its musician employees in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by executing personal service contracts with its supervisors is dismissed.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On April 16, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Henry L. Jalette issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs and Respondent filed a brief in answer to the General Counsel's exceptions.[1]

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.[3]

The Remedy

As we have found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting employees to revoke dues-checkoff authorizations, we shall adopt the Administrative Law Judge's recommended cease-and-desist provision with respect to this violation. The General Counsel excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's refusal to order an additional remedy requiring Respondent to remit dues to the Union on behalf of those employees who were unlawfully solicited to revoke their dues-checkoff authorizations. We find merit to the General Counsel's exception.[4]

As more fully described by the Administrative Law Judge, the credited testimony establishes that Respondent's cafeteria manager, Marge Cox, approached employees on frequent occasions and urged these employees to submit to Respondent written notices revealing whether or not they desired to continue to maintain their dues-checkoff authorizations. During the course of these solicitations Cox made disparaging remarks to one employee about the "——Union" and approached another employee a second time after that employee's initial written indication that she desired to maintain her dues-checkoff authorization. Following Cox's solicitations, several employees tendered revocations of their previously executed authorizations. Inasmuch as Cox approached some employees who had never made any inquiries whatsoever regarding their dues obligations, the only reasonable inference to be drawn is that, absent Cox's unlawful solicitation, these employees would likely

[1] Respondent has requested oral argument. This request is hereby denied as the record, the exceptions, and the briefs adequately present the issues and positions of the parties.

[2] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[3] The General Counsel has excepted to the Administrative Law Judge's finding and conclusion that Respondent did not engage in conduct amounting to solicitation of employees to engage in surveillance of employees' union activities. He contends that the credited testimony of employee Wagner establishes that Cafeteria Manager Marge Cox, in addition to interrogating Wagner about events occurring at union meetings already held, as found by the Administrative Law Judge, also solicited Wagner before union meetings to let Cox know what transpired at such meetings. We find merit to the General Counsel's exception. Thus, the record clearly establishes that Wagner testified to more than one conversation with Cox, including a conversation before any union meetings were held. Wagner's credited testimony in this regard indicates that Cox asked Wagner "to let her know what went on at the Union meetings." Such conduct clearly constitutes a solicitation to engage in surveillance of employees' union activities in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. Daniel Construction Company, a Division of Daniel International Corporation, 241 NLRB 336 (1979).

In addition, the General Counsel excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's failure to find and conclude that Respondent's cafeteria manager, Cox, falsely signed the name of a unit employee to a showing-of-interest statement accompanying a decertification petition in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1). We agree. Although the Administrative Law Judge credited the testimony of employee Hiten that she observed Marge Cox sign the name of employee Peggy Cox to a showing-of-interest statement to be submitted with a decertification petition, he declined to specifically find, based on signature comparisons, that the name of Peggy Cox on the showing-of-interest statement was forged. However, in view of the Administrative Law Judge's crediting of Hiten's testimony that Marge Cox falsely signed Peggy Cox's name in Hiten's presence to the showing-of-interest statement, we find the Administrative Law Judge's hesitancy unwarranted. Accordingly, we conclude that Respondent additionally violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by virtue of Marge Cox's signing of an employee's name, while in the presence of another employee, on the showing-of-interest statement seeking the Union's removal as bargaining representative. We have modified the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order to reflect these additional violations.

Finally the General Counsel has excepted to the Administrative Law Judge's failure to include a broad cease-and-desist order herein. It is the Board's policy that such an order is warranted only when a respondent is shown to have a proclivity to violate the Act, or has engaged in such egregious or widespread misconduct as to demonstrate a general disregard for employees' fundamental statutory rights. Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). With respect to the instant case, we find that a broad order is not warranted.

have continued to maintain in effect their dues-checkoff authorizations. In any event, since Cox's conduct makes it impossible to ascertain with absolute certainty whether the solicited employees would have voluntarily maintained their authorizations, any doubts resulting from the illegal conduct should be resolved against the responsible party.

In ordering this additional remedy, we find Respondent's unlawful solicitation analogous to those instances in which we have ordered reimbursement of union dues where employees have been unlawfully influenced or coerced by their employers into paying dues, joining a union, or maintaining their union membership. See Haven Manor Health Related Facility, 226 NLRB 329 (1976); R. L. Sweet Lumber Company, 207 NLRB 529, 539–540 (1973). As in those cases, a cease-and-desist order, standing alone, is insufficient to return the parties to the status quo existing prior to the commission of the unfair labor practice and, thus, reimbursement to the Union of dues lost herein as a result of Respondent's unfair labor practice is necessary and proper to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act.[5] Accordingly, in addition to the remedy provided by the Administrative Law Judge, we shall order Respondent to reimburse the Union for any dues lost by the Union with regard to those employees unlawfully solicited.[6]

Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 6:

"6. By soliciting employees to engage in surveillance of employees' union activities, by falsely signing the name of an employee to a statement seeking the Union's removal as bargaining representative, by questioning employees about their union sentiments or activities and their cooperation with the National Labor Relations Board in the processing of cases in a manner and under circumstances tending to coerce employees in the exercise of Section 7 rights, by creating the impression that the union activities of the employees were under surveillance, by promises of higher wages, improved working conditions, or other benefits, by threats of a reduction in hours if employees selected the Union in an election, by assisting employees in the filing of a decertification petition, by soliciting employees to revoke dues-checkoff authorizations, by prohibiting employees from talking about the Union on nonworking time, and by threats to discharge employees for cooperating with the National Labor Relations Board, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(1) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act."

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Cardinal Systems, a Division of Hospitality Motor Inns, Inc., d/b/a Cummins Component Plant, Walesboro, Indiana, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Insert the following as paragraph 1(c) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(c) Soliciting employees to engage in surveillance of employees' union activities."

2. Insert the following as paragraph 1(g) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(g) Falsely signing the name of an employee to a statement seeking the Union's removal as bargaining representative."

3. Insert the following as paragraph 2(c) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(c) Reimburse Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 58, AFL–CIO, all union dues not tendered to the Union by employees solicited to revoke their dues-checkoff authorizations, with interest thereon."

[5] We find unpersuasive Member Fanning's assertion that Respondent's unlawful solicitation could not have caused any monetary loss to the Union because, under Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act, Respondent could lawfully discontinue dues checkoff without employee revocation following contract expiration. In our view, Respondent's statutory right unilaterally to discontinue checkoff at contract expiration bears no causal relationship to whether or not unlawfully solicited employees would, in fact, have voluntarily maintained those authorizations in the absence of Respondent's unlawful conduct. Thus, while we agree that Respondent lawfully could have discontinued the contractual checkoff mechanism for all unit employees upon expiration of the contract without first securing individual revocations, the evidence indicates that Respondent instead chose to solicit employees individually to express in writing their intentions concerning continued checkoff deductions and apparently continued to honor such deductions for those employees who did not tender such a revocation. Accordingly, in these circumstances, the Union may in fact have suffered monetary loss as a result of the revocations unlawfully solicited by Respondent. In the absence of Respondent's unlawful conduct, the Union would likely have continued to receive dues through the checkoff mechanism on behalf of those employees unlawfully solicited by Respondent. Therefore, in our view, a remedy requiring remittance of dues to the Union lost as a likely result of Respondent's unlawful solicitation properly returns the parties to the status quo ante existing prior to Respondent's unlawful conduct.

[6] As the record does not reveal whether the unlawfully solicited employees otherwise continued to tender dues to the Union apart from the checkoff mechanism, we shall leave the determination of the amounts actually lost by the Union, if any, to the compliance stage of these proceedings. Further, we will limit such reimbursement as applicable to only those employees who made no specific inquiries to Respondent regarding their dues obligations prior to Respondent's solicitations. Of course, reimbursement will be ordered only with respect to those employees who in fact otherwise had a dues obligation to the Union.

In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the payments for break periods and the holiday pay for Christmas 1979 due based on the formula set forth therein.

4. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT question employees about their union sentiments or activities or their cooperation with the National Labor Relation Board in the processing of cases.

WE WILL NOT create the impression that we are keeping your union activities under surveillance by telling employees we will find out what happens at union meetings.

WE WILL NOT solicit employees to engage in surveillance of employees' union activities.

WE WILL NOT promise higher wages, improved working conditions, or other benefits, in order to induce you to withdraw your support from Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 58, AFL-CIO.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with a reduction in hours of work if you select Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 58, AFL-CIO, as your representative in an election to be conducted by the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL NOT assist you in filing a petition to decertify Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 58, AFL-CIO.

WE WILL NOT falsely sign the name of an employee to a statement seeking the removal of Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 58, AFL-CIO, as bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT solicit you to revoke the dues-checkoff authorizations on behalf of Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 58, AFL-CIO.

WE WILL NOT prohibit you from talking about the Union on nonworking time.

WE WILL NOT threaten to discharge employees for cooperating with the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain with the above-named Union as the representative of our employees in the appropriate unit. The appropriate unit is:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed at our food service operations at the Cummins Engine Company facility in Walesboro, Indiana, exclusive of all clerical employees, all confidential employees, all professional employees, all guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT make changes in working conditions with regard to clocking out for breaks or payment of holiday pay without notice no, or consultation with, the above-named Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

WE WILL, upon request, meet and bargain with the above-named Union in the appropriate unit described above concerning rates of pay, wages, hours of work, and conditions of employment of our employees and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

WE WILL make Lois Wagner and Mike Ferguson whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of our change in the practice with regard to clocking out for breaks.

WE WILL make all our employees whole who were otherwise entitled to payment of holiday pay for the Christmas 1979 holiday season by payment to them of 4 days of holiday pay, with interest thereon.

WE WILL remit to Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 58, AFL-CIO, all union dues not tendered to the Union by employees solicited to revoke their dues-checkoff authorizations, with interest thereon.

CARDINAL SYSTEMS, A DIVISION OF HOSPITALITY MOTOR INNS, INC.,
D/B/A CUMMINS COMPONENT PLANT

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HENRY L. JALETTE, Administrative Law Judge: This proceeding involves allegations that Cardinal Systems, a Division of Hospitality Motor Inns, Inc., d/b/a Cummins Component Plant (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. The proceeding is based on a charge filed by the Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 58, AFL-CIO (the Union) in Case 25-CA-11597 on November 30, 1979, which charge was amended on January 3, 1980. Complaint thereon issued on January 8, 1980, which complaint was amended on May 14 and 27, 1980. On January 30, 1980, a charge was filed by Naomi Thompson in Case 25-CA-11795. That charge was amended on March 6, 1980, and complaint issued on March 7, 1980. On February 6, 1980, the Union filed the charge in Case 25-CA-11838, and on March 19, 1980, complaint issued thereon with an order consolidating Cases 25-CA-11795 and 25-CA-11597. On June 5 and 6 and September 15 and 16, 1980, hearing was held in Columbus, Indiana.

Upon the entire record,[1] including my observation of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs of the parties, I hereby make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE FACTUAL SETTING

Respondent is an Ohio corporation with its principal office at Mayfield, Ohio, and facilities in the States of Ohio and Indiana, including a facility at the Cummins Component Plant of Cummins Engine Company in Walesboro, Indiana (the facility involved herein), where it is engaged in providing food services to employees of Cummins.[2] At all times material herein, either as west area food manager or regional manager of food support, Frank Klassen was the supervisor primarily responsible for the operation of a number of Respondent's cafeterias, including the Walesboro cafeteria. Marge Cox was manager of the Walesboro cafeteria.

On June 28, 1973, the Union was certified as bargaining representative of Respondent's employees who worked at the cafeteria at the Walesboro plant. The last contract between Respondent and the Union was entered into on December 7, 1976, effective to December 7, 1979.

On October 1, 1979, a petition signed by employee Linda Young was filed in Case 25-RD-646.

On October 23, 1979, the parties entered into a consent election agreement and pursuant thereto an election was scheduled for November 30, 1979.

On the morning of November 30, the Union filed the charge in Case 25-CA-11597, and by reason thereof the ballots cast in the election later that day were impounded. On January 25, 1980, the Regional Director dismissed the petition in Case 25-RD-646, and on April 9, 1980, the Board affirmed the dismissal action.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Introductory Statements

The complaints herein allege that Respondent engaged in a number of unfair labor practices before and after the filing of the RD petition, including encouraging and assisting employees in the preparation and filing of the petition and refusing to meet and bargain with the Union. In support thereof, testimony was adduced attributing a number of unlawful remarks to Cox over a period of several months, and a substantial part of the case depends on her credibility. Klassen's credibility is also at issue, but he is not alleged to have engaged in unfair labor practices to the same extent as Cox.

A threshold issue then, is who is to be credited. In my judgment, in most instances of conflict, the General Counsel's witnesses are to be credited. In general, alleged discriminatee Thompson being the exception, I can see no motive for the General Counsel's witnesses to lie. Essentially, the record discloses employees aggrieved over poor union representation with their grievances in such regard being encouraged by Respondent. Thus, the General Counsel's witnesses, again with the exception of Thompson, signed the petition to decertify the Union and revoke their dues-checkoff authorizations. In these circumstances, and granted that they may have been aggrieved at Respondent about working conditions, I am persuaded that their testimony was not the product of interest or bias.

The same may not be said for Respondent's witnesses. They clearly had an interest in the outcome of the proceeding. Linda Young was strongly opposed to the Union. Marge Cox' conduct was in issue, as was Klassen's. On the matter of demeanor, Marge Cox was not impressive. Her answers to questions were evasive and she clearly did not answer truthfully when confronted with General Counsel's Exhibit 44, a sheet of her scribblings.

On the basis of the foregoing, I credit the General Counsel's witnesses generally except where it appears to me they were mistaken. I do not credit Respondent's witnesses generally. In those instances where I do, I rely on circumstances which tend to support their testimony.

B. Case 25-CA-11597

1. The independent 8(a)(1) violation

Paragraphs 5(a), (b), and (c) of the complaint allege that in late July, August, and September 1979, Marge Cox interrogated employees about union activities, solicited employees to engage in surveillance, and created the impression of surveillance. In support of these allegations, the General Counsel adduced the testimony of Lois Wagner that in early August, Cox asked her "How do you feel about the Union thing?" Cox then discussed the fact that the union contract was expiring in December and added that "If you do not vote for your contract in December we can get you more money." She also asked Wagner if she was a good union member. Wagner testified further that in late August, September, October, or November, Cox would ask her after there had been a union meeting what went on at the meeting, whether her name had been brought up, and whether contract proposals had been discussed. When Wagner told Cox that she could not give her any information, Cox told her she would find somebody else that would.

[1] The original exhibits were misplaced and never reached me. Duplicate exhibits were substituted except for G.C. Exhs. 47 and 49. The General Counsel conceded by letter dated December 10, 1980, which is hereby made part of the record that the absence of Exhs. 47 and 49 was not significant in terms of analysis of the issues.

[2] Jurisdiction is not in issue. The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Respondent meets the Board's standards for the assertion of jurisdiction.

Cox did not specifically deny having the conversations with Wagner which Wagner described, and, contrary to Respondent's contentions, I find that in asking Wagner how she felt about the Union, whether she was a good union member, and what went on at the union meetings, Cox engaged in unlawful interrogation. Her questions had no legitimate purpose and occurred in the context of other unfair labor practices as set forth below, including an implied promise of benefit. In the circumstances, such questioning would have a tendency to coerce the employee in the exercise of Section 7 rights and was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The allegation in paragraph 5(b) that in asking Wagner about what happened at union meetings Cox solicited an employee to engage in surveillance is found lacking in merit. As I construe Wagner's testimony, Cox was engaging in interrogation. However, in telling Wagner that she would find somebody else that would tell her what happened, I find that Cox created the impression of surveillance as alleged in paragraph 5(c).

Paragraph 5(d) of the complaint alleges that in late July or early August 1979, Marge Cox told employees that Respondent could "buy off" the Union and thereby remove it as the employees' collective-bargaining agent. The allegation is based on the testimony of Naomi Thompson that Cox remarked to her that the people who owned Cardinal now had enough money "to buy and sell the union . . . they even had enough money . . . to buy the Empire State Building."

I credit Thompson's testimony, but I find the remark not to be violative of the Act. I construe the remark as a boast of Respondent's economic strength and not as a suggestion that Respondent would "buy off" the Union.

Paragraph 5(e) of the complaint alleges that Marge Cox in late July and August 1979, made promises of benefits if employees rejected the Union. In support of this allegation, the General Counsel adduced the testimony of Wagner, described earlier, when Cox interrogated Wagner and told her "If you do not vote for your contract in December, we can get you more money."

I credit this testimony and find an unlawful promise of higher wages.

Wagner testified that Cox had told her on various occasions that she thought the employees could make more money if they did not have a union. I credit Wagner and find such remarks to constitute implied promises of higher wages in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Employee Mike Ferguson testified that maybe a month before the filing of the RD petition Cox said she would like to see the Union out. She said the working conditions would be a lot better with the Union out. I credit Ferguson and find Cox's remark to constitute an unlawful promise of improved working conditions in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Paragraphs 5(f), (g), (h), (i), and (j) allege, in effect, that Respondent assisted and encouraged employees in the filing of the petition in Case 25-RD-646. The allegations are based essentially on the testiony of Sue Hiten.

Hiten is a former employee of Respondent who was employed from October 1976 to January 1980 when she quit.[3] According to Hiten, she had several conversations with Marge Cox in which Cox remarked that the Union was not doing anything for the employees and she (Cox) could do nothing for them as long as the Union was there.

In mid-August, Klassen held a meeting of employees assertedly to advise them that the Company had been notified by the Union of a dues increase. (Apparently all, or most, of the employees had authorized dues checkoff.)

Klassen testified that the employees were upset at the news and said they could not understand since the Union was not doing anything for them.

Hiten testified that a few days before September 26, she talked to Klassen about how she could go about getting rid of the Union. She testified he told her to contact the National Labor Relations Board and he would get her the telephone number. Hiten said she was later given the number, but she could not recall whether Cox or Klassen gave it to her.

On September 26, on reporting to work, Marge Cox asked Hiten if she had called the NLRB and Hiten said she had but no one was there. They then went to Cox's office and Hiten called Indianapolis and asked to be billed on her home phone as Cox suggested. Cox told her Klassen would reimburse her. (Hiten testified Klassen later paid her $3.) On September 28, Hiten came to work with the NLRB petition form. She testified that she showed it to Cox and told her she did not know how to fill it out. Cox suggested they go to the Company's office (located some distance from the cafeteria). They did, and there they met with Klassen, and Hiten filled out the petition with information supplied by Klassen. Item 1 of the form specifies the purpose of the petition which Hiten had checked as certification of representative and Klassen corrected that to withdrawal of union-shop authority (which was also incorrect). Before they left, Klassen's secretary weighed the material and placed postage on an envelope. The petition was not ready for mailing because it was not signed. Hiten had told Klassen she would not sign it because of a matter pending before the Union in which she was involved and Cox had suggested that Linda Young would sign.

Cox and Hiten returned to the cafeteria and there Hiten prepared a statement to be signed by employees to be submitted with the petition as a showing of interest. She remarked to Cox that she would have to get Peggy Cox, Marge Cox's daughter statement and an employee of Respondent, to sign the showing of interest and Cox said she would sign for her and she did. Hiten left Cox's office and obtained the signatures of two employees, then she returned to the office where she obtained Young's signature and turned over to Young both the showing of interest statement and the petition which Young signed. Hiten never saw the papers again.

[3] In November 1977 Hiten was fired, but was reinstated in August 1978, without backpay, as a result of grievance proceedings.

That evening, on the second shift, employees Lois Wagner, Mike Ferguson, and Naomi Thompson were asked to sign the showing of interest statement by Young, in the presence of Ann Walsh, a manager-trainee and alleged supervisor. Wagner and Ferguson signed, but Thompson refused. (Earlier that day, Wagner had received a call from Cox in which Cox asked her if she was going to sign. Wagner said she did not know and Cox said she and Ferguson might as well sign because "we" have signatures anyway.)

As noted above, on October 1, 1979, the RD petition was filed.

The foregoing is Hiten's descripton of the preparation and filing of the RD petition. Her testimony is contradicted in most of the essential particulars. Thus, Cox denied she accompanied Hiten to Klassen's office or that she signed her daughter's name. She testified that she did not know about the RD petition until it was over with. Peggy Cox testified that she signed the showing-of-interest statement at the request of Hiten. Klassen also denied that Cox accompanied Hiten to his office and that he reimbursed Hiten for a telephone call. Becky Van Natta also denied that Cox accompanied Hiten to the office and that she placed postage on an envelope for the petition. According to Linda Young, she and Hiten started the RD petition. Hiten got her information about the Board from her father and Young, and Hiten went into Cox's office to call the Board.

As can be seen except as to the fact that Hiten initially inquired about how to go about decertifying the Union, there is a sharp conflict as to the preparation and filing of the petition and the procurement of the showing-of-interest statement, a conflict that can only be explained as the result of consciously false testimony. The protagonists are Hiten on the one hand and Marge and Peggy Cox, Klassen, Young, and Van Natta on the other. If the test were one of numbers, Hiten could not be credited. I credit Hiten. Contrary to Respondent's assertions, I can conceive of no motive for Hiten to lie. True, she may have been aggrieved against Respondent over loss of wages during the period between her discharge in 1978 and her reinstatement and Respondent's failure to pay holiday pay in the 1979 Christmas season; yet, she admitted that she initiated the process which led to the filing of the RD petition, a fact she would likely have concealed if she were embarked on fabricating a story about Respondent's participation in the process. Moreover, the details in her description of Respondent's participation in the process lend credence to her testimony. Such details as the forgery of Peggy Cox's name,[5] the telephone bill, the postage stamp, while supportive of a finding of assistance, were not all necessary. The role of Marge Cox alone was sufficient.[6] For these reasons, plus the fact that Respondent's witnesses had more motive to lie than Hiten, and my conviction that Marge Cox, in particular, was not a credible witness, I credit Hiten.

In light of the foregoing, I conclude and find that Marge Cox's conduct as described by Hiten and Wagner, Klassen's payment of the telephone bill and providing the postage for the RD petition, constituted unlawful assistance and encouragement in the filing of the RD petition and that Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In making this finding, I do not rely on such ministerial aid as Klassen or Cox may have provided in giving Hiten the Board's telephone number, nor in Klassen's assistance in helping Hiten correctly fill out the RD petition. I will therefore dismiss paragraph 5(h) of the complaint.

Paragraph 5(j) of the complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by the conduct of one Ann Walsh in directing employees to sign the RD petition. The evidence that Ann Walsh engaged in unlawful conduct is very sketchy. In any event, I conclude and find that Walsh, who was a manager trainee, was not a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(13) of the Act, nor did Respondent hold her out as an agent. Accordingly, I shall dismiss paragraph 5(j) of the complaint.

Paragraphs 5(k), (l), and (n) allege that Marge Cox threatened employees with a reduction in hours of work, changes in working conditions, and unspecified reprisals if they continued to support the Union. In support of these allegations, the General Counsel adduced testimony by employee Lois Wagner that after a union meeting on November 17 Cox was angry with her about a remark Wagner had made at the union meeting about Cox. In the conversation they had, Cox told Wagner that, if the Union got back in, there would be an awful lot of changes made. The General Counsel also adverts to testimony by employee Rocille Bennett that, prior to a union meeting in November, Cox told her that if she voted for the Union Bennett would get her hours cut and would not get a raise. Hiten testified to a similar threat after the RD election on November 30, wherein Cox told her if the Union got back in her hours would be cut and it would be rough on the employees.

The statements attributed to Cox are clearly unlawful threats. I credit Wagner, Bennett, and Hiten, for reasons earlier given, and I find that by such statements Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Paragraph 5(m) of the complaint alleges that in mid-April 1980 Cox promised increased rates of pay and adherence to a collective-bargaining agreement if employees selected another union to represent them. It appears that, sometime in early 1980, Peggy Cox and Linda Young undertook to obtain representation by a Teamsters Union. During a period of sick leave, Wagner received phone calls from Marge Cox in one of which Cox told Wagner about the activity on behalf of the Teamsters, and, one day after Wagner had returned to work, Marge Cox told her that Peggy Cox would run the Union, that it would be run right, and that they would go by the contract. She also said that if Cummins took over the cafeteria the employees would be taken over by

[5] To resolve credibility on the issue of the alleged forged signature, I was asked to compare the writing of Peggy Cox name on G.C. Exh. 4 with specimens of her handwriting. The name Peggy Cox appears to be an easy one to forge and I am hesitant to base a finding on my comparison, but were a comparison essential, I would find that the name of Peggy Cox on G.C. Exh. 4 was forged.

[6] In this connection, Wagner's testimony that Cox had called her and asked if she were going to sign the showing-of-interest statement and Cox's saying Wagner and Ferguson might as well sign because "we" have signatures anyway was undenied and credited.

Cummins and if they were represented by the Teamsters Union they would make more money.

I credit Wagner and find that Cox's remarks constituted unlawful promises of benefit in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Paragraphs 5(o), (p), and (q) of the complaint are somewhat interrelated and involve allegations of unlawful conduct by Marge Cox in connection with the hearing which was then scheduled in the instant case.

According to Lois Wagner, on May 7, 1980, she mentioned to Linda Young that she had given her pay stubs to the labor relations lawyer. Shortly thereafter, Cox called Wagner and asked her why she had given her pay stubs to the union man. She told Wagner that Young had told her Wagner had done so and that he came to her house regularly. Wagner told Cox she had given the pay stubs to a Board attorney and Cox said, "Where are all these questions coming from?" According to Wagner, Cox ranted and raved to the point that Wagner hung up.

On May 9, Cox called again and complained about the charges (apparently those against her) and asked Wagner if she could explain them to her. Cox also told Wagner, "[W]e could get fired for calling back and forth to each other." (Wagner had been calling Bennett, about what is not clear.)

On May 12, according to Rocille Bennett, Cox told her and Sally Holland, that she did not want the girls to be talking over the telephone about the Union. She did not want the employees to call one another. She said she did not want the first-shift employees to be talking to the second-shift employees.

Holland testified on behalf of Respondent, but she was never specifically asked either by Respondent or the General Counsel as to whether she had ever been present at a conversation such as Bennett described. Thus, she neither contradicted nor corroborated Bennett. As I deem Bennett to be a credible witness, I credit her testimony and find that Cox's remarks to employees that they were not to call one another and that first-shift employees were not to talk to second-shift employees were directed to conversations which related either to matters of concern among the employees in connection with the hearing herein or to union activities, in either case matters protected by Section 7 of the Act, that such remarks constituted a prohibition against employees exercising Section 7 rights on nonworking time, and that Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

I do not find that in telling Wagner that she knew about her giving her pay stubs to the union man Cox created the impression that Wagner's protected activities were being kept under surveillance, because Cox told Wagner that Young had informed her and Wagner had herself told Young. I do find, however, that her interrogation of Wagner about where all the questions were coming from and her demand that Wagner explain the charges to her were unlawful. Employees' knowledge of, and participation in, matters involving the processing of unfair labor practice charges are protected by Section 7 of the Act, and it appears too evident to require discussion that a supervisor's intrusive questioning about such matters will tend to coerce employees into refraining from becoming involved. This is particularly true when the questioning is by the supervisor who is alleged to have engaged in unlawful conduct.

2. The refusal to bargain

Paragraph 7 of the complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by engaging in individual bargaining with its employees. The General Counsel has not adverted to which acts and conduct of Respondent he is relying on for this allegation. In my judgment, none of the conduct heretofore described constituted individual bargaining.

Paragraph 7 of the complaint also alleges that Respondent sought to undermine the Union by conduct described above and thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. This allegation is disposed of below in connection with the refusal-to-bargain allegation in Case 25-CA-11838.

C. Case 25-CA-11795

1. Alleged interference, restraint, and coericon

The complaint in Case 25-CA-11795 alleges that, on or about December 20, Marge Cox threatened its employees with discharge or other reprisals if they cooperated with the Board and gave testimony under the Act. This allegation is based on the testimony of Lois Wagner that on December 18 Cox had talked to the Board and, when she came to work, she was very angry and she said, "If I find out who went to that damn Labor Board, I'll fire them on the spot." Two days later, Cox was still upset over her experience and she repeated her remarks about firing somebody if she found out who it was.

Respondent's defense to Wagner's testimony is that it should not be credited because, according to Wagner's own testimony, employee Mike Ferguson was present when Cox first made her remarks and he did not corroborate Wagner. Ferguson testified and was not examined about this conversation. Thus, he neither corroborated nor contradicted Wagner. In the circumstances, as Cox was not a reliable witness and did not deny this specific conversation, I credit Wagner. I find the remarks of Cox were unlawful threats and violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. The alleged discrimination against Naomi Thompson

Naomi Thompson was employed by Respondent in July 1977. She was discharged in November 1977, but was reinstated in August 1978, pursuant to arbitration. Prior to September 25, 1979, Thompson worked 5 hours per day on the second shift, 5 days per week. On September 25, she was advised that, effective September 28, her hours were being reduced to 4 hours per day because of a decrease in sales. Because she deemed 4 hours per day insufficient to warrant continuing to work, Thompson quit on October 1.

The General Counsel contends that Thompson's hours of work were reduced because of her union activities and that her quitting was, in law, a constructive discharge. As to her union activities, he adverted to the fact that Thompson was one of only two employees (the other was Ferguson) to wear a union button in September and to her activity in removing a notice from the bulletin board relative to Saturday work, a matter about which she felt aggrieved, and her sending a copy to the Union. Thompson testified that Cox was upset about Thompson's removal of the notice and that she told her if she ever took anything off the bulletin board again she would fire her. Employees Hiten and Wagner testified that Cox also mentioned to them that Thompson had removed a notice from the bulletin board. According to Hiten, Cox told her that anyone caught taking anything off the bulletin board and sending it to the Union would be fired. Wagner also testified that Cox referred to the notice being sent to the Union.

According to Respondent, because of the many inconsistencies in the record on this point, Hiten and Wagner cannot be credited. Whatever merit there might be to Respondent's argument, it is overshadowed by the fact that Cox never denied any of the statements attributed to her by Thompson, Hiten, and Wagner relative to the removal of the notice. Rather, she was asked if she were upset by Thompson's action and had any problems with the notice leaving the cafeteria. Such questions and her answers were pointless. In the absence of denials, I credit Thompson, Hiten, and Wagner.

The foregoing supports a finding of animus against Thompson, but more than that is needed to establish that her hours of work were unlawfully reduced. There must be some evidence that the reduction in hours was motivated by the union activity. In this case, Respondent has asserted that the reduction was attributable to a negative trend in sales and profits. In this connection, the record indicates that on September 10 Klassen sent a memorandum to Cox suggesting a reduction of hours on the second shift. There is no evidence to support an inference that this memorandum was motivated by anything other than economic considerations. Cox did not act on the memorandum until September 25, and the General Counsel argues that the negative trend referred to in Klassen's memorandum had ended by September 25 so that a reduction was no longer necessary. I have reviewed Respondent's weekly operating reports and I find the data therein inconclusive on the issue of the necessity for a reduction in hours. The total number of hours worked each week appeared to vary from week to week, as did productivity figures and percent of profit, and it is difficult to see any significant difference in the figures before September 25 and after. In my judgment, on the data before me, whether a reduction in hours on the second shift was necessary was a business judgment and the evidence of animus against Thompson is insufficient to overcome it. In reaching this conclusion, I rely on the September 10 memorandum and the fact that initially Cox undertook to reduce the hours of Wagner also. While she may have changed her mind later, the fact that she proposed the reduction supports the assertion that it was in response to the September 10 memorandum. Moreover, it cannot be overlooked that the reduction in hours under consideration was only 5 hours per week in a total of close to 300. I do not know how many employers could demonstrate through their books and records that such a reduction was economically justified, particularly in an operation with many variable factors that can affect productivity and profit. It is significant that there is no claim that Thompson's hours were given to anyone else on the second shift.

Apart from the foregoing, I am unable to accept the premise on which the allegation of constructive discharge is based; namely, that Cox reduced Thompson's hours of work 1 hour per day in the belief Thompson would quit. True, Thompson testified she had told Cox months earlier that she could not continue to work if she received less than 5 hours per day, and I credit her testimony over Cox's denial. Nevertheless, I find it difficult to believe that Cox recalled the statement several months later and undertook to reduce Thompson's hours to bring about her quitting.

In short, in my judgment, the evidence adduced by the General Counsel is insufficient to warrant an inference that Thompson's hours of work were reduced because of her union activities, and I shall dismiss the allegation that she was constructively discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

1. Alleged interference, restraint, and coercion

The collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and Respondent provided for a checkoff of dues. In January, a number of employees delivered signed statements to Respondent stating that they no longer desired the deduction of dues from their wages. Sometime thereafter, Respondent discontinued deducting dues on behalf of such employees.

The complaint alleges that Marge Cox solicited employees to revoke their dues-checkoff authorizations, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In support of the allegation, the General Counsel adduced testimony from Lois Wagner that, one night in early January, Cox came to her and said, "[Y]ou are supposed to fill out a god-damn paper if you want those damn Union dues taken out of your check again." Wagner asked Cox if she had a form. She did not, so Wagner found a sheet of paper and wrote that she wanted her dues deducted. Wagner testified that Cox did not urge her one way or the other, although she did mention that Bennett was the only one who was going to have her dues deducted.

Rocille Bennett testified that, shortly after the election, Cox had come to her and said that the Company had to know if she wanted her dues deducted or not. Bennett had signed a statement that she did, and in April 1980 Cox approached her again and said that the Company had lost Bennett's statement. Bennett signed another statement, but this time she stated that she did not want her dues deducted.

Although seven other employees had signed statements revoking their dues-checkoff authorizations, Wagner and Bennett were the only witnesses called by the General Counsel to testify about any solicitation by Cox. However, Respondent's own witness, Maxine Tharp, testified that she was approached by Marge Cox, and Linda Young described how Cox approached other employees. The issue, then, is not whether Cox did approach employees about dues deductions, but, rather, whether her doing so was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Respondent contends Cox's conduct was not violative of the Act because it was in response to employees' inquiries about whether they had to continue dues deductions, and in approaching employees Cox neither encouraged nor discouraged them in their decision. I find no merit in Respondent's position.

There is testimony both by Cox and Linda Young that the question of dues deductions was raised by employees (whether only by Young to Cox or Young, Hiten, and Peggy Cox is not clear). However, neither Wagner, Bennett, nor Tharp were shown to have approached Cox. It was Cox who initiated the subject. The fact that some employees had approached Cox gave her no license to approach employees who had not. By her doing so, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Rock-Tenn Company, 238 NLRB 403 (1978).

Moreover, Cox's conduct was not as innocent as Respondent claims. Her remarks to Wagner about the "goddamn Union" and her statement that all but Bennett had revoked were clear encouragement to revoke. In Bennett's case, Cox even undertook to solicit her a second time after she had declined to revoke earlier with no showing that there was any necessity to do so. For the foregoing reasons, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by soliciting employees to revoke their dues-checkoff authorizations.

Paragraph 5(b) of the complaint alleges that in January 1980 Marge Cox threatened employees with withholding of wage increases mandated by Federal law. The allegation is based on the testimony of Wagner that on some unspecified date in January 1980 Cox told Wagner that her attorney had told her that no one would receive the $3.10 per hour until after this (apparently meaning the instant matter) was settled on June 5. While Cox did not expressly deny making this remark, it is difficult to accept Wagner's testimony as an accurate description of what Cox said because the remark as she describes it makes little sense. In my judgment, a finding that the remark constituted an unlawful threat is not warranted.

2. The refusal to bargain

The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by a number of unilateral acts and by refusing to meet and bargain.

a. The unilateral conduct

(1) Discontinuance of dues checkoff

Although the General Counsel has alleged the discontinuance of dues checkoff as unilateral conduct violative of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, he has not addressed himself to the issue in his brief. In Peerless Roofing Co., Ltd., 247 NLRB 500 (1980), the Board adopted conclusions of the administrative law judge that the unilateral discontinuance of dues checkoff after the expiration of a contract was not unlawful. I find the case to be controlling and shall dismiss the allegation.[7]

(2) Job bidding

The complaint alleges that Respondent ceased allowing its employees to bid on available full-time positions or to select shift preferences. The General Counsel did not advert to this allegation in his brief and I do not know on what evidence he relies for its support. As I am unaware of any, I shall dismiss the allegation.

(3) Paydays

The complaint alleges that on or about January 1, 1980, Respondent unilaterally changed paydays from a weekly basis to a biweekly basis. The record indicates that by letter dated November 13, 1979, well in advance of the proposed change, Respondent notified the Union it was planning such a change. The Union never responded to the letter either to object or to request a meeting. In the circumstances, it may be said to have acquiesced therein.

(4) Clocking out for breaks

The complaint alleges that since on or about August 6, 1979, Respondent unilaterally required its employees to clock out for breaks. However, the evidence adduced at the hearing was directed to a showing that such a requirement was imposed on employees in January 1980. Sometime in January 1980, Wagner was spoken to by Klassen and Cox relative to her conduct vis-a-vis, Cummins management personnel. According to Wagner, she was told in this meeting that from then on when she took a supper break, she was to clock in and out. Employee Ferguson testified he was also to clock out for breaks. Both Wagner and Ferguson testified that prior to this they took breaks on the clock and were paid.

Respondent contends that no changes were made in either Wagner's or Ferguson's hours of work or pay.

Unlike other issues in this case, the issue should be resolvable by an examination of Respondent's records. Unfortunately, the records (consisting of timecards and weekly operating reports) are not complete, nor are they easily decipherable. Nevertheless, it does appear from Ferguson's timecards that a change occurred in the matter of break periods and clocking out after the Christmas break. It appears from his timecard for the week ending January 11, 1980, that he began clocking out that week, although it is not entirely clear from an examination of his timecard because the timeclock did not work properly. The timecards for the week ending January 25 were missing, so that one cannot determine whether Ferguson did clock out. However, the timecard for the week ending February 1, 1980, clearly indicates he was clocking out. None of Ferguson's timecards before January 1980 indicates similar clock entries. Any doubt that a change occurred at the time, however, was removed by a review of the weekly operating reports which indicate that, beginning with the week ending January 1, Ferguson's hours of pay were reduced from 5 hours per day to 4-1/2 hours per day. How long this situation persisted is not entirely clear, because it appears that Ferguson's hours of work may heve been reduced sometime in March and he continued to receive pay for 4-1/2 hours. The matter is one of remedy which can be resolved in compliance.

[7] See also Finger Lakes Plumbing & Heating Co., Inc., 253 NLRB 406, fn. 4 (1980).

Wagner's timecards and her pay records also confirm her testimony. There were no "break" entries on her timecards before January 1980. In the week ending January 11, there is one handwritten "break" entry. Similarly, "break" entries appear for the weeks ending February 1, 8, and 22. Even more significant, and as was the case with Ferguson, although Wagner was clocking in and out at the same times as before, beginning with the week ending January 11, 1980, her hours of pay were reduced from 7 hours a day to 6-1/2 hours a day, a situation which persisted until the week ending May 2, 1980.

In short, Respondent's records corroborate the testimony of Wagner and Ferguson and clearly refute the assertion that no change occurred either in procedure or pay. Cox's testimony that the clocking out was begun at the behest of Wagner is not credited.

As noted earlier, this conduct is alleged to have constituted unilateral conduct violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. It is clear the conduct represented a change in conditions of employment and that it was undertaken unilaterally. Although the contract had expired, it is settled law that upon expiration of a contract an employer is obligated to notify and bargain with the employees' collective-bargaining representative before it makes changes in conditions of employment. As Respondent did not do so, its conduct was violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

In his brief, the General Counsel argues that Respondent's policy relative to clocking in and out affected not only Wagner and Ferguson, but also first shift employees. As to first shift employees, he argues that they were asked to forgo their lunch breaks or be docked in pay. I reject the argument for lack of proof. No employee testified that he or she was required to forgo lunchbreaks or suffer a loss of pay, and the notation "no lunch" on certain timecards of first-shift employees is insufficient to support General Counsel's position.

(5) Reduction in hours

The complaint alleges that since on or about September 25, 1979, Respondent unilaterally reduced the hours of work of its employees. The record indicates that effective September 25, 1979, Naomi Thompson's hours of work were reduced from 5 hours to 4 hours per day without notice to the Union. In May 1980, Wagner's hours were reduced from 6-1/2 per day to 5-1/2 hours per day. Prior to the week ending May 16, 1980, Bennett had generally been paid for 7-1/2 hours per day (except for the weeks ending April 25 and May 2 and 9). By the week ending May 16, 1980, her hours had been reduced to 6 hours per day. Wagner testified that in May she was told that her hours of work were being reduced to 5-1/2 hours per day. The weekly operating reports confirm this, but the reduction appears to have lasted only 1 month. It appears that about the same time Ferguson's hours were reduced from 4-1/2 hours to 4 hours per day.

Respondent contends that these reductions in hours were not violative of the Act but were within its rights under the management rights clause of the agreement. Moreover, Respondent points out that reduction in hours had occurred in the past.

In my judgment, the reduction of hours shown to have occurred herein clearly fell within the scope of the management-rights clause which provided, in pertinent part: "The existing and continuing rights of management shall include, but not be limited to, the right to schedule operations and employees, hire, discipline, demote, or discharge for just cause; layoff employees for lack of work, manage, direct, and supervise its operations . . . ." Thus, the clause reserves to management such matters as scheduling operations and employees and the layoff of employees for lack of work, matters closely related to such a matter as a decision to reduce hours. In this connection, it is noted that article VII, section 1, which relates to hours of work provided that "Insofar as work is deemed necessary, the normal work week shall consist of five (5) days of eight (8) hours each . . . ." The phrase "Insofar as work is deemed necessary" appears clearly to vest in management the right to make the reductions in hours herein described.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find no merit to the allegation that the reductions in hours were violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

(6) Nonpayment of holiday pay

Article XII, section 1 of the contract which expired on December 7, 1979, provided for paid holidays on Christmas Eve Day, Christmas Day, New Year's Eve Day, and New Year's Day. On December 18, 1979, Respondent posted a notice that because of the upcoming layoff at Cummins Company it was forced to have a corresponding layoff, and that in accordance with company policy any employee on layoff for 3 or more consecutive days in conjunction with a holiday would not receive holiday pay.

The General Counsel contends that in not paying employees holiday pay as provided in the contract, Respondent engaged in unilateral conduct violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Although Respondent adverted to a company policy in its December 18 notice, no such policy was shown to exist and Respondent adverts to no contractual provision in defense of its conduct. Rather, it contends that its conduct was justified by overriding economic considerations. The argument borders on the frivolous. Respondent's situation before the holiday period in 1979 was precisely the same as in earlier years. The situation was different only in that after the regular holiday period Cummins contemplated a brief layoff. Thus, no need for a layoff of Respondent's employees until after the holiday period. By its notice, Respondent undertook to accelerate any layoff with no demonstrable purpose or saving other than the deprivation of holiday pay to employees who had been regularly employed. Such conduct clearly constituted a unilateral change in working conditions, and, as noted above, although the contract had expired, Respondent was obligated to notify and bargain with the Union before it changed existing conditions of employment. Accordingly, as it did not do so, its conduct was violative Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

b. The refusal to meet and bargain

By letter dated October 2, 1979, the Union requested that Respondent meet with it for the purpose of negotiating a new agreement, suggesting a meeting date of October 22. Respondent did not reply to the letter.

By letter dated January 15, 1980, the Union again demanded that Respondent meet and bargain with it over a new agreement and also with regard to unilateral changes made by Respondent. By letter dated January 29, 1980, Respondent acknowledged receipt of the October 2, 1979, and January 15, 1980, requests and asserted a good-faith doubt that the Union represented its employees. There was no express refusal to meet, but the letter stated the Union's demand was being forwarded to counsel. No further reply was ever made. I construe Respondent's response to constitute a refusal to meet and bargain. The question is whether or not it had an obligation to do so.

The law is well settled that after the expiration of the certification year, a certified union enjoys a rebuttal presumption that its majority status continued. In order to overcome the presumption, an employer who questions the Union's majority status must affirmatively show either (1) that at the time of the refusal the Union in fact no longer enjoyed majority status, or (2) that the employer's refusal was predicated on a good-faith and reasonably grounded doubt of the Union's continued majority status. As to the second of these, i.e., good-faith doubt, two prerequisites for sustaining the defense are that the asserted doubt must be based on objective considerations and it must not have been advanced for the purpose of gaining time in which to undermine the Union. Terrell Machine Company, 173 NLRB 1480 (1969), enfd. 427 F.2d 1088 (4th Cir. 1970).

A threshold question is when Respondent's refusal to bargain occurred. The complaint alleges that it occurred on January 24, 1980. However, as noted above, the Union mailed a letter to Respondent requesting to meet and bargain on October 2, 1979, and Klassen admitted receipt of the letter within a day or two. It is undisputed that Respondent never responded to the request. No explanation was offered for such refusal, but it is evident when one considers Respondent's conduct after October 2, 1979, that its failure to respond was, in effect, a refusal to meet and bargain with the Union at that time, rather than at the later date of January 24. As a matter of fact, the refusal of January 24 only confirms the intent of Respondent's failure to respond in October. Accordingly, in determining whether there existed objective considerations to doubt the Union's majority status, inquiry must be addressed to the conditions which existed in the period on and after October 2, 1979.

The objective consideration relied on by Respondent for doubting the Union's majority status were, according to Klassen, the following:

1. None of the current employees were employees at the time of the first contract in 1973.

This is insufficient basis to question the Union's majority status as the Board has long held that turnover among employees cannot, by itself, be used as a basis for belief that a union has lost majority status since it is presumed new employees will support the Union in the same ratio as those whom they have replaced.[8] There was no rebuttal of that presumption here. To the contrary, all the employees employed at the time Respondent refused to bargain had joined the Union and authorized dues checkoff. True, union membership was required by the contract, but dues checkoff is voluntary and no employees had requested revocation of dues checkoff until after Respondent's refusal to bargain.

2. Receipt of a copy of the RD petition from the NLRB advising that 7 out of 10 employees wanted an election.

Initially, Klassen testified that he knew that 7 out of 10 employees had signed the showing of interest statement because he had received a copy from the Regional Office. However, after further examination, he admitted he was not certain that was so. He may very well have known how many employees had signed the showing of interest because of Cox's participation in the RD election and the showing of interest statement, as described above, but he would not normally receive such information from the Regional Office because that would not accord with Regional Office practice. In any event, Respondent could not rely on the RD petition and the showing of interest statement because of supervisory taint in the preparation of the petition and the showing of interest.

3. The absence of union activity, e.g., lack of union meetings, or contacts with Klassen relative to grievances.

On the matter of union meetings, it does not appear that any were being held in the period immediately preceding Respondent's refusal to bargain, but I fail to see how this demonstrates lack of employee support. The Union was a viable organization as shown by the fact that it had notified Respondent of a dues increase to be deducted from employee wages. On the matter of grievances, several employees had been reinstated pursuant to a grievance and arbitration proceeding in 1978, during the term of the contract. Moreover, until September 1979, the employees had a shop steward, Sally Holland, who, according to Cox, quit her job because she was pestered with too many complaints.

In short, the record does not support a finding of union inactivity such as to warrant Respondent questioning the Union's majority status.

4. At a meeting of employees in August, he had told employees that he had been notified by the Union of a dues increase from $5 to $7.50 per month and the employees had become upset and told him they did not know what they were paying dues for because the Union was doing nothing for them.

I fail to see how this supports a good-faith doubt of majority status. Significantly, however upset the employees were about the dues increase, no employee indicated at the meeting that he or she no longer wanted to be represented by the Union. (The employees may not have known at the time that they could rid themselves of the Union.) Employee Hiten did inquire about the matter in late September, but the true wishes of the employees cannot be ascertained by what happened thereafter because of Respondent's interference in the decertification process.

[8] Laystrom Manufacturing Co., 151 NLRB 1482 (1965).

5. On October 5, a union representative failed to meet with Klassen as agreed.

I fail to see how this relates to employee sentiment.

In short, the record does not support Respondent's assertion that there existed objective considerations to justify its questioning the Union's majority status. In reaching this conclusion, I have adverted to Respondent's unlawful conduct relative to the RD petition, but its unlawful conduct did not consist only in the unlawful assistance in the preparation of the RD petition. In addition, there was Cox's unlawful interrogation of Wagner in early August; Cox's promise of more money if the employees did not have a union; and Cox's remark to Ferguson that working conditions would be a lot better off with the Union out. Such remarks would tend to dissipate the Union's majority status and one of the conditions for the assertion of a good-faith doubt is that it is asserted in a context free of unfair labor practices.

Cox's interrogation of Wagner and her promises to Wagner and Ferguson may not seem sufficiently serious to deny employees an opportunity to vote on whether they still desire union representation, but Respondent's unlawful conduct did not end there. To the contrary, for a period of months, and in a variety of ways, Respondent had been guilty of unfair labor practices which demonstrate that its refusal to meet and bargain with the Union after its October 2 request was designed to gain time to undermine further whatever support remained for union representation. Thus, there are Cox's threats of a cut in hours if the Union won the RD election, the threat to discharge whoever went to the Board, the denial of holiday pay, the solicitation of revocations of dues checkoff, and the requirement that Wagner and Ferguson to clock out for breaks. Such unlawful conduct precludes Respondent from asserting any good-faith doubt of the Union's continued majority status.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find that by its acts of interference, restraint, and coercion designed to undermine the Union and erode its support among employees and by refusing since on or about October 2, 1979, to meet and bargain with the Union, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent as set forth above, occurring in connection with operations described above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take appropriate and affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. In particular, I shall recommend that Lois Wagner and Mike Ferguson be made whole for any wages lost by reason of Respondent's unilateral change relative to clocking out for breaks, and that all employees who otherwise fulfilled the requirements of holiday pay be made whole by payment to them for 4 days of holiday pay for the Christmas 1979 holiday period, with interest thereon in accordance with Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). As to Respondent's discontinuance of dues checkoff for those employees who were unlawfully solicited to revoke their authorizations, I shall not recommend that Respondent remit dues to the Union in light of Peerless Roofing Co., Ltd., 247 NLRB 500 (1980).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 58, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All full-time and regular part-time employees of Respondent employed at its food service operation at the Cummins facility in Walesboro, Indiana, exclusive of all clerical employees, all confidential employees, all professional employees, all guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times material herein, the Union has been the exclusive representative of the employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By its acts of interference, restraint, and coercion designed to undermine the Union and erode its support among employees, by its unilateral change in clocking out for breaks and failure to pay holiday pay, and by refusing to meet and bargain with the Union relative to rates of pay, wages, hours of work, and conditions of employment, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(5) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. By questioning employees about their union sentiments or activities and their cooperation with the National Labor Relations Board in the processing of cases in a manner and under circumstances tending to coerce employees in the exercise of Section 7 rights, by creating the impression that the union activities of the employees were under surveillance, by promises of higher wages, improved working conditions, or other benefits, by threats of a reduction in hours if the employees selected the Union in an election, by assisting employees in the filing of a decertification petition, by soliciting employees to revoke dues-checkoff authorizations, by prohibiting employees from talking about the Union on nonworking time, and by threats to discharge employees for cooperating with the National Labor Relations Board, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(1) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

7. The General Counsel has failed to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent reduced the hours of work of Naomi Thompson because of her union activities and that she was by reason thereof constructively discharged.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[9]

The Respondent, Cardinal Systems, a Division of Hospitality Motor Inns, Inc., d/b/a Cummins Component Plant, Walesboro, Indiana, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Interrogating employees about their union sentiments or activities, and their cooperation with the National Labor Relations Board in the processing of cases in a manner or under circumstances constituting interference with, and restraint and coercion of employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

(b) Creating the impression of surveillance of employees' union activities by telling employees it will find out what happens at union meetings.

(c) Promising employees higher wages, improved working conditions, or other benefits, in order to induce them to withdraw their support from the Union.

(d) Threatening employees with a reduction in hours of work if they selected the Union in an election to be conducted by the National Labor Relations Board.

(e) Assisting employees in the filing of a petition to decertify the Union.

(f) Soliciting employees to revoke dues-checkoff authorizations.

(g) Prohibiting employees from talking about the Union on nonworking time.

(h) Threatening to discharge employees for cooperating with the National Labor Relations Board.

(i) Refusing to bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the unit herein found appropriate by changing working conditions without notice to, or consultation with, the Union, with regard to clocking out for breaks, by failing to pay holiday pay, and by refusing to meet and bargain with regard to rates of pay, wages, hours of work, and conditions of employment.

(j) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization, to form, join, or assist the above-named labor organization, or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection as guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act or to refrain from any and all such activities.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(b) Make whole all employees otherwise entitled to holiday pay for the Christmas 1979 period by payment to them of the 4 days of holiday pay unlawfully withheld, with interest thereon.

(c) Upon request, meet and bargain with the Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 58, AFL-CIO, in the appropriate unit described above, with regard to rates of pay, wages, hours of work, and conditions of employment of its employees, and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(d) Post at its facility at Walesboro, Indiana, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[10] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 25, after being signed by a duly authorized representative of Respondent, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the allegations of the complaint found not to have been sustained by the evidence be dismissed.

[9] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[10] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On February 27, 1981, Administrative Law Judge William J. Pannier III issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondents filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[3]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondents, Better Building Supply Corp., and Evergreen Roofing, Inc., Seattle, Washington, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order,[4] except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection
To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL–CIO, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All roofers and waterproofers employed by Better Building Supply Corp., Evergreen Roofing, Inc., and their subcontractors in the Washington Counties of Clallam, Jefferson, King, Kitsap, Mason and Snohomish; excluding professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to apply the terms and conditions of our collective-bargaining agreement with Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL–CIO, to all employees in the above-described bargaining unit, without the written consent of that Union.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile and [1] Respondents have excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] We fully agree with the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Respondent Evergreen Roofing, Inc., violated Sec. 8(a)(5) by failing and refusing to apply to its employees the collective-bargaining agreement executed between Respondent Better Building Supply Corp. and the Charging Party Union. We note that, under the Supreme Court's decision in South Prairie Construction Co. v. Local No. 627, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL–CIO, 425 U.S. 800 (1976), the fact that two or more entities constitute a single employer is not dispositive of the issue of whether each is bound to the collective-bargaining agreements of the others. Rather, the test is whether, given the single-employer finding, the employees of the separate companies constitute the appropriate unit or whether the employees of each individual company constitute distinct and separate units. The criteria for finding a single employer are different from those for determining the appropriateness of the unit. Peter Kiewit Sons' Co. and South Prairie Construction Co., 231 NLRB 76 (1977). In the present case, the operations of both Respondents and the work of their employees have been so intertwined as to render appropriate only a unit of employees of both Respondents and to preclude a finding of separate appropriate units.

[3] We adopt the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order as modified by his errata of March 16, 1981.

Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, by refusing upon request to supply relevant information needed by it to represent employees in the above-described bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT refuse to provide Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, with requested information that is relevant and necessary to the collective-bargaining process.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of your rights under the National Labor Relations Act as set forth above.

WE WILL recognize and bargain collectively with Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees in the above-described bargaining unit.

WE WILL apply the terms and conditions of our current collective-bargaining agreement with Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, to all employees in the above-described bargaining unit.

WE WILL provide Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, with any and all requested information that is relevant and necessary to the collective-bargaining process.

WE WILL make whole all employees for any losses sustained on or after May 7, 1979, by our failure to apply the terms and conditions of our collective-bargaining agreement with Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, to them, with interest.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM J. PANNIER III, Administrative Law Judge: This matter was heard by me in Seattle, Washington, on July 10, 11, and 22 through 25, 1980. On December 28, 1979, the Regional Director for Region 19 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing in Case 19-CA-11908, based on an unfair labor practice charge filed on November 7, 1979, alleging violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. §151, et seq., herein called the Act. On February 27, 1980, the said Regional Director issued a complaint and notice of hearing in Case 19-CA-12035, based on an unfair labor practice charge filed on January 18, 1980, alleging additional violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Also on February 27, 1980, the Regional Director issued an order consolidating cases and notice of hearing, consolidating the two complaints for hearing and decision. All parties have been afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. Based upon the entire record, upon the briefs filed on behalf of the parties, and upon my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Better Building Supply Corp., herein called Respondent BBS, and Evergreen Roofing, Inc., its alter ego,[1] herein called Respondent Evergreen, and herein collectively called Respondents, are each Washington State corporations, with an office and place of business at the same location in Seattle, Washington, where they are engaged as roofing contractors. There is no dispute regarding the dollar volume of Respondents' operations. Thus, it is admitted that, during the 12-month periods preceding issuance of each of the complaints, each of which is conceded to be a representative period, Respondents, in the course and conduct of their business operations, sold and shipped goods or provided services from within the State of Washington either directly to customers outside that State, or to customers within the State of Washington which, in turn, were themselves engaged in interstate commerce on some basis other than indirect inflow or outflow. During those same 12-month periods, Respondents, in the course and conduct of their business operations, purchased and caused to be transferred and delivered to their facilities within the State of Washington goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which originated from sources outside the State of Washington. Notwithstanding these admissions, Respondents denied the allegation that at all times material they have been a single integrated business enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of the Act, because they have been affiliated business enterprises with common officers, ownership, directors, management, and supervision; have formulated and administered common labor policy affecting employees of said operations; have shared common premises and facilities, common advertising, phone, sales, and purchasing; have provided services for and made sales, to each other; have interchanged personnel with each other; and have held themselves out to the public as a single integrated business enterprise. The record, however, supports the conclusion that at all times material Respondents have been a single integrated business enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act.

Both Respondents were formed during the mid-1950's. So far as the record discloses, the stock of each has always been owned primarily, if not wholly, by Gerald Mylan and his immediate family. From its inception, Respondent Evergreen engaged in all facets of the roofing business, using what is referred to as the hot tar process for applying roofs.[2] Respondent BBS, however, remained dormant after its formation, conducting no operations and being only a corporate shell.

In the late 1960's or very early 1970's, Mylan decided to bid for roofing work on certain houses being remodeled under the sponsorship of the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development. Discovering that his success in this venture would be enhanced if he bid to do all remodeling work on those homes, he secured a general contractors license for Respondent BBS and commenced bidding under its name. Concomitantly, Respondent Evergreen ceased conducting operations, becoming dormant from 1971 to 1977. During that period, Respondent BBS became a party to two successive collective-bargaining agreements with Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, herein called the Union, the latest of which is still effective. These agreements covered all roofers and waterproofers in the six west Washington Counties of Clallam, Jefferson, King, Kitsap, Mason, and Snohomish.

Respondent BBS's operations, however, were not confined to the west Washington geographic area. It bid on and obtained work on Government projects as far from that area as Albuquerque, New Mexico, and Denver, Colorado. Moreover, commencing in approximately 1974 or 1975, Respondent BBS's operations began to involve principally performing roofing work on Government facilities, rather than general remodeling. Thus, Mylan testified:

> Q. When you were working as Better Building Supply and let's address about 1974 or 1975 now, did you get back into roofing work as such?
> A. Yes. When the HUD started to dissipate or dry up then we went into government work.
> Q. When you say government work, do you mean various government buildings?
> A. Yes.

On its income tax returns for calendar years 1978 and 1979, Respondent BBS listed its principal business activity as being a contractor and its product or service as being roofing.

The mid-1970's was also a period during which another development of significance began to emerge. Mylan testified that he and his son had begun experimenting with development of a polyester cold processing system for installing roofs.[3] This system was being phased in, to replace the hot tar system, by Respondent BBS when, in 1977 or 1978, the trust fund department, acting pursuant to Respondent BBS's collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, attached Respondent BBS's bond and bank account in connection with a dispute concerning payment of fringe benefits. This had the effect of effectively terminating Respondent BBS's operations in the six- county area of west Washington. Nevertheless, Mylan testified that Respondent BBS continued operations in Oregon until "'78 or early '79," when it engaged in "[c]old application of re-roofs." Moreover, Respondent BBS's Washington business license did not expire until June 30, 1980, shortly before commencement of the hearing in this matter.

Once Respondent BBS's bond had been attached, Mylan again activated Respondent Evergreen to complete conversion to the cold processing system and to contract for performing roofing working utilizing that system. Initially, Respondent Evergreen used employees to perform this work though ultimately it substituted what it contends are independent contractors for those employees in the west Washington area.[4] Respondent Evergreen has continued to employ employees outside of that area. For example, at the time of the hearing it had three crews working in the Portland, Oregon, area. Apparently, these three crews are performing the same type of work as had been performed by the crews employed by Respondent BBS in the Portland, Oregon, area.

With regard to the allegation that Respondents are a single employing entity, the factors to be considered in resolving whether two nominally separate and distinct business entities are a single employer, within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, "are (1) interrelation of operations, (2) common management, (3) centralized control of labor relations, and (4) common ownership." N.L.R.B. v. Don Burgess Construction Corporation, d/b/a Burgess Construction, 596 F.2d 378, 384 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied 444 U.S. 940 (1979); see also N.L.R.B. v. Big Bear Supermarkets #3 and its alter ego Richard Holmes, 640 F.2d 924 (9th Cir. 1980). Here, the stock of Respondents is held by Mylan and his immediate family. These individuals also serve as the only directors and officers of Respondents. Further, while Mylan has used different individuals to assign work to employees of Respondents, the history of each of them and the descriptions of how they operate demonstrate that he has retained and possessed control over their labor relations policies throughout their history. Indeed, in their brief, Respondents acknowledge that [i]t is undisputed that Better Building was, and Evergreen is, owned and operated by the Mylans and that common ownership and control are facts in this case."

[2] Basically, this process consists of laying tar paper and then pouring hot tar over it.

[3] In essence, this process involves spraying cutback on the roof, then laying a polyester mat across it and then spraying more cutback over that.

[4] As will be discussed infra, the nature of the relationship between Respondent Evergreen and these contractors is the crux of the allegations of refusal to bargain in this matter. For present purposes, however, it suffices to note that Mylan admitted that these contractors perform the same work as had the roofing employees whom they succeeded and, further, while he equivocated at some points regarding the matter, that Mylan conceded that, after Respondent Evergreen had resumed operations, there had been a period of time when it had employed employees, as had Respondent BBS, to install roofs using the cold process system.

With respect to the existence of interrelated operations, it is true that Respondent BBS was licensed as a general contractor whereas Respondent Evergreen is licensed to perform only roofing work and, further, that Respondent Evergreen does its roofing work by means of the polyester cold process system. Yet, these hardly are differences of substance. For, as set forth above, Respondent BBS, however licensed, had been performing primarily roofing work after the HUD remodeling work had begun to "dissipate or dry up," and, as its income tax returns disclose, had been listing roofing as its primary business before it was completely deactivated following attachment of its bond.

Development of the cold process system, which Respondent Evergreen now uses, was instituted under the auspices of Respondent BBS and the commencment of phasing it in, to replace the hot tar system, had begun under Respondent BBS. In fact, so far as the record discloses, the reactivation of Respondent Evergreen had been occasioned exclusively by the attachment of Respondent BBS's bond which had the effect of preventing it from continuing operations in the west Washington area. There is no evidence showing that had that not happened, Respondent Evergreen would have been reactivated to handle contracts for performing the polyester cold process system of roofing. Rather, with Respondent BBS's bond attached, Mylan needed an entity to conduct that system of roofing and so reactivated Respondent Evergreen to do it. So far as the evidence shows, had Respondent BBS's bond not been attached, Mylan simply would have continued developing and phasing in the cold processing system under that entity. Indeed, should Respondent BBS obtain another business license and straighten out its bond problem, "there is nothing to prevent [Mylan] from retransferring [roofing operations] back to Respondent [BBS]." Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co., a Division of Mission Marine Associates, Inc.; and California Marine Hardware Co., a Division of Mission Marine Associates, Inc., 235 NLRB 720, 732 (1978), enfd. 640 F.2d 1017 (9th Cir. 1981).

In these circumstances there is sufficient identity of operations, management, control of labor relations, and ownership to warrant the conclusion that Respondents are a single employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act. Therefore, I find that at all times material Respondents have been a single employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

At all times material the Union has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. ISSUE

As set forth above, Respondent Evergreen had been reactivated to continue developing the polyester cold processing system initiated by Mylan through Respondent BBS. The parties stipulated that since June 20, 1977, Respondent Evergreen has not considered itself bound by the collective-bargaining agreement to which Respondent BBS became a party. Moreover, Respondents have ignored the Union's requests that they do so. Aside from the argument that Respondents are separate employers, rejected above, Respondents base their refusal to continue honoring that agreement upon the relationship between Respondent Evergreen and the applicators—those who install the roofs.

As set forth above, when Respondent Evergreen resumed operations, it employed its own employees initially. However, within a short span of time, it changed the nature of that relationship so that some of the applicators were reclassified as subcontractors. They, then, retained other applicators to install the roofs, and Respondent Evergreen ceased employing its own employees. Inasmuch as this occurred more than 6 months prior to the filing of the charge in Case 19-CA-11908, there is no allegation that in making these changes Respondents violated the Act.

However, Mylan conceded that the subcontractors and the applicators whom they retained to install the roofs are performing the same type of work as had formerly been performed by Respondent Evergreen's employees prior to the relationship conversion. The General Counsel argues that, notwithstanding this conversion, the applicators doing the roofing work for Respondent Evergreen have remained its employees within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act, and, accordingly, that Respondent Evergreen has remained obligated to apply the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union to them. Conversely, Respondent argues, in essence, that the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement cannot be applied to these persons by Respondent Evergreen inasmuch as the conversion resulted in their becoming independent contractors within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act and separate employers within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, with the result that the applicators employed by them are not employees of Respondent Evergreen. Consequently, the principal issue in this case is whether the applicators retained by the subcontractors[5] are employees only of the subcontractors or remain employees of Respondent Evergreen.

In addition, on January 2, 1980, the Union requested that Respondent provide it with a list of the names and addresses of the employees performing the roofing work, the hours worked by each of them, and the wages and fringe benefit contributions, if any, made on behalf of each one of them. In its letter the Union recites that its purpose in making the request "is to determine whether your employees are complying with our collective-bargaining agreement with respect to their obligation to join Roofers Local 54 and maintain their membership in the Union; and also to determine whether or not your firm has been complying with the collective-bargaining agreement by paying contractual wages and fringe benefits consistent with the agreement." It is undisputed that Respondent has not complied with that request. Thus, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated

[5] It appears undisputed that those individuals who became subcontractors would be considered supervisors within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act even if Respondent Evergreen remained the employer of the applicators hired by them.

Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by disregarding the Union's request for this information.

IV. THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN RESPONDENTS AND THE APPLICATORS

Mylan, one former subcontractor (Walter L. Campbell), and two current subcontractors (M. Christopher Gardner, Jr., and Christopher Alessio Romei, who are jointly doing business as Fresh Air Roofing, a corporation) testified regarding the relationship between Respondent Evergreen, the subcontractors, and other applicators. Each of the subcontractors formed their own organizations, in some instances corporations, and obtained their own business licenses as contractors to perform, at least, roofing work. Respondents make no deductions or contributions for subcontractors or the applicators whom they retain to assist them in installing roofs. The subcontractors pay the wages of the applicators they hire. In essence, therefore, each of the subcontractors has established at least a nominally separate and distinct business enterprise.

As set forth above, Respondent Evergreen markets a polyester cold processing system of roofing, primarily for nonresidential structures. Contracts to perform this work are obtained for Respondent Evergreen by independent sales representatives, called ISR, individuals who have signed an Independent Sales Representative Agreement with Respondent Evergreen.[6] Under the terms of these agreements Respondent "Evergreen will pay a commission to the ISR at the rates currently published by the Company as amended from time to time, on all jobs sold by the ISR."

Having obtained these contracts Respondent Evergreen then selects the subcontractor who will be assigned to perform the specific work called for by each contract. So far as the record discloses, the subcontractors have no voice in determining the particular jobs to which they will be assigned. Nor, for that matter, does the subcontractor have any direct contact with customers, save in those instances, apparently rare, where the subcontractor has also sold a particular roofing job as an independent sales representative. All subcontractors testified that they could reject jobs that were assigned to them. However, the evidence discloses only a single specific instance where a subcontractor rejected a roofing job assigned by Respondent Evergreen—Romei testified that he had once turned down a job at the Aurora Drive-In Theatre because "I got dizzy up there . . . and I just didn't feel comfortable being there."

The system followed for performing roofing work is, of course, the polyester cold processing one which Respondent Evergreen has developed and which it markets. While subcontractors own their own pickup trucks and, at least in some instances, their own flatbed trucks, the crucial vehicle for performing the work under this system is the pumper rig developed by Mylan.[7] These rigs are leased to the subcontractors. However, the lease is not a written one and the subcontractors are charged but a dollar per year for the lease of one of these vehicles. When not in use, the rigs normally are parked at Respondent Evergreen yard. Moreover, Respondent Evergreen also provides Gardner and Romei with chase trucks that are used to transport roofing materials to jobsites. So far as the record discloses no rental is charged to them for the chase trucks. While subcontractors are obliged to furnish fuel for their own vehicles, Respondent Evergreen provides the fuel used for the rigs, either from a pump in its yard or by reimbursing the subcontractors for fuel purchased elsewhere. Furthermore, while subcontractors furnish the labor used to maintain the vehicles owned by Mylan or by Respondent Evergreen, the latter furnishes the materials needed and pays for any major maintenance work that must be performed on the rigs or chase trucks.

The materials used to perform the roofing work, i.e., rolls of polyester, cutback, mastic, and webbing, are supplied by Respondent Evergreen. It maintains locked areas at its yard for each of the subcontractors in which these materials are stored and which Respondent Evergreen replenishes periodically. Only in the event that, in effect, a subcontractor causes the loss of material through negligence or heedlessness is the subcontractor charged for the material. While the subcontractors provide their own tools used to perform roofing work, Campbell testified, without contradiction, that journeyman roofers are expected to provide their own handtools. There is no showing that the tools actually used by the subcontractors differed in any respect from what journeyman roofers normally use.

The employees who compose the crews used by Gardner, Romei, and other subcontractors are hired by and paid by the subcontractors at rates which they set. However, during their first year of operation, Gardner and Romei were the only two crewmembers working for Fresh Air, with the result that during that period they did not have the need to hire any employees. Moreover, the initial three person crew hired by Campbell had been working for Respondent Evergreen immediately before commencing work for Campbell. While he testified that he had had a choice as to whether or not to hire them, he acknowledged that Respondent Evergreen had told him to take them as his first crew. Finally, the record discloses evidence of a degree of more regular integration between employees who work for subcontractors and Respondent Evergreen. Thus, Mylan conceded that some or all of the employees hired to do work in Respondent Evergreen's yard alternate back and forth between employment with it and its subcontractors. He further agreed that in some cases Respondent Evergreen provides yardwork to tide over employees who normally do roofing work for Fresh Air in situations where roofing work is not available. In addition, there is evidence of at least one instance where Mylan switched an employee from the crew of one subcontractor to that of another. Thus, Campbell testified that Mylan had asked him (Campbell) to hire and train an employee who had been working around Respondent Evergreen's shop. According to Campbell, Mylan had said "in the beginning . . . that I was to take him for a couple of days and that Chris Romei was to take him for a couple of days" after 2 or 3 days of working for Campbell, the employee was switched to another crew, with Mylan telling Campbell that he was pulling the man off Campbell's crew and transferring him to that of another subcontractor.

[6] Some of the subcontractors have signed such agreements with Respondent Evergreen, thereby enabling them to sell roofing projects, in addition to applying, roofs sold by others. However, as illustrated by Campbell's testimony that he had never signed such an agreement with Respondent Evergreen, it is not necessary for such an agreement to be signed in order for individuals to apply roofs as Respondent Evergreen's subcontractors.

[7] While both Campbell and Gardner agreed that roofs could be applied without the use of such a rig, the former testified that he had never done so and the latter testified, credibly, that it would not be commercially feasible, in the sense of competitive, to do so.

Until January 1980 Respondent Evergreen employed Charles R. Gordon as its superintendent. He distributed the roofing work to the subcontractors. From approximately November 1978 to the end of January 1980, a period during which Respondent Evergreen had considered those performing roofing work as subcontractors, Gordon testified that he had regularly gone to sites where subcontractors were working to check on their progress. Campbell testified, without contradiction, that on approximately 30 percent of the jobs which he had performed while working as a subcontractor for Respondent Evergreen, both Gordon and Mylan had come to the sites to check on the progress of the work being performed there. Moreover, Campbell also testified that, on approximately 20 to 25 percent of the total numbers of jobs which he had been assigned, Mylan or Gordon had given him instructions with regard to "prepping my jobs, prepping my work before I sprayed it, before I laid the roofing material down. Take a fire wall, for instance, up on a roof that has old roofing material on it that has to be repaired. . . . The acceptability of the work to Chuck or Jerry sometimes wasn't acceptable, the work itself and it had to be redone." Indeed, Gordon conceded that he also had checked the quality of the work after each job had been completed.

In January 1980 Gordon executed an Independent Sales Representative Agreement. However, in addition to continuing to distribute work to subcontractors, Gordon continues to go to jobsites to inspect the work of subcontractors and is paid to do so by Respondent Evergreen. Thus, while he does not spend as much time doing so now as had formally been the fact, his inspection visits to sites occupy a maximum of approximately 8 to 10 hours each week. He visits projects "as long as I have the time" and attempts to visit each job, while it is in progress, on at least one occasion. Moreover, he continues to inspect projects after they have been completed, although only in instances where problems have arisen in connection with them.

Subcontractors guarantee their work. However, that guarantee is not written and is given only to Respondent Evergreen, not to customers. Respondent Evergreen, itself, extends a 4-year warranty to oustomers on roofs which it contracts to install. If a defect in the work of a subcontractor is discovered, it is Respondent Evergreen, not the subcontractor who installed the roof, that is contacted by the customer. Gordon testified that if the subcontractor who did the work is still working for Respondent Evergreen, he dispatches that subcontractor to repair the problem. However, if that particular subcontractor is no longer doing work for Respondent Evergreen, then either Gordon or some other contractor makes the repairs. If the subcontractor who performed the work is still working for Respondent Evergreen and if someone else performs the repair work, then that subcontractor is backcharged for the cost of the repairs.

The method of computing the cost of a roofing job is based on the number of squares involved. A square is 10 by 10 feet. The rate charged per square is known as the par rate. It is Respondent Evergreen which sets the par rates for the various types of roofs that can be installed using the polyester cold processing system. The subcontractor, in turn, is awarded a flat percentage of that rate, by Respondent Evergreen, for installing the roof. Romei claimed that this percentage rate had been negotiated by Evergreen and by Fresh Air. However, his testimony in this respect was less than credible, being unsupported either by specific examples of such purported negotiations or by corroboration from other witnesses. Indeed, Mylan testified that Respondent Evergreen publishes a standard par sheet, which is updated from time to time and which shows the rate at which ISRs should bid the various types of roofs for application by the polyester cold prooessing system. According to Mylan that same standard par sheet is used by the subcontractors to determine, based on a percentage of the cost of the job, the rate at which the subcontractors will be remunerated.

Both Gardner and Romei testified that there had been occasions when, on arriving at the job, they had discovered that it had been underbid and that the rates set for performing the work were not sufficient. In that event, they testified that they would contact Respondent Evergreen, normally Gordon, and seek a readjustment. So far as the record discloses, however, final determination as to whether a readjustment will be permitted rests with Respondent Evergreen. While the two subcontractors testified that they had the right to refuse to perform a job if Respondent Evergreen refused to increase the amount that they would be paid for doing so, there is no evidence that they have ever done so. Moreover, there is no showing that situations involving underbidding or low bidding of jobs have ever arisen with any significant degree of frequency. Finally, it is worth noting, that, while Gardner and Romei are ostensibly both employed by Fresh Air Roofing, each of them submits separate bills for the work performed by his crew. So far as the record discloses Fresh Air, itself, does not submit a single bill for the total of work performed collectively by the crews of Romei and Gardner. In short, notwithstanding the existence of Fresh Air as an ostensibly independent entity, Respondents continue to deal separately and individually with Gardner and Romei.

Mylan and each of the subcontractors testified that the latter were free to seek work other than for Respondent Evergreen. However, both Campbell and Gardner testified that they had never done so. Romei testified equivocally with regard to this point. Initially, he claimed that he had attempted to get other work for Fresh Air[8] and that there had been a time when he had done work other than for Respondent Evergreen. Later, however, he acknowledged that he had performed such work prior to forming Fresh Air and that, since working as a subcontractor for Respondent Evergreen, all of his work had been performed at the behest of that firm. Indeed, it seems unlikely that subcontractors would be in a position to perform polyester cold process roofing installation work on their own, separate from Respondent Evergreen. For, Romei agreed that the rig was the heart of Respondent Evergreen's system of installing roofs. As noted above, Gardner testified that it would not be competitive to install roofs by the polyester cold processing system without the rigs. Yet, the rigs are stored at Respondent Evergreen's yard when not in use, and Gordon testified that he would not have authorized removal of the rig by a subcontractor to install a roof for a roofing company other than Respondent Evergreen.

[8] A claim not corroborated by Gardner who is, after all, Romei's partner.

Respondents argue that the subcontractors are independent contractors, within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act, and, accordingly, that their crewmembers are their own employees and not those of Respondents, specifically Respondent Evergreen. Several factors are present which tend to support that contention. Thus, for example, the subcontractors have been established as nominally separate enterprises, in some cases having been incorporated, with their own business licenses. They have rented or purchased some of the vehicles and equipment which they use. They insure and pay for the fuel and other costs of these vehicles. They hire their own crew members, determine the rates of pay for those crewmembers, pay the crew, and make all necessary deductions and contributions on their behalf. They are free to work for firms other than Respondent Evergreen.

Yet the fact that subcontractors have established their own entities, hire, and pay their own helpers, own or lease their own vehicles which they insure and are, in theory, free to work for a number of companies does not compel the conclusion that an independent contractor relationship exists. See, e.g., Seven-Up Bottling Company of Boston, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 506 F.2d 596, 599-600 (1st Cir. 1974); N.L.R.B. v. John Warner, d/b/a D.J.W. Cartage, 587 F.2d 896, 900-901 (8th Cir. 1978). For the correct test for determining whether an employee or independent contractor relationship exists is rooted in whether or not a company, such as Respondent Evergreen, has control over the details and means by which work is to be performed. Thus, as the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit stated in N.L.R.B. v. Phoenix Mut. Life Ins. Co., 167 F.2d 983, 986 (7th Cir. 1948), cert. denied 335 U.S. 845:

> [T]he employer-employee relationship exists when the person for whom the work is done has the right to control and direct the work, not only as to the result accomplished by the work, but also as to the details and means by which that result is accomplished, and . . . it is the right and not the exercise of control which is the determining element.

In this case, a preponderance of the evidence shows that, while Respondent Evergreen's subcontractors are accorded degree of independence, Respondent Evergreen controls the significant and crucial means by which subcontractors perform roofing work, with the result that the subcontractors operations are integrated fully into those of Respondent Evergreen and that the subcontractors lack the entrepreneurial ability normally arising from independent contractor status. Most obvious in this regard is Respondent Evergreen's control over the process to be followed by subcontractors in installing roofs. Respondent Evergreen does not simply retain subcontractors to install roofs by whatever means they deem most appropriate. Rather, Respondent Evergreen markets a specific system for installing roofs, the polyester cold processing system, and subcontractors are obliged to install roofs in accordance with that system. So far as the record discloses, subcontractors have no discretion in this regard and no ability to use some other method, for example, the hot tar process described in footnote 2, supra, for applying roofs. Consequently, they are not free to attempt to improve their profit by substituting a possibly less costly alternative system for the one specified by Respondent Evergreen.

It is Respondent Evergreen, specifically Gordon, who selects the particular projects on which subcontractors are assigned to work in the Seattle area. So far as the record discloses, subcontractors make no contribution to these decisions. Accordingly, the right of assignment to projects rests exclusively with Respondent Evergreen, thereby precluding subcontractors from any possibility of improving their situation through negotiation of better selection of assignments. Moreover, save for those seemingly rare instances where subcontractors have sold roof installations as independent sales representatives, they have no contact with customers regarding the prices at which the roofing work will be performed. Even in situations where the subcontractor sells the project as an independent sales representative, the commissions which subcontractors will receive are set by Respondent Evergreen, pursuant to the above-quoted provision from the Independent Sales Representative Agreement.

While subcontractors can and have sought changes in the rate of compensation for performing specific roofing projects, the evidence shows that such changes have been confined to situations where the projects have been underbid, for one reason or another, and, thus, cannot be performed at the cost contemplated when sold. Thus, these renegotiated changes do not originate from the subcontractors' desire to increase their profit margins, beyond that contemplated by Respondent Evergreen. Rather, they occur within the framework of Respondent Evergreen's unilaterally established price and cost structure and arise only, so far as the record shows, where independent sales representatives have failed to apply that structure properly to specific jobs. Moreover, there is no showing that these types of situations arise within any degree of regularity or frequency. In any event, so far as the record discloses, the ultimate determination as to whether to read just the prices of particular jobs rests solely with Respondent Evergreen. Although subcontractors testified that, in theory, they were free to reject projects if underestimated, in practice only single instance of rejection of a job by a subcontractor was provided and that particular rejection was for reason unrelated to the profitability of the particular job declined by Romei. Of course, in this area, "it is the actual practice which controls." Queen City Paving Company, 243 NLRB 71, fn. 6 (1979); see also Seven-Up Bottling Company of Boston, supra, 506 F.2d at 600.

In sum, therefore, Respondent Evergreen has exclusive control over the income of its subcontractors from work performed for it, having been the party in control of negotiations for roofing contracts with customers, having been the one to select the jobs which the subcontractors will perform, and having unilaterally determined the rates to be paid to the subcontractors for performing that work. Subcontractors are left in the position of having no contact with customers and "no opportunity for the negotiation of different rates" with them for performing roofing installations. Lucky Stores, Inc., 243 NLRB 642, 644 (1979). "Decisions with respect to the line of products to be sold, the type of customer to be serviced, and, in general, the normal risk-taking ventures which distinguish the small businessman/independent contractor from an employee are, in this case, all made by [Respondent Evergreen]." The Standard Oil Co. (of Ohio), 241 NLRB 1248, 1251 (1979).

As set forth above, in theory the subcontractors are free to perform roofing work other than for Respondent Evergreen. However, in practice, so far as the evidence discloses, none of them has ever done so, and, of course, it is the practice which is controlling in this area. Queen City Paving Co., supra. Moreover, it is unlikely that they would be able to install roofs using the polyester cold processing system independently of Respondent Evergreen. For the pumper rig is necessary to do so competitively and Gordon testified that he would not authorize the use of these rigs by subcontractors to, in effect, compete with Respondent Evergreen.[9] Nor is there any evidence that Respondent Evergreen would permit subcontractors to forgo accepting its assignments for roofing work in order to engage in other roofing work, independent of Respondent Evergreen. In any event, the performance of work for others than Respondent Evergreen would not, of itself, suffice to establish that an independent contractor relationship exists. See, e.g., Carpet, Linoleum and Soft Tile Layers Local No. 1238 (Robert A. Arnold d/b/a Arnold's Carpet), 175 NLRB 332, 334 (1969).

While subcontractors are expected to repair or pay for any damage that they might cause to a customer's property, and to correct or pay for the correction of any deficiency in the roofing work they perform, of itself, this would not dictate conclusion that an independent contractor relationship exists. Local No. 2265, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO (Carpet Center, Inc.), 170 NLRB 633, 634 (1968). Indeed, while subcontractors guarantee their work, that guarantee is a nonwritten one given only to Respondent Evergreen and not to the customers. The 4-year warranty that is extended to customers is one given by Respondent Evergreen. In the final analysis, it is to Respondent Evergreen, not to the subcontractors, that customers look for correction of deficiencies and for restitution of damages caused by subcontractors.

As noted above, the fact that subcontractors lease or purchase vehicles which they use in performing work for Respondent Evergreen is not determinative of the relationship to Respondent Evergreen. See Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners (Carpet Center, Inc.), supra; Sheet Metal Workers Union Local 283, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL-CIO (Thomas A. DeVol, d/b/a Tad's Service), 172 NLRB 652, 658 (1968). So far as the evidence discloses, even without these vehicles the subcontractors would still be able to install roofs using the polyester cold processing system. For, the vehicles that are crucial to that system are the pumper rigs. Those owned by Mylan and are furnished to the subcontractors at a nominal rental fee, at best, under an oral lease. Without these rigs, it is uncontradicted that it would not be competitive to install roofs using the polyester cold processing system. Moreover, in addition to the pumper rigs, Respondent Evergreen furnishes, apparently at no cost to the subcontractors, chase trucks which are used to transport the materials needed for performing the roofing work at no cost to the subcontractors. Thus, the essential vehicles used to install the roofing system, by means of the polyester cold processing system, and to transport materials to project sites are furnished by Respondent Evergreen to the subcontractors, virtually at no cost. And, as Gordon's testimony illustrates, control of those vehicles remains with Respondent Evergreen.

Respondent Evergreen also furnishes the material needed to install the roofs at no cost to the subcontractors. There is no evidence that subcontractors are free to substitute alternative, possibly cheaper, materials from other sources for that provided by Respondent Evergreen. Consequently, so far as the record discloses, the subcontractors are not able to increase profit by searching for and securing alternative sources for supplies. In effect, that is controlled exlusively by Respondent Evergreen. Although subcontractors are obliged to pay for materials damaged, lost, or used negligently, that does not appear to have been a significant occurrence and, in any event, it is not abnormal for employers to charge employees for negligent loss, damage, on use of materials. Accordingly, this factor does not dictate the existence of an independent contractor relationship.

Great emphasis is placed by Respondents on the fact that subcontractors select their own employees for hire, direct their work, and set their rates of compensation, which is paid by the subcontractors. Yet, close examination of these features shows that the independent judgment exercised by subcontractors in this area is not much diffenent, if at all, from that which is exercised by many supervisors. Thus, the nature of the work to be done is governed by the facts that Respondent Evergreen has contracted for the work and has determined the system to be utilized in performing it. Campbell's uncontradicted testimony illustrates that, in addition, Mylan and Gordon come to sites and give their own directions on a not insignificant number of occasions. Further, the wage rates of crewmembers selected by subcontractors are subject to the limitations of the amount that subcontractors will receive for performing the work. That amount, as found above, is established unilaterally by Respondent Evergreen. Finally, the ability to select crewmembers who will be hired is a supervisory function. Of itself, it does not dictate a conclusion that there is independent contractor status. In any event, the record here shows that Respondent Evergreen has been involved in this process. It has suggested that particular employees be used as crewmembers by subcontractors. On at least one occasion, it unilaterally has shifted an employee from one subcontractor's crew to that of another. When possible, it provides work in its yard for subcontractors' crewmembers when there is a shortage of roofing work for them to perform. In short, the record does not support the independence from Respondent Evergreen of subcontractors in the area of the employment of crewmembers that Respondent Evergreen seeks to portray. Moreover, it is significant that, rather than simply paying Fresh Air, as an entity, for the work which its crews perform, Respondent Evergreen pays Romei and Gardner separately for the work which each of their crews performs, thereby effectively disregarding the fact that they are nominally part of a single entity.

[9] Although at least one subcontractor testified that he had purchased a flatbed truck for the purpose of developing his own rig, there is no evidence that he has made any further efforts, beyond the purchase of the vehicle, to do so. Moreover, there is no evidence that such a rig would be developed by that contractor within any forseeable period of time. In these circumstances, it is, at best, speculative that this subcontractor would develop his own rig to, in effect, compete with Respondent in using the polyester cold processing system in the future.

In these circumstances, I find that the subcontractors used by Respondent Evergreen are not independent contractors but rather, despite Respondent Evergreen's change in their nominal relationship, that an employer employee relation has continued to exist between the roofing crews and Respondent Evergreen. Inasmuch as Respondent Evergreen, as found above, in the same employer as Respondent BBS, the two constituting a single employer, and in view of the fact that the roofing crews have continued as its employees, I find that by failing to continue applying the terms of Respondent BBS's collective-bargaining agreement to these employees during the period on and after May 7, 1979, Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Moreover, by failing and refusing to provide the above-described information requested in the Union's January 1980 letter, which is information relative to the bargaining process, Respondents have further violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Better Building Supply Corp., and Evergreen Roofing, Inc., are each employers within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce and in businesses affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and, collectively, constitute a single employing enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

2. Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, is labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. A unit appropriate for collective bargaining is:

> All roofers and waterproofers employed by Better Building Supply Corp., Evergreen Roofing, Inc., and their subcontractors employed in Clallam, Jefferson, King, Kitsap, Mason and Snohomish Counties, Washington; excluding professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. At all times material Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described bargaining unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By failing and refusing to continue recognizing Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described bargaining unit and by failing and refusing to apply the terms and conditions of the current collective-bargaining agreement to those employees, Better Building Supply Corp., and Evergreen Roofing, Inc., have unlawfully terminated and modified the terms and conditions of said collective-bargaining agreement before it could be reopened pursuant to its provisions, thereby violating Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. By failing and refusing to provide Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, with requested information that is relevant and necessary to the collective-bargaining process, Better Building Supply Corp., and Evergreen Roofing, Inc., thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Better Building Supply Corp., and Evergreen Roofing, Inc., have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and that they take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act. Specifically, they shall be ordered to honor the terms of the current collective-bargaining agreement and to make whole all employees for any losses sustained by the failure to apply the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement to them on and after May 7, 1979, with interest to be paid on the amounts owing and to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), enforcement denied on different grounds 322 F.2d 913 (9th Cir. 1963).

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended

ORDER[10]

The Respondents, Better Building Supply Corp., and Evergreen Roofing, Inc., Seattle, Washington, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees in the bargaining unit heretofore found appropriate in Conclusion of Law 3, above.

(b) Failing and refusing to apply to all employees in the aforesaid bargaining unit all terms and conditions of the current collective-bargaining agreement, absent the express written consent of Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO.

(c) Refusing to bargain collectively by refusing, upon request, to supply relevant information needed by Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, to represent the employees in the aforesaid bargaining unit.

(d) Refusing to provide Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, to represent the employees in the aforesaid bargaining unit.

(e) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of any right guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Upon request bargain collectively with Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees employed in the bargaining unit heretofore found appropriate in Conclusion of Law 3, above.

(b) Apply the terms and conditions of the current collective-bargaining agreement to all employees employed in the aforesaid contractual bargaining unit.

(c) Provide Local 54 of the United Slate, Tile & Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers Association, AFL-CIO, with any and all requested information that is relevant and necessary to the collective-bargaining process.

(d) Make whole employees for any losses of pay or benefits which would have accrued to them on and after May 7, 1979, under the current collective-bargaining agreement but for the failure to apply the terms and conditions of that agreement to all employees employed in the aforesaid contractual bargaining unit on and after that date.

(e) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Post at their Seattle, Washington, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being duly signed by their authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondents immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by them for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Better Building Supply Co., and Evergreen Roofing, Inc., to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director for Region 19, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

[10] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

This is proceeding under Section 10(k) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, following a charge filed by Northwestern Indiana Building and Construction Trades Council, herein called the Charging Party, alleging that Allied Workers Local 101 and Leonard Samuels and Walter Dickson, herein called the Allied Workers, had violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act by engaging in certain proscribed activity with the object of forcing or requiring Tonn and Blank, Inc., the general contractor, and its subcontractors, Airo-Kool Cooling and Heating, Inc.; Allen's Construction Co., Inc.; Area Sheet Metal, Inc.; Continental Electric Co., Inc.; Wm. Hayden Contractor; Maris Roofing Co., Inc.; Mur's Electric Co.; Pyramid Mechanical Contractor, Inc.; Security Co., Inc.; Chester Dicksons d/b/a Dicksons Electric Co.; U.S. Dismantlement Corp.; and Mose Roberts d/b/a Roberts Wrecking Co., herein collectively called the Employers, to assign certain work to employees represented by the Allied Workers rather than to employees represented by Sheet Metal Workers International Association Local Union 303, AFL-CIO; Northwest Indiana and Vicinity District Council of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local 1005, AFL-CIO; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local Union No. 697, AFL-CIO; Bricklayers and Allied Craftsmen Union Local No. 6 of Indiana, AFL-CIO; United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers and Allied Workers, Local Union No. 26, AFL-CIO; Local #433 of the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada (Union), AFL-CIO; Cement Masons Local Union No. 406 (O.P. & C.M.I.A.), AFL-CIO; Glaziers' Local Union No. 82 of the Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators and Paperhangers of America, Gary and Vicinity (AFL-CIO); Laborers' Local No. 81, Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL-CIO; and Painters Local Union No. 8, Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators and Paperhangers of America, Gary, Indiana, AFL-CIO, herein collectively referred to as affiliates of the Charging Party.

Pursuant to notice a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Robert Perkovich on August 11 and 12, 1981. All parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to adduce evidence bearing on the issues. Thereafter, the Employers and the Charging Party filed briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the Hearing Officer's rulings made at the hearing and finds that they are free from prejudicial error. They are hereby affirmed.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following findings:

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYERS

The parties stipulated, and we find, that the general contractor, an Indiana corporation, is engaged in the business of general construction. During the past 12 months, a representative period, the general contractor purchased materials from outside the State having a value in excess of $50,000. Therefore, we find that the general contractor is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. The parties further stipulated and we find, that the subcontractors are employers within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

The parties stipulated, and we find, that the Allied Workers and the Charging Party and its affiliates are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE DISPUTE

A. The Work in Dispute

The parties stipulated, and we find, that the work in dispute involves all construction rehabilitation work, including but not limited to painting, drywall, bricklaying, roofing, plumbing, heating and ventilating, demolition, carpentry, fencing, concrete work, electrical, and general labor work, being performed on apartment buildings and apartments at the construction site known as the West Gary Redevelopment Project in Gary, Indiana.

B. Background and Facts of the Dispute

The general contractor began work at the jobsite in May 1981.[1] Both the general contractor and its subcontractors assigned the work in dispute to employees who were represented by affiliates of the Charging Party. Cleven Allen, owner of Allen's Construction Co., Inc., one of the subcontractors, testified that on June 8 he was approached by the Allied Workers president, Leonard Samuels, and business agent, Walter Dickson. They asked Allen if he would hire some of their members. Allen stated that he had a contract with the Carpenters Union, an affiliate of the Charging Party, and that he knew nothing about the Allied Workers. Allen asked them what his obligations would be if he hired their members. Samuels and Dickson stated that he could pay them what the other subcontractors paid. William Hayden, the owner of Wm. Hayden Contractor, one of the subcontractors, testified that on June 9 he was likewise approached by Samuels and a couple of business agents for the Allied Workers. Samuels asked Hayden to hire some men, and Hayden replied that he did not need any. Immediately thereafter, pickets arrived at the jobsite with signs stating that "Tonn and Blank Was Unfair to Local 101 and the People of Gary." The pickets and that Hayden should hire members of the Allied Workers. The parties stipulated that the Allied Workers picketed the jobsite at least from June 20 through June 24. Witnesses at the hearing testified about further picketing by the Allied Workers on June 29 and 30 and on July 4. On June 29 and 30, the Allied Workers picketed the jobsite and threatened to kill the general contractor's superintendent, John Monaco, and carpenter Paul Carpenter, respectively. Various witnesses also testified about alleged acts of violence and physical threats by the picketers. According to Benjamin Thomas, president of Airo-Kool, a subcontractor, he told Samuels at some point during the picketing that he would place members of the Allied Workers on the job if they were qualified and if they joined the appropriate union affiliate of the Charging Party. Samuels stated that he would send Thomas a list of qualified people but that it did not matter if they were members of the Allied Workers as long as they were black. Thomas never received such a list from Samuels. Finally, Bruce Meyer, the general contractor's project manager, stated that he informed Samuels on August 1 that the general contractor was not interested in participating in a training program with the Allied Workers because it had not been certified by the Labor Department. Samuels replied that he wanted his members employed on the job and that inasmuch as the hiring situation had not been settled there would be more demonstrations at the site the following week.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employers and the Charging Party and its affiliates contend that the work in dispute was properly assigned to employees represented by the Charging Party's affiliates on the basis of collective-bargaining agreements, the Employers' assignments and past practices, area practice, relative skills, and efficiency and economy of operation.

The Allied Workers maintains that it represents black employees who have traditionally been discriminated against in the construction industry in Gary, and that inasmuch as its members are qualified they should be assigned 51 percent of the disputed work.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed upon a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

The record summarized above indicates that in June and July the president and business agents of the Allied Workers demanded that the general contractor and the subcontractors assign at least 50 percent of the disputed work to employees represented by the Allied Workers. The demands were refused, and the Allied Workers picketed the project and engaged in threats in furtherance of the demands. The parties have stipulated that no method existed for voluntarily resolving the dispute.

[1] All dates hereafter refer to 1981.

Based on the foregoing, we find that there is reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there is no agreed-upon method for the voluntary adjustment of the work dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that this dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) of the Act requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after giving due consideration to various factors.[2] The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on commonsense and experience reached by balancing those factors involved in a particular case.[3]

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of the dispute before us:

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreements

There is no evidence to show that the Allied Workers or any of the affiliates of the Charging Party have been certified by the Board as representatives of employees performing the work in dispute. The general contractor and its subcontractors, however, have collective-bargaining agreements with the respective affiliates of the Charging Party. Neither the general contractor nor any of its subcontractors have a collective-bargaining agreement with the Allied Workers. We therefore find that the relevant collective-bargaining agreements favor awarding the work to employees represented by the affiliates of the Charging Party.

2. The Employers' assignments and past practices

The general contractor and the subcontractors, in accordance with their preference, assigned the work in dispute to employees represented by affiliates of the Charging Party. Further, all of the representatives of the general contractor and the subcontractors who testified stated that their consistent practice has been to assign such work to affiliates of the Charging Party. Accordingly, we find that both the Employers' assignments and past practices favor awarding the work to employees represented by the affiliates of the Charging Party.

3. Area practice

The evidence indicates that approximately 99.9 percent of the construction work in the Gary, Indiana, area is union work and that all of the union work is performed by affiliates of the Charging Party. Consequently, we find that the factor of area practice favors awarding the work in dispute to employees represented by the affiliates of the Charging Party.

4. Relative skills

The record discloses that the rehabilitation work being done at the project by the various trades requires greater skill than a regular construction job which begins from the ground up because of the selective replacement of materials and fixtures throughout the existing structures. Further, the project is a job issued by the Department of Housing and Urban Development and as such all apprentices on the job are required to be members of an apprenticeship program approved by the Department of Labor. Each of the local craft unions affiliated with the Charging Party has its own certified apprenticeship program in which the requisite skills to perform the disputed work are taught. Although the Laborers' Union does not send its members through an apprenticeship program, those involved in the demolition work were selected by the general contractor because of their skill and experience in that area. In contrast, there is no evidence to indicate that the Allied Workers members possess the skills necessary to perform all or any part of the work in dispute. The Allied Workers president testified that it has a training program for the construction trades but he was unable to describe the program and was unsure of its scope and reach. Further, any of the Allied Workers training programs which may exist are not certified. We find that this factor favors awarding the disputed work to employees represented by the affiliates of the Charging Party.

5. Efficiency and economy of operation

It appears from the record that employees represented by the affiliates of the Charging Party perform their work efficiently and that many of the subcontractors maintain permanent work crews which travel from job to job and work together for long periods of time. If any of the Employers are required to hire employees represented by the Allied Workers, they will have to lay off present employees. Accordingly, we find that the factors of efficiency and economy of operation also favor awarding the work to employees represented by the Charging Party's affiliates.

[3] International Association of Machinists, Lodge No. 1743, AFL-CIO (J. A. Jones Construction Company), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

Conclusion

Upon the record as a whole, and after full consideration of all relevant factors involved, we conclude that employees who are represented by the affiliates of the Charging Party are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the Employers' collective-bargaining agreements, the Employers' assignments and past practices, area practice, relative skills, and efficiency and economy of operation. In making this determination, we are awarding the work in question to employees who are represented by the affiliates of the Charging Party, but not to those Unions or to their members. The present determination is limited to the particular controversy which gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

Pursuant to Section 10(k) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and upon the basis of the foregoing findings and the entire record in this proceeding, the National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute:

1. Employees of Tonn and Blank, Inc,; Airo-Kool Cooling and Heating, Inc.; Allen's Construction Co., Inc.; Area Sheet Metal, Inc.; Continental Electrical Co., Inc.; Wm. Hayden Contractor; Maris Roofing Co., Inc.; Mur's Electric Co.; Pyramid Mechanical Contractor, Inc.; Security Co., Inc.; Chester Dicksons d/b/a Dicksons Electric Co.; U.S. Dismantlement Corp.; and Mose Roberts d/b/a Roberts Wrecking Co., who are represented by Sheet Metal Workers International Association Local Union 303, AFL-CIO; Northwest Indiana and Vicinity District Council of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local 1005, AFL-CIO; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local Union No. 697, AFL-CIO; Bricklayers and Allied Craftsmen Union Local No. 6 of Indiana, AFL-CIO; United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers and Allied Workers, Local Union No. 26, AFL-CIO; Local #433 of the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada (Union), AFL-CIO; Cement Masons Local Union No. 406 (O.P. & C.M.I.A.), AFL-CIO; Glaziers' Local Union No. 82 of the Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators and Paperhangers of America, Gary and Vicinity (AFL-CIO); Laborers' Local Union No. 81, Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL-CIO; and Painters Local Union No. 8, Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators and Paperhangers of America, Gary, Indiana, AFL-CIO, are entitled to perform all construction rehabilitation work at the West Gary Redevelopment Project in Gary, Indiana.

2. Allied Workers Local 101 and Leonard Samuels and Walter Dickson are not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force or require Tonn and Blank, Inc.; Airo-Kool Cooling and Heating, Inc.; Allen's Construction Co., Inc.; Area Sheet Metal, Inc.; Continental Electric Co., Inc.; Wm. Hayden Contractor; Maris Roofing Co., Inc.; Mur's Electric Co.; Pyramid Mechanical Contractor, Inc.; Security Co., Inc.; Chester Dicksons d/b/a Dicksons Electric Co.; U.S. Dismantlement Corp.; and Mose Roberts d/b/a Roberts Wrecking Co., to assign the disputed work to employees represented by that labor organization.

3. Within 10 days from the date of this Decision and Determination of Dispute, Allied Workers Local 101 and Leonard Samuels and Walter Dickson shall notify the Regional Director for Region 13, in writing, whether or not it will refrain from forcing or requiring the Employers, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act, to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with the above determination.

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

Pursuant to authority granted it by the National Labor Relations Board under Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, a three-member panel has considered the objections to an election held July 24, 1980,[1] and the Acting Regional Director's report recommending disposition of same. The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief, and hereby adopts the Acting Regional Director's findings and recommendations.[2]

CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

It is hereby certified that a majority of the valid ballots have not been cast for Warehouse, Mail Order, Ice, Cold Storage, Soft Drink, Waste Paper, Distribution Workers, Egg Candlers, Miscellaneous Drivers and Helpers Local Union No. 838, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America, and that said labor organization is not the exclusive representative of all the employees, in the unit herein involved, within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

MEMBER JENKINS, dissenting:

My colleagues find nothing objectionable in the Employer's repeated warnings to employees about the possible harmful consequences of the Union's representing them in collective bargaining. Thus, they find the Employer's bargaining-from-scratch statements similar to statements found to be unobjectionable in two cases on which they rely in overruling the objection.[3] In my judgment, President Chernicky's statements in C & K Coal Company and General Manager Lew's statements in Host International, Inc., do not rise to the level of the pattern of repeated references to loss of benefits present here, not only in President Willkie's statements but also in a leaflet circulated by the Employer on three different occasions.

In addition, I note that Willkie and the leaflets discussed the Employer's obligation to bargain in good faith and my colleagues adopt the Acting Regional Director's finding that Willkie expressed no intention of doing otherwise. However, it does not appear from the leaflets or Willkie's statements reported by the Acting Regional Director that the Employer assured the employees that it would bargain in good faith at the time it was making the statements in dispute here. But the Board has considered the presence of such assurances as a factor in evaluating the context surrounding such statements.[4]

In sum, I do not find that the Employer's statements here were limited to pointing out that bargaining does not automatically or necessarily lead to increases in benefits. Rather, in the entire context they represented a not very veiled warning to the employees to reject the Union or face the loss of existing benefits. Such objectionable conduct requires that the election be set aside and a new election be conducted.

[1] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt pro forma the Acting Regional Director's recommendations that Petitioner's Objections 1(b) and 1(c) be overruled.

[2] We have attached as an appendix that portion of the Acting Regional Director's report dealing with Petitioner's Objection 2(b), which alleges, inter alia, threats by the Employer of a loss of benefits. [Omitted from publication.] In adopting the Acting Regional Director's recommendation that this objection be overruled, we do not rely on Ludwig Motor Corp., 222 NLRB 635 (1976). We also note that speech found to be protected by Sec. 8(c) from challenge as an unfair labor practice may nevertheless be found objectionable under the more restrictive standard for speech applicable in a representation election proceeding. Dal-Tex Optical Company, Inc., 137 NLRB 1782, 1786-87 (1962). Accordingly, we rely upon C & K Coal Company, 195 NLRB 1038 (1972), and Host International, Inc., 195 NLRB 348 (1972), in which bargaining-from-scratch statements similar to those made by the Employer here were found to be unobjectionable.

Because we find the Employer's statements individually unobjectionable, we do not agree with our colleague that nonetheless cumulatively they are objectionable by virtue of their repetition. We note that in Host International, Inc., supra, the similar statements were made at two separate meetings, and in C & K Coal Company, supra, the similar statements were made at several points throughout an employee meeting. Neither do we find significant, as does our colleague, the fact that the Employer stated that it had the obligation to bargain in good faith, rather than expressly stating that it intended to bargain in good faith. C & K Coal Company, supra.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on August 17, 1981, by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, Local 387, herein called the Union, and duly served on Arizona Public Service Company, herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 28, issued a complaint on September 1, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that, since June 25, 1981, following a Board Decision and Order,[1] and at all times thereafter, Respondent has refused, and continues to date to refuse, to recognize and to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent's Palo Verde, Arizona, nuclear power plant production and maintenance employees in the appropriate unit,[2] although the Union has requested and is requesting it to do so. On September 14, 1981, Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint.

On September 22, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on September 30, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

In its answer to the complaint, Respondent admits that the existing systemwide unit of certain of its production and maintenance employees constitutes a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act, and that the Union is the designated exclusive representative of its production and maintenance employees as set forth in successive collective-bargaining agreements. Respondent, however, stresses that these agreements do not include the Palo Verde production and maintenance employees, and denies that the Palo Verde employees may be part of the systemwide bargaining unit without first having an opportunity to vote in a self-determination election as to whether they wish to be included in that unit or to remain unrepresented.

In the Motion for Summary Judgment, the General Counsel argues that Respondent's answer attempts to relitigate issues that were raised and determined by the Board in the underlying representation cases. We agree with the General Counsel.

The record, including the record in the underlying representation cases, Cases 28-RM-394 and 28-UC-111, shows that, in December 1980, Respondent filed an RM petition seeking an election among its production and maintenance employees at its Palo Verde nuclear power plant, and that the Union filed a UC petition seeking a clarification of the existing systemwide production and maintenance unit to include the Palo Verde employees as an accretion to the systemwide unit. Following transfer of the cases to the Board by the Regional Director, on June 5, 1981, the Board issued a Decision and Order[3] in which it found that Respondent's Palo Verde production and maintenance employees were an accretion to the existing systemwide bargaining unit represented by the Union. The Board found that no question concerning representation of the Palo Verde employees existed, and therefore dismissed the petition in Case 28-RM-394.

On June 15, 1981, Respondent filed with the Board a motion for reconsideration of the Board's Decision and Order. On June 19, 1981, the Board issued an unpublished Order denying Respondent's motion. On July 1, 1981, Respondent filed with the Board a renewed motion for reconsideration of the Board's Decision and Order. On July 9, 1981, the Board issued an unpublished Order denying Respondent's renewed motion.

On June 24 and July 13, 1981, the Union requested Respondent to recognize it as the exclusive representative of the Palo Verde production and maintenance employees and to bargain collectively regarding those employees' rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment. Respondent, by letters dated June 25 and July 20, 1981, refused to recognize and to bargain with the Union, and has continued to refuse to recognize and to bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its Palo Verde employees. Respondent asserts as reasons for its continued refusal to recognize and to bargain with the Union that the Board ignored acts which make the application of the accretion doctrine inappropriate in this case, that the Palo Verde employees constitute a new and distinct grouping, and that Board law requires that such employees be granted a self-determination election as to whether they wish to be represented by the Union or remain unrepresented—arguments previously presented to and considered by the Board. Thus, it appears that Respondent is attempting to raise in this proceeding issues which were raised and determined in the underlying representation cases.

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[4]

All issues raised by Respondent in this proceeding were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, and Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege that any special circumstances exist herein which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, an Arizona corporation, is engaged as a public utility in the generation, transmission, distribution, and sale of electricity and natural gas. During the past 12-month period, which period is representative of its operations generally, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $250,000, and during the same period of time purchased goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which were transported in interstate commerce and delivered to its operations in the State of Arizona directly from suppliers located in States of the United States other than the State of Arizona.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, Local 387, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent throughout Respondent's systemwide operations.

2. The recognition

At all times material herein, the Union has been the designated exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the unit described above, and has been recognized as such by Respondent. Such recognition has been embodied in successive collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent of which is effective by its terms from April 1, 1980, to April 1, 1982.

3. The Board's Decision and Order

On June 5, 1981, the Board issued a Decision and Order,[5] finding, inter alia, that certain production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its Palo Verde, Arizona, nuclear power plant, which is currently in the process of being constructed, are an accretion to, and included in, the unit described above.

[5] 256 NLRB 400.

B. The Request To Bargain and Respondent's Refusal

Commencing on or about June 24, 1981, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit. Commencing on or about June 25, 1981, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in said unit.

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since June 25, 1981, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Arizona Public Service Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, Local 387, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent throughout Respondent's systemwide operations constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times material herein, the above-named labor organization has been and now is the designated exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing on or about June 25, 1981, and at all times thereafter, to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees of Respondent in the appropriate unit, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Arizona Public Service Company, Palo Verde, Arizona, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, Local 387, as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent throughout Respondent's systemwide operations.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at its Palo Verde, Arizona, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 28, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 28, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, Local 387, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain with the above-named Union, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by us throughout our systemwide operations.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On June 25, 1981, Administrative Law Judge James L. Rose issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Brooks Shoe Manufacturing Company, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. United Food & Commercial Workers Union Local 1436, chartered by United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By threatening employees with discharge, layoff, plant closure, and other reprisals because of their interest in or activity on behalf of the Union, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

The General Counsel excepted to the Administrative Law Judge's failure to make a number of specific findings. Except for the General Counsel's exceptions regarding threats that Elm Street employees would be laid off, or admissions that they had been laid off, because they supported the Union, we believe the findings requested by the General Counsel are implicit in the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Respondent interrogated employees concerning their interest in and activity on behalf of the Union, and threatened them with discharge, warehouse closure, and other reprisals. With respect to exceptions pertaining to statements about layoff, we find that, based on evidence discussed by the Administrative Law Judge, Respondent threatened employees with layoff because they supported the Union and stated that employees had been laid off because they supported the Union, thereby violating Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. We shall modify the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order and notice accordingly.

Because the record fails to disclose a sufficient nexus between Supervisor O'Donnell's statement to employee Shue that she might be transferred back to West Chestnut and Shue's union activities, we find no merit in the General Counsel's exception that O'Donnell's statement violated Sec. 8(a)(1). The General Counsel notes that the conversation referred to in sec. III.B.1, par. 6, of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision occurred on July 15, 1980, rather than July 5, 1980, and we hereby correct this inadvertent error accordingly.

While we agree that the Administrative Law Judge correctly discredited the reasons advanced by Respondent for the discharges of the Elm Street employees, we decline to adopt his statement that employee punching of other employees' timecards is a common practice in industry.

Member Jenkins regards the Administrative Law Judge's reference to Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), to be inapposite. That decision concerns identifying the cause of discharge where a genuine lawful and a genuine unlawful reason exist. Where, as here, the asserted lawful reason is found to be a pretext, only one genuine reason remains—the unlawful one. To attempt to apply Wright Line in such a situation is futile, confusing, and misleading.

[2] The Administrative Law Judge failed to make conclusions of law based upon his findings. We make herein conclusions of law consistent with his findings of fact, as modified herein.

In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Brooks Shoe Manufacturing Company, Inc., Hanover, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(b):

"(b) Threatening employees with discharge, layoff, plant closure, and other reprisals because of their interest in or activity on behalf of the Union."

2. Insert the following as paragraph 1(c) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(c) Stating that employees had been laid off because of their interest in or activity on behalf of the Union."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against employees because of their interest in or activity on behalf of United Food & Commercial Workers Union Local 1436, chartered by United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO.

WE WILL NOT interrogate employees about their interest in or activity on behalf of the Union.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with discharge, layoff, plant closure, or other reprisals because of their interest in or activity on behalf of the Union.

WE WILL NOT state that employees were laid off because of their interest in or activity on behalf of the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

WE WILL offer full and immediate reinstatement to Mary Ann Slothour, Belinda Geiman, Phyllis Shue, and Morgan Dietz to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment, and WE WILL make them whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, with interest.

BROOKS SHOE MANUFACTURING COMPANY, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES L. ROSE, Administrative Law Judge: This matter was heard before me on April 1 and 2, 1981, at York, Pennsylvania, upon the General Counsel's complaint which alleged generally that the Respondent terminated four employees on June 12 and 13, 1980,[1] because of their union activity in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 151, et seq. It is also alleged that, through Supervisor John O'Donnell, the Respondent committed various violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The Respondent contends that the union activity played no part in the termination of the four employees—that they were "permanently laid off" because they had committed numerous violations of company rules including drinking alcoholic beverages on company premises, punching others' timecards, and low productivity. The Respondent generally denied that it committed any unfair labor practices.

Upon the record as a whole, including my observation of the witnesses and the briefs and arguments of counsel, I hereby make the following:

[1] All dates are in 1980 unless otherwise indicated.

Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

I. JURISDICTION

Brooks Shoe Manufacturing Company, Inc. (herein the Respondent or the Company), is engaged in the distribution and sale primarily of athletic footwear. At its Hanover, Pennsylvania, facility the Respondent receives raw materials which it ships to companies in Puerto Rico and the Dominican Republic where the shoes are manufactured. The finished products are shipped to Hanover, and from there to customers throughout the United States and abroad.

In the course and conduct of its business, the Respondent annually receives at its Hanover facility products valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and annually ships directly to points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania goods and products valued in excess of $50,000. The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and 2(7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

United Food & Commercial Workers Union Local 1436, chartered by the United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO (herein the Union), is admitted to be, and I find is, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background Facts

As noted above, the primary business of the Respondent at its Hanover facility is to receive and ship raw materials and to receive and ship finished products. Running shoes, which account for about 80 percent of the Respondent's sales, are received and shipped from the West Chestnut Street warehouse. Other athletic shoes (basketball, baseball, all purpose, etc.) are received and shipped out of the Elm Street warehouse; and raw materials are received and shipped from the Factory Street facility (Titus warehouse).

During the times material here, there were more than 50 employees engaged in various warehousing duties—30 at the Titus building (most of whom were in rework), about 25 at West Chestnut, and about 5 to 8 at Elm Street.

Most of the West Chestnut and Elm Street employees were involved in processing orders for customers; however, there were a few who did rework on damaged shoes and made special order alterations.

In early spring, an organizational campaign began among the Respondent's employees. Authorization cards were signed and a representation petition was filed in Case 4-RC-14198. A hearing on that petition was held on May 30 followed by the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election, affirmed by the Board. An election was held on October 15 which resulted in a certification of no representative.

John O'Donnell, he testified, has worked for the Respondent off and on since 1938. Before May, and apparently for some years, O'Donnell was the West Chestnut warehouse foreman, in charge of the first, or day, shift. For about 1 month during the last of each calendar quarter, Bill Myers was the foreman of a smaller night shift. In addition, Myers was the foreman at the Elm Street warehouse.

Sometime in April the Respondent's senior management officials determined to shift O'Donnell and Myers, putting O'Donnell in charge of the Elm Street warehouse and Myers in charge of West Chestnut. Alan Carmel, the Company's general counsel and a member of the senior management committee, testified that this decision was based on their determination that Myers was a more effective supervisor than O'Donnell—that Myers' second shift crew at West Chestnut was more productive on an employee/hour basis than O'Donnell's. In fact, Carmel testified, "To be perfectly frank, John O'Donnell was not what you call the best supervisor in the world."

Myers testified that he was advised by a John Benowitz that the change was being made because management had discovered there was a lot of "drinking" going on at the West Chestnut warehouse.

Benowitz told O'Donnell about the change and that O'Donnell should pick five employees of his choice to transfer to the Elm Street warehouse; but, according to Myers, Benowitz told O'Donnell that he could not take any of Myers' employees.

The change was made in early May. But for about 2 weeks or so, three of the previous Elm Street employees stayed on to do special orders, rather than immediately transferring to West Chestnut. One of these was Rosalie Long, who testified that she soon observed a lot of drinking beer among the transferred employees, and a lot of "goofing off." When she asked why the others were standing around or sitting in their cars in the parking lot, and the like, she was told that there was "no work."

In any event, Long was motivated to contact Myers and to tell him about the drinking and goofing off and that if he did not transfer her immediately to West Chestnut Street she would quit. She was in fact transferred a few days later, apparently the last week in May.

The drinking observed by Long took place prior to O'Donnell going on vacation but, she testified, it was more pronounced during the week he was gone. The Saturday following Long's call, Myers in fact went to the Elm Street warehouse to see what was going on. At that time he noticed a receipt for a key dated May 17. That the Myers visit to the warehouse occurred on May 17 is generally consistent with the testimony of all the witnesses.[2]

Myers testified that he observed many beer cans in various trash containers throughout the warehouse as well as an old shoe in one of the trash cans. Myers attempted to contact Carmel as well as Jerry Turner, the Respondent's vice president and part owner, but was unable to do so. He did contact a fellow employee who joined him at the warehouse to verify the condition.

[2] The dates of these events are unclear from the record; however, the consensus has the shift of employees in the first of May. During the middle of the month, O'Donnell took a 1-week vacation, returning to work on May 19.

The next Monday, Myers contacted Benowitz, whom he then heard place a telephone call to O'Donnell stating that the drinking had to stop or else all the warehouse employees would be eliminated, including their supervisor.

Myers went on to testify that following this, on many trips to the Elm Street warehouse for about 2 weeks or so, he saw no evidence of beer drinking. He next observed evidence of beer drinking in early June.

Carmel testified that on one occasion during the period following May 17 he drove by the Elm Street warehouse and saw Morgan Dietz sitting on the loading dock doing nothing and other employees just standing around. On another occasion he observed employees standing around not working.

Carmel further testified that, when he discussed the matter of Myers' inspection of the Elm Street warehouse on May 17 later with Turner and Benowitz, they wanted immediately to discharge all the Elm Street employees (but not, apparently, O'Donnell, or at least he did not so testify). Carmel argued that they should not be so precipitous and should further investigate. And he asked to see a copy of the company rules (Carmel had been with the Respondent only a short time) but was advised that there were no written rules. He then undertook to "codify," as he put it, the basic "common sense" rules of the Company which included not drinking on "company premises without prior approval of a corporate officer," and not punching other employees' timecards. These rules were reduced to writing and posted on June 12.

On June 12 Carmel and Myers made another inspection trip to the Elm Street warehouse. Carmel testified, "We know that Morgan and Larry Cline generally went to a particular bar for lunch . . . ." Thus they parked so that they could see Dietz and Cline en route. At precisely 11:57, by their watches, Dietz and Cline walked by, at a point two or three blocks from the warehouse. Carmel and Myers then went to the warehouse and on reviewing the timecards of Dietz and Cline noted that they reflected a lunch punchout of 11:57. They checked their respective watches with the timeclock and found them to be identical. Thus Carmel concluded that somebody must have punched the timecards for Dietz and Cline.

On Friday, June 13, Carmel and Myers went again to the Elm Street warehouse, arriving at or about 11:45, at which time they observed a number of employees in the parking lot, including Mary Ann Slothour (who, unknown to them, Carmel testified, had been terminated by O'Donnell the day before). According to the testimony of both Carmel and Myers they went in and looked at the timecards noting that each had punched out at 11:58.[3]

Carmel and Myers gathered the timecards and returned to the Titus Street building where Carmel wrote a letter of termination for each of the employees. They were then called over from Elm Street, given their paychecks, and the termination letter which stated in relevant part:

> This is to advise you that the company has decided to close the Elm Avenue facility as a full-time warehouse. We have determined that we can operate more efficiently by using this warehouse as a satellite operation of our West Chestnut Street warehouse. Our analysis of the situation shows that the productivity at Elm Avenue has been far below that of West Chestnut Street. We feel that this is due to the poor productivity of the employees at Elm Avenue as well as numerous violations of company rules by our Elm Avenue employees. Spot checks made by company officials have shown employees not working, punchings [sic] others time cards, as well as consuming alcoholic beverages on company premises.
> The effective date of the closing is Friday, June 13, 1980 at the close of business. All hourly employees of the Elm Avenue warehouse will be permanently laid off from the company.

As will be detailed below, in May, June, and July O'Donnell had several conversations with the various Elm Street employees during which it is alleged that he interrogated them, threatened them and created the impression of surveillance of their union activity. The basic substance of these conversations testified to by the General Counsel's witnesses was denied by O'Donnell. In most part, I discredit O'Donnell and find generally that the conversations occurred substantially as testified to by the General Counsel's witnesses. First, I found generally their demeanor more positive than O'Donnell's. Further, the witnesses for the General Counsel were generally more candid in admitting matters adverse to their interests than O'Donnell. The events as testified to by the General Counsel's witnesses are consistent with the overall pattern of activity and facts about which there was no dispute.

Finally, O'Donnell's testimony on some material facts is inherently unreliable and was specifically contradicted by other witnesses for the Respondent. For instance, he denied any knowledge of any drinking at the warehouse, claiming he first learned of this when Benowitz called on his return from vacation. Long testified that after a couple days working with O'Donnell's crew she observed things that were "just unbelievable"—including drinking. Even Carmel testified that individuals on O'Donnell's crew "have a reputation of drinking."

B. Analysis and Concluding Findings

1. The 8(a)(1) activity engaged in by John O'Donnell

Although the testimony I credit shows that O'Donnell did ask employees during early May whether they had signed authorization cards, and such is clearly interrogation in violation of Section 8(a)(1), it also appears that this was of little concern to him then. In fact according to Slothour he said it did not matter to him whether they got a union in or not.

[3] Implicit in the testimony of Carmel and Myers is that somebody other than these employees punched out their timecards. However, also implicit in their testimony is that they immediately went from the parking lot, where they arrived at 11:45, to the timeclock. There is no explanation by them of why it took more than 13 minutes to do this. Nor did Carmel explain how it was that he did not learn of Slothour's layoff until later that day. She was one of the individuals he identified in the parking lot and thus he would have surely checked her timecard.

However, following O'Donnell's return from vacation in late May, and then following the representation case hearing on May 30, O'Donnell's statements to employees became more pointed.

Thus, on June 11 O'Donnell approached Slothour and stated that, "I was f— him up," and that Benowitz had called to say people would have to be laid off and the Company might shut down the Elm Street warehouse.

Morgan Dietz testified that in early May O'Donnell said to him, "I hear you are trying to get a union in?" Dietz said yes and O'Donnell asked him why. While Dietz did not put this very material statement in his investigatory affidavit, which seriously draws question to his credibility, it falls into the same category as the interrogation of others. And it is generally consistent with the overall pattern of action by O'Donnell. Thus, I conclude that it is more probable than not that the event occurred as testified to by Dietz.

Belinda Geiman testified that on at least three occasions, including June 12, O'Donnell told her that Slothour was "F— him up," was involved with the Union, and that he had laid her off for this reason.

And on July 5, Geiman saw O'Donnell at a local bar and asked him if they were laid off because of the Union. He said yes.

I found Geiman to be a believable witness. Her demeanor was positive and her answers, to sometimes difficult questions, were candid. Thus, I credit her testimony concerning what O'Donnell said about Slothour and the fact that employees were laid off because of their union activity. I discredit O'Donnell's general denials of these events.

Rodney Lau testified that O'Donnell was a "drinking buddy" of his, although he had not seen O'Donnell much lately. In early May O'Donnell asked Lau if he was involved in the Union. Lau said that he had signed an authorization card. This was overheard by Phyllis Shue (the wife of Lau), who testified that Lau said he did not want to talk about it. O'Donnell's statement was clearly interrogation and violative of Section 8(a)(1).

Shue further testified that, near the end of May, O'Donnell asked her if she was involved with the Union. She told him it was none of his business. He left, then returned stating he thought Slothour was behind it. And in early June O'Donnell told her and Geiman that Benowitz had called and said to get rid of a couple of people. He said he was going to get rid of Slothour because she was trying to get the "f— union in."

On July 6, Shue saw O'Donnell and asked if the employees were laid off because of the Union and he said they were. A similar conversation occurred between Shue and O'Donnell on July 15 where he, again in response to a question, said that they had been laid off because of the Union.

Based on the testimony I credit, I conclude that in May and early June the Respondent acting through its supervisor John O'Donnell did interrogate employees concerning their interest in and activity on behalf of the Union and threatened them with discharge, warehouse closure, and other reprisals.

In most cases O'Donnell prefaced his interrogation of employees by a comment such as "he heard the union was trying to get in" (Shue), or "I hear you are trying to get a union in" (Dietz). The General Counsel alleges that by such statements O'Donnell created the impression that he had engaged in surveillance of employees' union activity. I disagree. While O'Donnell surely interfered with employees' Section 7 rights, I do not believe that such prefatory statements would be construed by them as his having spied on their union activity.[4]

That O'Donnell happened to be in a bar on two occasions when employees were meeting with the union organizer is not alleged as surveillance or creating an impression of such. Nor do I think it was. From the record it appears that O'Donnell was a frequent visitor to bars in the Hanover area and such was known to employees. I cannot believe that their seeing him thus would lead them to suspect he was spying on their union activity.

2. The termination.

An employer may discharge an employee for any reason or no reason at all, unless motivated by the employee's union or other protected activity. Here, the General Counsel alleges, and has the burden of proving, that the Respondent terminated these employees because of their known union activity. However, where the General Counsel does establish prima facie that the terminations were the result of an unlawful motive, then the Respondent has the burden of coming forth with evidence to persuade that it acted lawfully. Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980); that is, the Respondent must prove that absent the union activity it would have acted as it did.

While an employer may discharge employees for no reason, experience suggests that this in fact is not done—that employers do not capriciously discharge employees or discharge them for irrational reasons. Thus, where the asserted reason for discharging an employee is found unreasonable, it not only can be rejected, but also in such a circumstance the trier of fact can infer that which the respondent seeks to hide—the existence of an unlawful motive. Shattuck Denn Mining Corporation (Iron King Branch) v. N.L.R.B., 362 F.2d 466 (9th Cir. 1966). Such, I conclude, is precisely the situation presented here.

All the Elm Street employees had signed authorization cards.[5] While employees at the other buildings were also involved in the union activity, those at Elm Street were the most active. Two of the three employee witnesses at the May 30 hearing were Mary Ann Slothour and Phyllis Shue. And, although O'Donnell claimed that he did not know of these employees' union activity, he did admit the two occasions he saw the employees at a local hotel.

Further, I credit the testimony of Slothour to the effect that O'Donnell asked her if she had signed a union card and she said she had; and the testimony of Geiman to the effect that O'Donnell told her to "keep her nose clean" and that Slothour had been "F— around with the union."

[4] Compare Nevada County Publishing Co., d/b/a "The Union", 251 NLRB 1030 (1980), where the interrogation occurred after each union meeting, the supervisor asking how the meeting had gone.

[5] For reasons unexplained on the record, neither Larry Cline nor Rodney Lau filed charges of unlawful discrimination nor were they included in the complaint.

Whether O'Donnell communicated his knowledge about his employees' union activity to higher management is not particularly material because higher management independently knew that some of the Elm Street employees, at least, were involved in the union activity as the result of their appearance at the May 30 hearing.

Finally, I credit the testimony of Shue that following the terminations, about July 6, at the Hamilton Hotel bar she asked O'Donnell if the Union had played a part in their terminations and he said it had. Geiman testified to a similar conversation. These factors alone establish prima facie that the terminations were motivated by the union activity of the employees.

Although the reasons asserted by the Respondent would generally be considered sufficient cause to terminate one or a group of employees, I conclude that, whatever these employees did, the Respondent seized upon their acts as a pretext to discharge a group of union sympathizers during an organizational campaign. The reasons advanced were a pretext and not the true motive.

The shift of supervisors between Elm Street and West Chestnut and the transfer of employees took place during the first of May. At the time, Slothour was off work with a hand injury. According to O'Donnell, not knowing whether she was going to return to work, inasmuch as she had not called, he decided to hire Geiman, who had asked him for a job on a couple of occasions when he saw her at a bar next door where he lives. Then a few days after the transfer, Slothour called asking for her job back. At this time O'Donnell contacted Myers and asked him to take her, but Myers refused, stating he did not have room on his crew. O'Donnell then put Slothour on. According to Carmel, O'Donnell did not have authorization from higher management to hire Geiman or Slothour.

O'Donnell testified that he laid off Slothour on June 12 because he had been contacted by Benowitz and told he had to lay off three employees. O'Donnell said he chose Slothour because she was the last employed, notwithstanding that she had been working before and was off only because of an injury. O'Donnell knew of Slothour's union activity, and that she had appeared on behalf of the Union at the representation hearing 2 weeks before. I believe that, when Benowitz contacted O'Donnell and advised him to lay off employees, O'Donnell took this command to discharge union activists and he complied by terminating Slothour. And this must have been known to higher management notwithstanding Carmel's denial.

The Respondent, however, changed strategy and determined to terminate the whole Elm Street crew. Thus, on June 12 Carmel wrote and had posted the company rules which in his letter of June 13 he stated the employees had violated.

Basically, the Respondent's argument is that because of the alleged violation of company rules—drinking beer, punching each others' timecards, and goofing off—it wanted to get rid of these particular employees. Since sales of athletic shoes are traditionally down in May and June, management determined the Elm Street warehouse could be closed as a full-time operation and be serviced on a part-time basis with West Chestnut Street employees. The Respondent does not contend that the reduced sales of athletic shoes caused the terminations. Rather, this provided the economic feasibility to get rid of employees who were breaching company rules and were unproductive.

The principal violation of company rules is the beer drinking while at work without authorization from management. That there was beer drinking is readily admitted by all the employees, though denied by O'Donnell. Drinking while at work is generally a serious matter; however, here such was clearly condoned, if not encouraged by supervision.

Myers testified that he and O'Donnell were switched because there had been drinking by the West Chestnut warehouse employees when under the supervision of O'Donnell. The fact that O'Donnell tolerated employees working for him to drink beer while on the job was known to management and particularly Benowitz who, rather than discharging O'Donnell or the employees in question, simply transferred O'Donnell. There is undenied testimony of an incident, known to Benowitz, when this basic crew, while working at West Ghestnut, took an evening break for drinking then returned to unload a truck, during which they continued to drink beer.

After the beer drinking was reported at the Elm Street facility shortly after O'Donnell and his crew arrived, all Benowitz did was to call O'Donnell and tell him that the drinking had better stop or else there would be discharges, including the supervisor. Higher management knew that beer drinking was condoned by O'Donnell, both at West Chestnut and Elm Street. Indeed, according to Carmel, the employees had a reputation for drinking. In such circumstances, it would be expected that management would at least talk to employees before discharging them for drinking on company premises. There is no evidence that anyone in supervision ever suggested to any of the Elm Street employees that they should not drink beer during the working day or on company premises. In these circumstances I discredit the Respondent's assertion that beer drinking was a significant matter.

Similar is the matter of punching timecards for others. While such is often a violation of company rules, such is fairly common in industry. Nevertheless, the Respondent could reasonably have a rule against one employee punching the timecard of another and could reasonably enforce such rule by discharge. However, here the Company had no rule prohibiting employees punching each others' timecards other than the "common sense" rule testified to by Carmel. Employees had not been advised that they should not do this or that to punch each others' timecards could result in discharge. Further, O'Donnell even, admits that on occasions he asked Dietz to punch the timecard of O'Donnell's daughter, who at the time was working at the Elm Street warehouse. And this was known to other Elm Street employees.

There is no showing by the Respondent that employees were not permitted to punch each others' timecards.

Thus, whatever conclusions Carmel may have drawn from his investigation, such is not a reasonable basis for discharging employees, particularly absent any discussion with them about the matter.

I conclude that, absent the union activity, the apparent timecard "violation" discovered in the way Carmel testified he did would not have caused management to discharge employees. At best he would have talked to O'Donnell and/or the employees.

The Respondent also contends that these employees spent a lot of time "goofing off" and "loafing." Such was admitted by them but they further stated that the reason was they had no work.

To this the Respondent apparently agrees. In fact, the Respondent went to some effort to demonstrate that May and June are traditionally slow months for the shipment of athletic shoes and that indeed work was substantially down in May and June 1980. Using April as a base of 100 percent, the volume of athletic shoes shipped out of the Elm Street warehouse in May was 47.1 percent and in June 49.9 percent. The volume did pick up subsequently.

In his notice of termination Carmel stated that low productivity was one of the factors involved in the layoff; however, he testified that what he had reference to was seeing the employees loafing. He did not testify to any other production factor nor did the Respondent bring forth any documentary evidence which would tend to establish that the Elm Street employees were not productive if in fact they had the work to do. On this record, if the employees sometimes were not working in May and June, a fact amply demonstrated, such was not their fault. This was a seasonal slowdown. In the normal course of events such might cause a layoff, though there had been none in the past. The lack of work, however, would not normally be imputed to employees with the conclusion that they were "goofing off."

I conclude that the reasons advanced by the Respondent were a pretext to disguise its true motive in discharging a group of union sympathizers during an organizational campaign. I conclude that the Respondent was in fact motivated by the union activity and that, by terminating these employees on June 12 and 13, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECTS OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The unfair labor practices found above, occurring in connection with the Employer's business, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

V. THE REMEDY

Having concluded that the Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative action including offering full and immediate reinstatement to Mary Ann Slothour, Belinda Geiman, Phyllis Shue, and Morgan Dietz to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment, and make them whole for any losses of wages and other benefits they may have suffered as the result of the discrimination against them, with interest in accordance with the formula set forth in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[6]

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, the entire record in this case, and pursuant to the provisions of Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[7]

The Respondent, Brooks Shoe Manufacturing Company, Inc., Hanover, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees because of their interest in or activity on behalf of United Food & Commercial Workers Union Local 1436, chartered by United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization.

(b) Threatening employees with discharge, plant closure, or otherwise, because of their interest in or activity on behalf of the Union.

(c) Interrogating employees concerning their interest in or activity on behalf of the Union.

(d) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.[8]

2. Take the following affirmative action:

(a) Offer full and immediate reinstatement to Mary Ann Slothour, Belinda Geiman, Phyllis Shue, and Morgan Dietz to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment and make them whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them in accordance with the formula set forth above.

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its Hanover, Pennsylvmnia, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being duly signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[6] See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[7] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[8] While there is no particular evidence of a proclivity on behalf of the Respondent to engage in unfair labor practices, the discharge of an entire crew of employees is, I think, sufficiently egregious in the circumstances here to justify a broad remedial order. See Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

[9] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 4, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On June 15, 1981, Administrative Law Judge George F. McInerny issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.[3]

Amended Conclusions of Law

Substitute the following for the Administrative Law Judge's Conclusion of Law 5:

"5. By discharging and refusing to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act."

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Isla Verde Hotel Corporation d/b/a Hotel Holiday Inn de Isla Verde, Carolina, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(g):

"(g) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a):

"(a) Upon request, bargain with Asociacion de Empleados del Casino del Holiday Inn de Isla Verde as the representative of employees in the following unit admitted to be appropriate:

> All croupier employees of Respondent employed at its hotel, exclusive of all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions,

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

Members Fanning and Jenkins agree with the Administrative Law Judge's finding that the strike which occurred herein was in response to serious and aggravated unfair labor practices, but, for the reasons separately stated by them in The Dow Chemical Company, 244 NLRB 1060, 1061, fn. 8 (1979), they would find the strike to be protected activity regardless of the seriousness of Respondent's unlawful conduct.

We find it unnecessary to adopt the Administrative Law Judge's speculation that Respondent regarded Felix Ramos as more competent and versatile than other employees.

We note that, contrary to the Administrative Law Judge's statement that the record does not indicate that the union officers told Assistant Manager Jose Alvarez what they were planning to do, Alvarez testified they had told him their plans in the event they did not receive the bonus that night. We also note that the Administrative Law Judge inadvertently stated that Ruben Ramos testified he had seen Rafael Castillo on the night of September 12, 1980, talking with David Maza, when Ruben Ramos actually testified that Hector Rivera told him he (Rivera) had seen Castillo talking with Maza. These errors, to which Respondent excepted and which we correct accordingly, do not affect the Administrative Law Judge's conclusions or our adoption thereof.

[2] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt pro forma the Administrative Law Judge's dismissal of the allegation that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by offering a striking employee benefits if he returned to work. We also note that no exceptions have been filed regarding the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that a no-strike clause may be implied from the parties' collective-bargaining agreement.

[3] We believe that a broad remedial order is warranted in this case, under the standard of Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), inasmuch as Respondent has engaged in numerous serious violations of Sec. 8(a)(1), (3), (4), and (5) of the Act and has thereby demonstrated a general disregard for employees' fundamental statutory rights. Accordingly, we shall modify the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order by inserting the broad "in any other manner" cease-and-desist language. We shall also correct a typographical error in the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order, par. 2(a) of which inadvertently refers to "officer clerical employees" rather than "office clerical employees."

We shall conform the Administrative Law Judge's Conclusion of Law 5 with his findings by inserting "discharging and" between "By" and "refusing."

We note that the Administrative Law Judge inadvertently omitted pars. 1(e) and 2(a) of his recommended Order from his notice. We shall modify the notice to conform with the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order, as modified herein.

In agreeing with the Administrative Law Judge's make-whole remedy with respect to the discharged unfair labor practice strikers, we note that the remedy shall be computed according to the principles enunciated in Abilities and Goodwill, Inc., 241 NLRB 27 (1979).

Member Jenkins notes that he would award interest on any backpay due based on the formula set forth in his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

259 NLRB No. 73

the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally discontinue our Christmas bonus and WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain about that bonus.

WE WILL NOT threaten or discharge unfair labor practice strikers who are on strike because of our unfair labor practices.

WE WILL NOT deny unpaid leave, issue written reprimands to, change shifts or days off, or deny the right to swap shifts of our employees because they engaged in union or protected activities, or filed charges or gave testimony under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT discharge or refuse to reinstate our employees or revoke condonations of their acts because they engaged in union or concerted activities, or filed charges or gave testimony under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT require our employees to sign waivers of statutory rights in order to obtain reinstatement.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, coerce, or restrain our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL offer to Jose Crespo, Humberto Sanchez, Arnaldo Delgado, Geraldo Rodriguez, and Felix Ramos immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges and WE WILL make them, together with all employees who engaged in a strike on and after December 20, 1979, caused by our unfair labor practices, whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of our unlawful discrimination, plus interest.

WE WILL remove from the files of Felix Ramos all records of disciplinary actions taken on January 26, July 2, and September 12 and 15, 1980.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain with the Asociacion de Empleados del Casino del Holiday Inn de Isla Verde as the representative of employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All croupier employees employed at our hotel, exclusive of all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

ISLA VERDE HOTEL CORPORATION
D/B/A HOTEL HOLIDAY INN DE ISLA

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GEORGE F. MCINERNY, Administrative Law Judge: This matter began with the filing of a charge in Case 24–CA–4269 on January 28, 1980, by Asociacion de Empleados del Casino del Holiday Inn de Isla Verde, herein referred to as the Union or the Charging Party.[1] The charge alleged that Isla Verde Hotel Corporation, d/b/a Hotel Holiday Inn de Isla Verde,[2] herein referred to as Respondent,[3] the hotel, or the casino, had refused to pay a Christmas bonus, had refused to bargain with the Union, and had discharged 16 employees, all alleged to be unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. §151 et seq., herein referred to as the Act. The charge was amended on February 1, 1980, and on March 20, 1980, the Regional Director for Region 24 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint alleging violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. Respondent duly filed an answer, denying the commission of any unfair labor practices.

Pursuant to notice accompanying the complaint, the matter came on to hearing before me in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, on June 16, 1980. The hearing continued on June 17, 18, and 19, at which time counsel for Respondent, Ramos-Acosta, became ill, and, by agreement of all parties, the matter was continued to August 4, 1980. The hearing proceeded on August 5, 6, and concluded on August 7, 1980, again in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico.

Thereafter, on September 2, 1980, I received notice from the official reporter in this matter that certain tapes containing a portion of the testimony received at this hearing on August 4 had been stolen from the reporter and had not been recovered.

Before any action could be taken on this development, on September 2, the Union filed an additional charge in Case 24–CA–4381 against Respondent alleging further violations of the Act, some of which allegedly arose as a result of the appearance of a witness at this hearing. The charge in Case 24–CA–4381 was amended on September 16, 1980, and, on October 6, the said Regional Director issued a complaint in Case 24-CA-4381, alleging that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act. Respondent filed an answer to this complaint again denying the commission of any unfair labor practices.

[1] The Charging Party herein was represented by Attorneys Leonardo Llequis and Jorge Farinacci. Attorney Farinacci appeared as counsel for the Charging Party on November 12, 1980. However, Attorney Llequis originally appeared as counsel for the Charging Party and there is no record of his withdrawal as counsel.

[2] The name of the Employer was changed at the hearing. This is the correct name.

[3] Respondent herein was represented by Attorneys Francisco J. Ramos-Acosta and Rafael Buscaglia. Attorney Buscaglia appeared only as the signatory to the post-hearing brief filed on behalf of Respondent and as signatory on behalf of Respondent to a post-hearing motion. Attorney Ramos-Acosta originally appeared as counsel for Respondent and there is no withdrawal of his appearance in the record.

On October 14, 1980, counsel for the General Counsel in Case 24-CA-4269 filed a motion with me to reopen the record in Case 24-CA-4269 to reconstruct the missing testimony, and to consolidate that case with Case 24-CA-4381. This was agreed to by counsel for Respondent, and on October 20, 1980, I ordered that the record in Case 24-CA-4269 be reopened to receive the testimony which was lost, that Case 24-CA-4269 be consolidated with Case 24-CA-4381, and that the consolidated cases be heard beginning on November 10, 1980. The hearing proceeded in Hato Rey and Isla Verde, Puerto Rico, on November 10, 11, and 12, 1980.

Throughout this extended hearing, all parties had the opportunity to present testimony and documentary evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally. Following the close of the hearing, briefs were filed by the General Counsel and Respondent. These have been carefully considered.[4]

Based upon the entire record in this case, including my observation of the witnesses, and their demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Isla Verde Hotel Corporation is a corporation organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. At all times it has done business as Hotel Holiday Inn de Isla Verde, and maintains its principal office and place of business in the city of Carolina, Puerto Rico, where it is engaged in the operation of a hotel and gambling casino. During the year prior to the issuance of the complaints herein, which period is representative of its annual operations, Respondent derived gross revenues of over $500,000. In that same period Respondent purchased and caused to be transported and delivered to its Carolina, Puerto Rico, location foodstuffs, beverages, and other goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. The complaints allege, the answers admit, and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaints allege, the answers admit, and I find that Asociacion de Empleados del Casino del Holiday Inn de Isla Verde is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background to the Strike

This case concerns only the relationships between Respondent and those persons employed as croupiers in the casino operated as a part of the Holiday Inn at Isla Verde. There is no dispute that the appropriate bargaining unit is, as described in the complaints herein: All croupier employees of Respondent, employed at its hotel, exclusive of all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act. Croupiers are the employees who actually run the three games offered by the casino: dice, roulette, and blackjack. The casino itself is modest in size compared to those in Atlantic City or Las Vegas, containing 3 roulette tables, 2 dice tables, 10 blackjack tables, and an unspecified number of slot machines.

Croupiers must, of course, be able to handle at least one of these games, and the more skilled and experienced can run two, or all three games. While the exact ratio of supervisors to rank-and-file employees is not defined in the record, it is evident that the ratio is very high, at slow times as high as one supervisor for each croupier. In addition to supervision by Respondent, the games are also closely watched by the Government of Puerto Rico. At all times there is at least one inspector from the Commonwealth Department of Tourism present in the casino.

Early in 1977 the croupiers organized themselves into an association, which is the Union in this case. Respondent voluntarily recognized the Union as the representative of the croupiers and the parties negotiated a collective-bargaining agreement.

This agreement between Respondent and the Union was executed originally on May 14, 1977, then supplemented by agreements dated November 8, 1978, and March 10, 1979. The documents appear unsophisticated, but upon analysis it is clear that the substantive content covers the basic areas of wages, hours of work, and other conditions of employment.[5] There is a grievance procedure culminating in final and binding arbitration, conditioned, however, on the agreement of both parties to the arbitration portion of the procedure. The contract lacks a no-strike clause, although in general terms the Union agreed to be bound by all management rules, and employees were bound by the terms of the November 8, 1978, and the March 10, 1979, supplements "not, under any circumstances, abandon the table" and "not abandon work or the table of his own volition, without having been relieved or without being authorized by an official." (November 8, 1978 supplement, rules 9 and 16.) Respondent under the March 10, 1979, supplement was empowered to suspend or discharge any employee for "Abandonment, without just cause, of the table where work is being performed or without prior permission from the immediate superintendent"[6] or for "refusal to work at the assigned table or work shift." (March 10, 1979, supplement, rules 2(G) and (I).)

[4] On December 22, 1980, all parties filed a motion to include in the record a stipulation of fact entered into on August 4, 1980. The motion is allowed.

[5] There was some question about parts of the agreement setting out a seniority list, and dealing with internal union matters, but even those parts were accepted by management. It was apparent that the parties considered that this group of documents was the collective-bargaining agreement between them, and I so find.

[6] Identified in this supplement as Luis Santiago Frilla.

In the November 1978 supplement, the parties agreed that "starting in April 1979 a work schedule with off duty rotating days every three months will be prepared." The purpose of this was an attempt to assure that weekend time off for employees in the casino's 7-day operation would be equally shared, by rotating days off every 3 months. This sounds like a relatively simple procedure, but in practice it did not work out that way. One of the union officers during this period, Jose Crespo Nieves,[7] testified that the Union tried on three separate occasions during 1979, in April, August, and November, to work out schedules to implement this provision, but all three proposed schedules were unacceptable to the casino management.

After the second attempt to work out a mutually acceptable schedule the Union filed a request with the Commonwealth Department of Labor for the appointment of an arbitrator to enforce the contractual requirement for rotating days.[8]

Sometime in November, the testimony is not clear when, Crespo, who was then the president of the Union, together with Arnaldo Delgado Rodriguez, the general shop steward, met with the casino manager, Bienvenido Tosado Feliciano, to discuss proposed schedules worked out by the Union. According to Crespo, the only witness who testified about this meeting, Tosado rejected the schedule, became excited, and said he would not accept the schedule even if it were ordered by a court or the department of labor. At another point Crespo quoted Tosado as saying that he was not going to make the days rotational and that he was not going to do anything which was not for the benefit of the casino.

On December 4 Crespo, as president of the Union, filed a charge against Respondent with the Puerto Rico Labor Relations Board alleging a violation of the collective-bargaining agreement since April because of the Employer's failure to implement the rotating days schedule.

During December, the Union and management had other discussions over concerns of the employees with regard to uniforms,[9] the annual Christmas party, and a Christmas bonus.[10] With respect to the last issue, the evidence shows that there is a law in the Commonwealth which requires the payment of a Christmas bonus to employees of employers who have enjoyed a profitable year. There is some evidence that Respondent did not make a profit in 1979, but that is really not at issue here. Bonuses were paid to employees in 1977 and 1978. The discussions on these issues were apparently productive and in a letter dated December 6 management announced that uniforms would be supplied, a Christmas party would be held, and steps were being taken to pay a Christmas bonus to all those entitled to receive a bonus.

Respondent did proceed with plans to pay the Christmas bonus. Tosado testified that it was his intention to pay the bonus at the Christmas party which was held at another hotel on December 18. However, Tosado was informed by the hotel's general manager, David Maza San Miguel, that there was no money available on that date. Tosado informed several employees at the Christmas party that the bonus would be paid on December 20 or 21.[11] Other evidence shows that management intended to give the bonus at 8:30 p.m., the time when the shifts changed in the casino, on December 21. Carlos J. Luna, the hotel's personnel director, testified that Maza wanted to meet with the employees concurrently with the giving of the bonus to explain to them the hotel's economic problems.[12]

However, on December 20, Respondent received notice from the Commonwealth Labor Relations Board of the charge which had been filed on December 4.

This was the state of things on the afternoon of December 20.

B. The Strike

Luna came into the casino between 1:30 and 2 p.m. on December 20 and spoke to Miguel Barbosa Figueroa, the Union's steward on the day shift. Luna and Barbosa gave sharply different versions of this conversation. According to Barbosa, Luna had with him a copy of the charge from the Commonwealth Labor Relations Board. He showed Barbosa the document and asked if it had been filed by the Union. Barbosa replied that it had, and that the Union was going to take it "all the way." Luna then said that Maza was angry and that he was not going to give the employees the Christmas bonus.

Luna agreed with Barbosa on the time and place of the conversation, but testified that he had two documents with him, the charge and the request for arbitration, referred to above, which had been filed on November 9 with another agency of the Commonwealth. Luna said that he told Barbosa the bonus would be distributed on the next night at the shift change. Luna then said he showed Barbosa the two cases, the arbitration request and the charge, and asked whether Barbosa knew of this duplication. Barbosa replied that he would speak to the Union's directors about the matters.

In view of what happened immediately after this conversation Luna's version of the event is totally improbable and unbelievable. Barbosa's version is wholly in accord with his subsequent actions. Further, based on my observation of his demeanor, I found Barbosa to be a completely credible witness. Luna, here and in his testimony on other aspects of these consolidated cases, appeared to me to be guarded and less than candid. Thus I credit Barbosa's version of this conversation.

[7] Following the local custom I shall give the full name of each witness, if the full name is given, and when it first appears. Afterwards I shall refer to the witnesses by their patronyms.

[8] This was not filed until November 9, just before the third attempt to work out a schedule. The matter did proceed to arbitration but since I did not consider the arbitrator's decision material to the issues here I rejected the decision when offered as an exhibit.

[9] Croupiers were required to wear evening clothes while on duty.

[10] The bonus would have amounted to about $200 for a person who had worked for the whole year, and proportionally less for those who had worked less than a full year.

[11] I found Tosado to be a credible witness. He was no longer employed by the casino when he testified, and he had severed his other business relations with Maza.

[12] I had some problems with Luna's credibility, as noted infra, but I do not find this recital of Respondent's intentions to be inconsistent with other facts in the record.

As soon as Luna left the casino Barbosa called Delgado, the general shop steward and a night-shift employee, at his home.[13] Delgado in his turn, contacted Crespo and Union Vice President Humberto Sanchez. These three drove immediately from their homes to the casino. On arriving there, they asked Assistant Manager Jose Alvarez if Barbosa could be relieved from duty to consult on the matter. Alvarez agreed and the four union officials went to the hotel's main office in order to talk to Maza. On hearing of their request, Maza came to the door of his office and told them he had no time to talk to them, and that they should talk to the casino manager. They returned to the casino and again spoke to Alvarez, since the manager, Tosado, was not there. Alvarez tried to contact Tosado but could not, then told the employees to wait for Tosado to come in.

Around 2:30 or 3 p.m. Delgado testified that he, Crespo, and Sanchez had a conversation in the parking lot of the hotel.[14] They decided that, if management did not give the bonus and refused to speak about it, they could stage a "hands down" stoppage.[15]

Crespo, Sanchez, and Delgado then waited for Tosado at the casino until about 6 o'clock, then went home to eat and change their clothes before reporting back to work at 8:30. There is no indication in the record that the union officers told Alvarez what they were planning to do, but Delgado did admit that they told other employees, and it is clear from Alvarez' own testimony that he was aware that strike action was a real possibility. In fact Alvarez located Tosado some time before 8 o'clock and told him of the situation. Tosado told Alvarez to hold the day-shift supervisors beyond the end of their shift in order to cover the gambling tables in case of an emergency.

Tosado finally arrived at the casino about 10 that night. He spoke to Alvarez and Santiago, the assistant manager in general charge of personnel matters. According to Tosado he learned from Alvarez and Santiago that the situation was unchanged.

At that point Tosado left the casino and went to see Maza. Tosado and Maza discussed the fact that the bonus had been promised, and also their impression that if they gave the bonus that night, under pressure, they would be establishing an undesirable precedent. They agreed that in those circumstances they would no longer have control of the casino. Thus Tosado and Maza decided that they would not give the bonus that night, but if the employees did not strike they would give the bonus the next day.

With this decided, Tosado returned to the casino around 10:30 p.m. and told Santiago to inform the Union that they were not going to give the bonus that night.[16] Tosado did tell Santiago that, if the employees did not strike, they would receive the bonus on the next day. However, he instructed him not to tell this to the employees.

Santiago then called Sanchez and Crespo into the casino office and informed them that there was no Christmas bonus and that Tosado had nothing to discuss with them.

At this point Sanchez and Crespo left the office and proceeded into the casino. On the way Sanchez encountered Tosado and asked whether he was going to pay the bonus or not. Tosado replied that he was not, emphasizing the point with an all-purpose, apparently untranslatable, Spanish epithet. Sanchez and Crespo then proceeded from table to table in the casino, instructing the employees that the "casino is stopped," but not to abandon the tables.[17] The union leaders were, obviously, trying to implement a sit-down strike in the casino. These aims were thwarted by management, as Tosado gave orders that supervisors move in on the tables, relieve the employees, and order them to leave the casino. This order to leave was also conveyed to employees who were off duty in the croupiers' restroom.[18] There were no problems and no incidents. The croupiers all left the casino and went outside the hotel, where they established a picket line. Although Respondent maintained in later communications to the strikers, and in its answer to the complaint in Case 24–CA–4269, that the employees had abandoned the tables, leaving chips and money unguarded, there is no evidence in this record that any employee left his table unguarded, or that anyone left his table except by the order of a supervisor. Rafael Rossi Soto, a witness for Respondent, testified that Sanchez had told him to leave the casino. Then he asked Tosado what he should do.[19] Tosado replied that he should do what the shop steward had instructed, that he alone could do nothing. It would, indeed, be inconsistent with the Union's plan to stage a sit-down strike to abandon the tables, and any departures by employees from their tables was the result of management's prompt response to the work stoppage. Thus I cannot find that any employee willfully abandoned his table, and, further, I find that the attempt to stage a sit-down strike, whatever the intention of the

[13] I have relied on the undenied and mutually corroborative testimony of Delgado, Sanchez, and Crespo for my findings on the events of the afternoon and early evening of December 20.

[14] It is not clear whether this was before or after they met with Alvarez.

[15] At the hearing the translation was, as stated, "hands down." However, Delgado's affidavit, in evidence, translates the words paro de brazos caidos as a "sit-down strike." The latter translation of these words is corroborated by Simon and Schuster's International Dictionary, English/Spanish, Spanish/English, Simon and Schuster, New York, 1973, and Appleton's New Cuyas, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972. Accordingly I find that the agreement was to hold a sit-down strike at the casino, to force management to grant the bonus.

[16] Tosado explained that he used Santiago as an intermediary because the latter was named in the contract as the management representative responsible for dealing with the Union.

[17] The only dissent to this evidence was the testimony of Rafael Rossi Soto, who could have been mistaken about what Sanchez said to him. Carlos Emmanueli, a government inspector on duty that night, testified that there were not many people in the casino that night, even though it was at the beginning of the tourist season. Emmanueli stated that there were three out of nine blackjack tables open, one out of three roulette tables, and one out of two dice tables.

[18] The evidence shows that the croupiers work, roughly, a schedule of one hour at the tables and one-half hour off. Thus approximately one third of the employees on a given shift would be off duty at all times during their shift. There are some variations to this which are not material here.

[19] Rossi was a new employee who had not yet joined the Union and felt no loyalty toward it.

Union, was forestalled, and that such a strike did not, in fact, occur.[20]

In subjecting these facts to analysis, it is first necessary to determine whether the employees who went out on strike on the night of December 20 were engaged in protected concerted activity or whether their action was unprotected, subjecting them to disciplinary action by Respondent.

Initially there is no question that the discussions about the rotating days off constituted protected activity in pursuance of the employees' concerted aims as expressed in the November 1978 amendments to the collective-bargaining agreement. There is no indication in the record that, at least up to November 1979, the failure to reach agreement on this matter was due to any factor other than the difficulty of implementing the mechanics of the schedule. That this difficulty produced feelings of frustration in the Union is evident from the request for arbitration filed on November 9 by the then president, Ruben Ramos Perez. These frustrations may also have led to the resignation of Ramos in November and his replacement by Crespo.

Such a change in leadership, particularly if the change is impelled or motivated by dissatisfaction with the policies of the prior officers and impatience with the results achieved by those officers, is almost inevitably accompanied by a higher lever of militancy and a more aggressive approach to the problems at hand. Thus in late November Crespo testified about expressions of anger and impatience by Tosado in the course of their discussions on uniforms, the Christmas party, and the Christmas bonus, as well as further discussions on the rotating days off issue.[21] In this last situation Crespo fared no better than his predecessor, Ramos, in reaching a solution. Crespo then tried a new tactic in filing a charge with the Puerto Rico Labor Relations Board on December 4.[22] While the substance of this charge may have overlapped, or even duplicated the matter included in the November arbitration request, there can be no question that this was also protected concerted activity.

There is no direct evidence in the record on when the Respondent was notified of the charge. There is no indication on the charge itself, nor on the interview notice from the Puerto Rico Labor Relations Board, that copies of those documents were sent to the Employer. It is logical to assume, and I find, that notice was given to Respondent, and from the testimony of Luna I infer and find that whatever form that notice took was received by Respondent on December 20.

I have already found that Respondent's reaction to this charge, as dictated by Maza and relayed by Luna to Barbosa, was to unilaterally determine that the Christmas bonus would not be paid. I find that this action constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

The next event in the chain was the meeting in the parking lot between Crespo, Delgado, and Sanchez where it was decided that the Union would strike if the bonus were not paid that night, and if management refused to discuss the matter of the bonus. The substance of this decision, at least that part dealing with the possibility of a strike, was conveyed to Alvarez, who in turn alerted Tosado.

The evidence shows that Respondent was aware of the nature of the problem, the seriousness of the situation, and the potential disruption of the business of the casino at the beginning of the tourist season. The record is nearly barren of evidence tending to show any actions by Respondent's agents in the period from mid-afternoon until 10 o'clock that night, or Respondent's motivations in that time period. It is not unusual for the casino manager to arrive at the casino as late as 10 p.m. The casino operates from 1 p.m. to 4 a.m. Later testimony from one of Tosado's successors would indicate that the manager is present off and on during the early hours of operation, but he apparently arrives late and remains until closing time. Thus I can raise no inference from the fact that Alvarez could not reach Tosado until 7 or 8 p.m., and that the latter did not actually arrive at the casino until after 10.

It may well be that Respondent had no clear or definite plan of action during this period. There is no explanation of Tosado's whereabouts or activity. There is no evidence that anyone had talked to Luna, whose announcement to Barbosa early in the afternoon had precipitated the whole thing. Luna testified that he was in his office until 5 p.m. when he left for the day. I did not find Luna to be a credible witness but he was the personnel manager for the hotel, and there is no indication that Alvarez, Tosado, or anyone else contacted him either before or after he left work for the day.

By 10 p.m., then, the stage was set for a confrontation between the Union and Respondent. At that time Tosado came into the casino, verified the status of the situation by conferring with Alvarez and Santiago, and left to consult with Maza. Tosado and Maza were apparently under the impression that the Union would strike if the bonus were not given that night. Accordingly they decided to test the Union by precipitating the threatened confrontation. They determined that they would not pay over the bonus that night, but, if the strike did not occur, they would pay it the next day.[23]

Tosado then determined that he would notify the Union of the first part of this decision, that the bonus would not be paid, but not the fact that it would be paid on the next day if there were no strike. In this decision I find that Tosado not only intended to test the Union's will and strength, but also, by determining not to discuss the matter with the Union's representatives in the terms decided on by Maza and himself, flung down a gauntlet to the Union, and dared them to test their resolve against his.

[20] Accordingly, cases such as Fansteel Metallurgical Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 306 U.S. 240 (1939), cited by Respondent in its brief, are inapplicable to this case.

[21] Crespo's testimony on this is so sketchy and conclusionary that I cannot make a finding that Tosado showed animus or hostility toward the Union or its officers. His comments could reflect only the normal give and take of labor relations generally.

[22] There is testimony that under Puerto Rican law violations of the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement are violations of that law.

[23] There is no explanation of why Maza would have instructed Luna to tell the Union that the bonus would not be paid at all because of the filing of the charge with the Puerto Rico Labor Relations Board, then changed his mind and agreed with Tosado that the bonus would be paid on December 21 if there were no strike. Maza did not testify, and did not deny that he gave the orders or made the statements attributed to him by others.

As a final indication of Tosado's provocative and contemptuous attitude toward the Union and its officials, I note that even after the message that there would be no bonus was delivered by Santiago, Sanchez tried once more to ask Tosado about the bonus, only to be peremptorily and crudely rebuffed.

In these circumstances, I find that Tosado's actions constitute not only refusal to bargain over Respondent's unilateral refusal to pay the bonus, but also total willful rejection of the collective-bargaining process. I find his refusal to bargain to be a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

As has been noted, the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union does not contain a no-strike clause. It does contain an arbitration provision which is operative on the agreement of both parties to submit an issue to arbitration. The evidence in this case shows two instances where the parties have proceeded to arbitration, and no instance where the Union has requested, and Respondent has refused, to arbitrate. Accordingly the arbitration clause in the contract may be taken to be the quid pro quo for an agreement by the Union not to strike.[24] A no-strike clause may also be inferred from the agreements by individuals not to abandon their work or work stations contained in the contract. There is no question in my mind that a refusal to give the bonus in this case would have been an arbitrable matter.[25] Arbitration of a dispute over the bonus would have accorded with Federal policy as enunciated by Congress[26] and affirmed by the courts[27] favoring arbitration of labor disputes. These authorities and this policy would tend to the conclusion that a strike occurring in these circumstances, while in protest against unfair labor practices, would not constitute protected activity by the employees where the grievance and arbitration route could have been followed.

This, however, presents a different picture than that considered by the Board in accordance with the principles outlined above, The Dow Chemical Company, 212 NLRB 333 (1974), cited by Respondent in its brief. Here the unilateral change imposed by Respondent was effectuated in retaliation for the employees' exercise of their right to file a charge with the Puerto Rico Labor Relations Board.[28] In addition, the decision in Dow Chemical shows that there was considerable discussion between the union there and the employer between the announcement by the employer of the unilateral change in hours and the implementation of that change. Here Respondent through the casino manager, Tosado, absolutely refused to discuss the matter with the Union, in violation of the grievance procedures of the contract,[29] and the national labor policy.[30]

It is my view that the strike which occurred in Respondent's casino was in response to unfair labor practices so serious as to be "destructive of the foundation on which collective bargaining must rest."[31] Respondent's announcement that the bonus would not be granted because the Union had filed a charge can only have demonstrated to employees the futility of their exercise of legal rights under the law of the Commonwealth, and the absolute refusal of Tosado to discuss the matter, as he was required under the contract, vouchsafed to the employees the attitude of Respondent toward the contract and its obligations thereunder. Respondent is ill cast, now, in the role of the champion of those very contractual principles it so cavalierly disregarded on the night of December 20, 1979.[32]

Accordingly, I find that the strike which occurred on December 20 was in protest against serious and aggravated unfair labor practices by Respondent. Indeed, in my view nothing shatters the foundation on which collective bargaining is based so thoroughly and completely as an utter refusal to engage in collective bargaining. I find that the strike was protected and that the actions of the employees in striking were protected concerted activity.

C. The Effects of the Strike

As noted previously, on leaving the casino the striking employees established a picket line in front of the hotel. On the next day, December 21, the day-shift employees joined the strike beginning at 1 p.m.

Also on December 21 the casino management composed two form letters. The first was directed, individually, to the employees who had walked out on the previous evening and stated that the addressee had "abandoned" his work leaving large amounts of valuables on the gambling table. As a result each of these employees was discharged. The second letter went, again individually, to the day-shift employees who had joined the strike on December 21. The addressees were "required to immediately report" to their regular work schedule. Failure to report would allow management to "take all those measures that are deemed appropriate."

The strike continued, and on December 26 management directed another form letter to the day-shift employees informing them that they had not reported to work as directed on December 21 and had offered no excuse or justification for such failure to report. The employees were directed to report to work at 12:30 p.m. on December 28 on penalty of suspension, since such failure to report would, in management's view, constitute abandonment of their employment.

With one exception, none of the employees returned to work until the Union abandoned the strike on January 5. This employee, Rafael Rossi, stated that he called Tosado on December 22. Tosado arranged to have Rossi picked up and driven in to the hotel. Rossi lived in the hotel with free room and board, and continued to work there while the strike lasted. He testified that Tosado promised to raise his salary after the strike was over, but this happened after he had returned to work and cannot be considered an inducement to return.[33]

There was another meeting at the casino on December 22 attended by Tosado, Santiago, Alvarez, and Felix Ramos Hernandez, an employee who worked on the day shift and also served as alternate shop steward for the Union. Ramos testified that Santiago called him on December 22, asked him to come back to work, and began to talk about reinstating some employees. Ramos would not talk about these matters, but agreed to come to the casino. The meeting among Ramos, Tosado, Alvarez, and Santiago took place at 10:30 p.m. According to Ramos, Tosado told him that if he came back to work he would have profit sharing and hotel protection while working. If Ramos came back he could stay in the hotel and everything would be all right. Ramos replied that it would be "immoral" to do that and, apparently, the meeting ended.

There was no further testimony or evidence on this meeting. Neither Tosado nor Alvarez was asked about it, and Santiago did not testify. The General Counsel amended the complaint at the opening of the hearing, alleging, among other things, that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by offering "a profit sharing plan and other benefits and improvement in . . . working conditions and terms of employment." It seems to me that Ramos' description of the meeting of December 22 falls short of proving the violation alleged. Even if I were to credit Ramos in this instance, and I do have some questions about his credibility, as will be discussed later, I do not believe that such a vague and general statement about profit sharing can furnish me with a basis for a finding that Respondent violated the Act in this regard.

The letters of December 21 to the night-shift employees, and December 26 to the day shift are another matter. Since I have found that the strike was in protest against substantial unfair labor practices by Respondent, and that the strike was protected concerted activity, the conduct of Respondent in discharging the night-shift employees as of December 21 and the day-shift employees as of December 26 constituted further violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.[34]

Additional post-strike developments show that after the strike was called off on January 5 there were negotiations between the Union and management leading to the return of the day-shift employees to work in mid-January.[35] Further negotiations resulted in the return of the night-shift employees except for Crespo, Sanchez, and Delgado.

As a condition of their return, however, the night-shift employees, according to the credible testimony of Julio Bonet Harris, were required to sign a letter accepting the hotel's offer to return, and also containing a "voluntary" waiver of "any claim that . . . [the Union] . . . or any other person may be making on my behalf, both with the Agencies of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico as well as the Federal Government." Bonet's testimony is corroborated by a letter identical to his letter to management executed by Edwin Feliciano Lopez.[36] Accordingly I find that Respondent required that employees waive their rights before this Agency, the National Labor Relations Board, as well as agencies of the Commonwealth, as a condition to their return to work. I find this to be a further violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

D. Incidents Involving Felix Ramos

1. The January 26, 1980, incident

Up to now this Decision has been concerned with the incidents leading up to the strike, the strike itself, and its aftermath. Henceforth I shall be concerned with a series of incidents concerning a single individual, Felix Ramos. The first of these incidents occurred on January 26, 1980, and was included in the original complaint in Case 24-CA-4269. The others took place in June, July, and September 1980 and constitute the substantive allegations in Case 24-CA-4381.

In his extensive testimony, given in this proceeding, Ramos revealed himself to be a person of intelligence and personal charm. He must also possess a high degree of competence as a croupier, as will be seen by the fact that Maza granted him a unique and special schedule, premium days off, and an unpaid leave of absence. Ramos did, however, have a tendency to tone down and to minimize the vehemence of his words and actions in his two serious confrontations with management. Thus Ramos' testimony while generally credible, will be evaluated against the testimony of others where conflicts exist, in the light of these observations.

Ramos first appeared in this case when he was called by Santiago on December 22 and later that night went to the casino to talk with Santiago and Tosado.[37] There is no evidence in the record concerning whether Ramos participated in the negotiations leading up to the return to work of the day shift, but he was appointed as alternative union steward by Crespo after the strike ended on [33] There is no allegation in the complaint concerning this incident and, in any event, it was not fully developed or litigated. Therefore I make no finding whether it constitutes a violation of law.

[34] See, e.g., Pacemaker Yacht Co., a Division of Mission Marine, Inc., 253 NLRB 828 (1980).

[35] With the exception of Geraldo Rodriguez Rivera, who was held responsible by management, together with Crespo, Sanchez, and Delgado, of having instigated the strike. These four were never offered reinstatement.

[36] See G. C. Exhs. 11A and 17A. Lopez, however, testified that his "fellow employees" told him that this type of letter would allow him to return to work. This does not explain the fact that the letters are identical and leads to my conclusion that in fact management prescribed the form the letters were to take.

[37] This would indicate not only that Ramos was a valued employee, but that he was considered by management as influential with his fellow employees.

January 6, and he did return to work with the day shift about that time.

On January 26, at 3 or 3:30 in the afternoon, Ramos noticed that a supervisor was working at one of the roulette tables.[38] Ramos was not on duty at the time but pursuant to his perception of his obligation as alternate steward he approached the assistant manager of the casino, Pedro Padin, and asked if he could talk to him about a problem at the roulette table. Padin replied that he had no time to talk to Ramos, adding that he had to wait for additional management personnel to arrive before he would have time to speak to Ramos. The latter persisted, saying that the problem existed then, and not later in the evening. Padin then ordered Ramos to go to the croupiers' restroom.[39] Ramos obeyed the order and went to the restroom[40] where he discussed the matter with Alberto Guzman Rivera, the treasurer of the Union. Guzman advised Ramos to speak to the gambling inspector about it. Ramos left the restroom and told the inspector, Carlos Troche, about the supervisor working the roulette table. Troche then went to Padin and told him that the employment of supervisors to work the gambling tables was contrary to the regulations of the Tourism Department. Troche showed Padin the regulation and Padin said he would discontinue the practice.

The incident did not end there. Later in the afternoon Padin and Troche went to the restroom where Ramos and Guzman were taking their break.[41] Padin asked Ramos why he had complained to the inspector. Ramos answered that Padin had no time to talk to him about the incident and he talked to Troche as part of his duties as shop steward. Padin then said that he did have time to speak to the government inspector but he did not have time to speak to Ramos until 8 p.m. Padin's voice was raised at this time and he was pointing his finger at Ramos.

At 8 o'clock that evening Ramos had finished work and was talking to another employee, Ruben Ramos. Ruben Ramos was working a blackjack table but there were no players at the time.[42] Padin came up to them and told Felix Ramos that he had time for him now and for them to go to the office. Felix Ramos replied that he had nothing to discuss because the matter had been remedied. He added that he was going to wait for Tosado. In the meantime he was going to watch out for the interests of the employees in his role as shop steward. Padin then banged his fist on the blackjack table and told Felix Ramos that he had to go to the croupier's restroom. Felix Ramos replied that he was not going to leave the casino because he was carrying out his functions as shop steward.[43] He then walked toward an empty table at the back of the casino. Padin followed him and said that Ramos had two alternatives, he could go to the restroom, or he could resign. Ramos said he was not going to resign, whereupon Padin suspended him on the spot.

The suspension was originally supposed to be for 7 days, but on the next day Ramos was told by Guzman that the suspension was converted to a discharge. On January 28 Padin addressed a memorandum entitled "Justified Discharge" and explaining that Ramos was discharged for "insubordination and lack of respect" toward Padin. However, the incident outlined in the memorandum, which is identical to the incident as described by Padin in his testimony, bears little relation to the several incidents described in the credible testimony of Felix Ramos, Troche, Guzman, and Ruben Ramos. Even so, the incident as described by Padin and set out in the January 28 memorandum shows that the discharge was based at least in part on Ramos' insistence on performing his function as a union steward. Further, contrary to the statement in the January 28 memorandum that a discussion of grievances concerning the casino in the gambling area violated the grievance procedure of the collective-bargaining agreement, I find that the agreement contains no such provision. It would appear, rather, that Ramos was entirely correct in approaching Padin, as he did, to discuss the grievance. Ramos' action in pursuing the matter with the inspector also appears to be proper, particularly since the inspector immediately went to Padin and told him to stop the unauthorized use of a supervisor. Since I do not credit Padin's testimony that Ramos was rude and disrespectful, I find that the January 28 memorandum shows that Ramos was discharged for invoking the grievance procedure, and for complaining about casino operations to the inspector from the Department of Tourism.

Accordingly, based on the credible evidence on this incident I find that Ramos complained about a violation of the parties' practice and the regulations of the Tourism Department. Padin's conduct when he came into the croupiers' restroom shows his resentment not at Ramos' conduct in seeking to discuss the irregularity at the roulette table, but at Ramos' action in complaining to the gambling inspector. Ramos' discharge thus was a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. See Interboro

[38] There is nothing in the contract about a supervisor working at a table, but there was no question raised by Respondent that the practice was not contrary to the parties' understanding.

[40] There is a wide variance in the version of this conversation between the testimony of Ramos and Padin. In the latter's testimony, he described Ramos as screaming at him in the middle of a crowded casino at the height of the tourist season. However, Padin's testimony was confused, mixing up this incident in the afternoon with one which happened later in the evening. My own observations of Ramos, and the testimony on an incident in September 1980 indicate to me that he may have been more forceful in pressing his grievance than he was willing to admit, but his testimony is substantially corroborated by that of the Commonwealth's gambling inspector, Carlos Troche Santiago, who was present. Respondent brought forth only Padin, whose testimony I find to be unreliable. Therefore I credit the broad outlines of Ramos' testimony and these findings are based on that testimony.

[41] The testimony of Ramos on this part of the day's events was corroborated by Guzman and undenied by Padin. I accept Ramos' version as credible and logical.

[42] I have made these findings on the mutually corroborative stories of Ruben and Felix Ramos. Padin, as I have noted, confused this incident with the earlier exchange in the casino. I do not credit his testimony in this matter.

[43] In an affidavit which was given in the course of the investigation of this case and which was received in evidence Felix Ramos stated that there were no other union officers in the casino at that time. However, in his testimony at the hearing he said that Barbosa and another steward named Roman were there that evening. This discrepancy may be explained if these other stewards were in the restroom at that precise time. This is a logical inference which I find acceptable.

2. Incidents in June and July 1980

After his discharge, in March or April,[44] Ramos was called by Attorney Leonardo Llequis. Llequis informed Ramos that the Union and Respondent had reached an agreement on the reinstatement of the night-shift employees who had struck on December 20,[45] as well as Ramos' situation. Ramos was told to go to the hotel and talk to General Manager Maza. At this meeting Maza told Ramos that the "punishment" had been unjust and that he knew that Ramos was a capable and cooperative employee. Maza further stated that Ramos could have his choice of shifts and days off and that he could take a leave of absence whenever he wanted if he returned to work.

At this time Ramos had another job, as a designer with the American Fire Sprinkler Corporation in San Juan. His hours were flexible, and required that he work from 6 or 7 a.m. until early in the afternoon. Thus on his return to work at the casino, he chose the hours from 4 o'clock in the afternoon until midnight, with Saturdays and Sundays as his days off. These unusual considerations lead me to conclude, as I have above, that Ramos was a versatile and highly regarded employee.[46]

On June 18, 1980, Ramos testified in this proceeding. Shortly after that he requested from Pedro Padin a leave of absence to run from July 5 through November 3.[47] Padin told him to put the request in writing, which he did under date of June 26, 1980. On receiving the request Padin left the casino to consult with Maza, then returned, and said that the leave was not approved because of "problems with other leaves." Padin then added that if Ramos had not testified (at this hearing) he would have "enjoyed the favor" of management, but that he had gravely injured Respondent by his testimony. Padin gave the leave request back to Ramos marked "Not approved."

Although Padin did not deny this conversation he did testify that the reason Ramos was not granted the leave was that Ramos had been given many privileges, more than other employees. Luna testified on this matter, but said that the reason the leave was not granted was because Ramos had been granted a leave of absence on aother occasion and that in June they "were not in a position to give him another."

Padin's remarks to Ramos that the reason he was not being granted the leave were clearly discriminatory. Thus I find that Respondent's action in denying Ramos leave without pay in June 1980 is a further violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

On the same night, after Ramos had his conversation with Padin about the leave, he left the hotel about 11. As Ramos related the story, a woman who was a guest at the hotel stopped him in the lobby and asked him some questions about the games. He answered her and they both walked toward the exit. Ramos held the door for the guest, but did not remain with her after they were outside the hotel. He went to his car which was in the hotel parking lot.

This incident was observed by one of the hotel's security force and a report that Ramos had left the hotel in the company of a woman guest was handwritten by the security office and forwarded to Carlos Luna. There is no written rule in evidence in this case which prohibits casino employees from leaving the hotel with guests. There are rules requiring croupiers to exercise the utmost discretion concerning guests and their business. Thus I credit Luna's testimony that there was an unwritten rule against employees' leaving the hotel in the company of guests. However, Luna also testified that his customary procedure in matters of this sort[48] was to check out the report, then to hear the employee's side of the story before issuing a warning or other disciplinary measure. In this case Luna admitted that he did not check the report from the security office, did not make any independent investigation, and did not ask Ramos for an explanation. He summoned Ramos to his office, confronted him with the security office report and told him he had violated the rules "in a crass form."

This interview was followed on July 2 by a memorandum from Luna to Ramos entitled "Last chance" in which Luna described the incident with the guest[49] and noting that this violated the rules "in a flagrant manner." The memorandum went on to state that this was Ramos' last chance, and that he would be discharged for any further violations of the rules.

In this case I credit Ramos' version of the incident, but I can understand how the fact that Ramos opened the door of the hotel for the guest, then followed her out the door, could be misinterpreted by a security guard. Thus I can find nothing out of the ordinary in the fact that the security office reported the incident to Luna. I have already found that the rule alleged to have been violated here, while not contained in the rules of conduct for croupiers, was consistent with the tenor and spirit of those rules. Luna offered no explanation in this case as to why he departed from his usual practice in disciplinary cases of checking the report, investigating the incident, and listening to the explanation of the accused employee. By his own testimony, he summoned Ramos to his office, showed him the report from the security office, and issued the warning.

In view of the absence of any reason for this variance from custom, and in consideration of the timing of the warning less than 2 weeks after Ramos had first testified in this case, and particularly in the light of Padin's remarks to Ramos about betrayal of Respondent through that testimony, I find that the variance from Luna's usual practice, and the severity of the warning[50] flowed from Respondent's resentment at Ramos for his prior testimony in this case. Therefore I find that this warning is an additional violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

[44] Ramos was uncertain about this date. At one point he said it was in March, at another time he recalled the date as April 27. Since I have found that the striking night-shift employees returned to work in March, I find that the events related here also occurred in March.

[45] With the exception of the four union officers mentioned above.

[46] See also the letter from Carlos Luna containing a laudatory recommendation of Ramos and dated February 7, 1980.

[47] I rely for the findings of the leave request on the credible testimony of Felix Ramos. Padin did not testify on this issue.

[48] Luna testified that he had taken disciplinary action against other employees for the same infraction, but never against a croupier.

[49] The English translation of the memorandum described the incident as having occurred on June 23. However the Spanish version states that it occurred on June 26. The report of the security office likewise places the date on June 26.

3. Ramos' shift change and second discharge

At the resumption of this hearing on August 4, 1980, the General Counsel amended the complaint in Case 24–CA–4269 to allege the violations of the Act which have been discussed in the section of this Decision just concluded. Felix Ramos testified concerning these allegations at the resumed hearing. Ramos testified that he took some vacation time in August and returned to work on September 1.

In the meantime, on August 26, Ramos was elected acting president of the Union.[51] On September 4 or 5 Ramos, accompanied by Attorney Jorge Farinacci, approached the acting manager of the casino, Hector Rivera Rivera,[52] and explained to him that they had a letter addressed to Maza notifying him of Ramos' election as acting president of the Union. They had been unable to locate Maza so they gave the letter to Rivera. According to Ramos, Rivera read the letter and then put it in his pocket. Farinacci testified that Rivera took the letter[53] and put it into a drawer in his desk. Rivera denied that the meeting took place, and stated that he did not know of Ramos' election until September 19 or 20.[54]

Whatever happened to the letter of September 5, I credit the testimony of Farinacci that he told Ramos-Acosta and Luna on September 3 that Ramos was the acting president, and I credit the testimony of Farinacci and Ramos that they told Rivera on the night of September 5 that same thing. For reasons given below I do not credit Rivera on significant issues in this case.

The significance of all this is the fact that as the result of an agreement between Tosado and the Union's first president, Ruben Ramos, the president was entitled to work days and to have Saturdays and Sundays off. This practice was described credibly by Ruben Ramos, Jose Crespo,[55] and Felix Ramos.

Felix Ramos, moreover, had always worked days since he started at the casino in January 1977.[56] As of April 1980, after his first discharge he had Maza's promise that he could choose his own schedule and his days off. Thereafter Ramos worked for a few months on a 4 p.m. to midnight schedule with Saturdays and Sundays off. In July he requested that he change to the 12:30 to 8 schedule and retained the same days off. He returned from his vacation on September 1 to the same schedule.

Hector Rivera had been the casino's assistant manager for some 6 or 7 months before Padin's departure in August and his own elevation to the position of acting manager. As assistant manager, Rivera had charge of scheduling, casino operations, and personnel matters. He testified that in that capacity he instituted a number of schedule changes designed to assure a fair distribution of weekend days off for all employees. He also stated that he changed a number of shifts.

Respondent entered a chart into evidence to support Rivera's testimony on schedule changes. The chart shows all schedule changes including shifts and days off for the period from April 11, 1980, to November 1, 1980. I have examined this chart for the period from April 11 through September 12, 1980, which seemed to me to be the dates relevant to the issues in this case, and I find that the data contained therein do not support Rivera's testimony either that he attempted to equalize the weekend days off or that he systematically changed employees' shifts.

With respect to days off, the chart shows that as of April 4 there were four employees who had Saturdays and Sundays off. On April 11 three of those employees had their days off changed. There were only seven employees whose days off were changed to Saturdays and Sundays, and in all but two of those cases, the changes to Saturdays and Sundays were only for periods of 1 to 2 weeks. Ruben Ramos had those days off from September 5 through September 12, when his days off were changed again to Sunday and Monday. Edwin Feliciano was changed to weekend days off on May 23, then returned to Sunday and Monday on June 6. Miguel Medina enjoyed weekend days off from July 4 to 18 when he was assigned Thursday and Friday as days off. Raymond Flores had Saturdays and Sundays off from July 18 to August 1. Luis Serra was one of the three employees whose days were changed from Saturday and Sunday on April 11. His days were changed back to Saturday and Sunday on July 23 and he remained on that schedule through September 12. Miguel Barbosa was moved to a Saturday and Sunday schedule on August 22 where he remained through September 12.

These figures make it clear that there was no effort to equalize weekend days off among the croupiers. Even if one discounts four employees listed as terminated as of April 11 there were 26 employees who never had weekends off during this April-September period. Rivera's statement that it was his "main idea for all of the employees to be able to enjoy the week-ends" is demonstrably inaccurate.

[50] Luna testified that he had checked with the security office about previous violations of rules, and the July 2 memorandum vaguely alluded to prior offenses, but I do not credit Luna and I find that prior violations of the rules by Ramos have not been established.

[51] There are intimations in the record that this change in leadership was not without some internal conflict in the Union and that Crespo was contesting the change. These internal disputes are not really relevant here since Ramos had at least de facto title to the office he claimed. I presume that this change in leadership was the reason for the replacement of Attorney Llequis by Attorney Farinacci.

[52] Padin had left the casino in August. Rivera was appointed acting manager at the end of August, and was named manager in September 1980. Farinacci described this incident as happening on September 5, Ramos said it was on the 4th. Other testimony indicates that Farinacci was in the casino on the 5th, so that date is more probably correct, but the discrepancy is minimal.

[53] Along with a copy addressed to Padin as casino manager. Farinacci also said that he notified Luna and Attorney Ramos-Acosta of the change and Ramos' election at a meeting on September 3. According to Farinacci, Ramos-Acosta told him to send a letter informing Respondent of this change.

[54] At another point in his testimony Rivera said that Ramos gave him a letter on September 14 informing him of Ramos' election.

[55] Crespo preferred to work nights, but on his accession to the presidency in November 1979 his days off were changed to Saturday and Sunday.

[56] Of the 24 names on the Union's seniority list as of November 8, 1978, Felix Ramos was number five.

The chart shows that Rivera's further statement that he wanted to allow employees to enjoy "the most advantageous shift, which is the day shift" is similarly in error. Excluding Felix Ramos and the four employees terminated as of April 11, on April 4 there were 15 employees on the day shift, and 17 on nights. Of all these only two, Hector Lopez and Rafael Rossi, were moved from nights to days. Lopez was changed from the night shift to the day shift on April 18, but on May 9 was moved back to the night shift. Rossi was changed from nights to days on August 29. Three employees (excluding Felix Ramos) were moved from days to nights. Ariel Cortes was changed on September 5, but on September 19 he was promoted to supervisory rank. Miguel Barbosa was transferred from days to nights on April 18 but changed back to days on August 22. Fernando Paulino was transferred to a mixed day-night shift from the day shift on April 11, then to the night shift on April 18. Raymond Flores presents a unique situation. He transferred from days to nights to mixed day-night shifts a total of 7 times from April 6 to August 1. In contrast to Flores' situation, seven employees showed no changes either in their days off or their shifts during this period, and 17 additional employees kept the same shifts although their days off changed in this period.

All of this shows clearly that there was no attempt made during the time Rivera was setting the schedules for the casino employees to equalize the disadvantages of night-shift work, or to spread more equitably the advantage of weekends off.

Rivera testified that the schedule for employees was worked out by him and posted on Wednesdays for the following week or 2 weeks. In September, Rivera stated, he noticed that Felix Ramos "had been enjoying Saturdays and Sundays off with a comfortable day shift" so he determined "to place another person in order for them to enjoy that shift" and to place Felix Ramos on the night shift.

Rivera testified that he posted this schedule for Ramos on Wednesday, September 3, but Ramos stated that on Friday, September 5, Rivera came up to him at a blackjack table and told him that he was to report to the night shift on the next night, Saturday. Ramos remonstrated with Rivera, pointing out that he had already made other arrangements for the weekend; that his other job, which was known to management, made it impossible for him to work the night shift; and that both his position as acting union president and his April agreement with Maza would accord him the privilege of choosing his shift and days off. To all of this Rivera responded that there was nothing personal in it, but he, Rivera, had been "notified" about it and that Ramos had to come to work the next night.

The appearance in the English language record of this word, "notified," points up one of the real problems in extracting the meaning, particularly the nuances or shadings, in words which a witness has uttered in his native Spanish, indeed in an idiomatic Spanish, in response to a question which is phrased in English, then translated into Spanish. Thus I am unaware of whatever shades of meaning may reside in the Spanish word which was translated by the interpreter in this case as "notified." The word "notify" is defined in Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary, 1973 ed., G. & C. Merriam Company, Springfield, Massachusetts as "1. obs: to point out; 2. to give a notice or report the occurrence of . . .; 3. to give formal notice to . . ." In my view, the third meaning is what Rivera meant when he told Ramos that he was "notified" that Ramos' shift and days off were to be changed. From this I can infer and I find that Rivera was notified by someone or ones higher in the hierarchy of management than he. Since at this time Rivera was at least the acting casino manager the only person higher than he in Respondent's management structure were Luna and Maza. Since I have already found that Rivera was not truthful when he asserted that he changed schedules and days off to share the benefits of weekends off and day shifts, I do not credit his statement that he alone decided to change Ramos' shift and days off so that another employee could enjoy those advantages.[57] Luna did not testify on this issue and Maza, of course, did not testify at all.

There is, then, no credible reason in this record as to why Luna or Maza "notified" Rivera to change Ramos' schedule. But I have already noted, and credited testimony that Padin had expressed to Ramos the hostility felt toward him by management on account of his treachery in testifying at this hearing in June. If management felt that way in June, it is unlikely that this hostility would have abated when Ramos again testified in support of the further allegations against Respondent at the August portion of the hearings. Moreover, Respondent was aware of the practice, agreed upon between Ruben Ramos and Tosado, of permitting the union president to pick his shifts and days off. Respondent was aware of the arrangement Maza had made with Ramos in April, and the latter's second job, and Respondent was aware, having been notified by Farinacci on September 3, of Ramos' election as acting president of the Union. In the absence of any legitimate business reason, or of any credible justification for this action, I infer and find that Ramos was reassigned on September 5 to retaliate against his further testimony at this hearing in August and his elevation to the acting presidency of the Union. This conduct constitutes a further violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

While Ramos and Rivera were discussing the reassignment on the night of September 5, they were joined by Attorney Farinacci. They then agreed that Ramos would not be required to work on Saturday, September 6, but would begin his new schedule on the night shift, with Tuesdays and Wednesdays off, on Sunday, September 7.

[57] Respondent's schedule chart shows that no one was moved from nights to days in the week of September 5 or 12, or in several weeks following. Ruben Ramos who was already on the day shift had his days off changed in the week of September 5 from Tuesday and Wednesday to Saturday and Sunday, but that only lasted for 1 week, as he was changed to Sunday and Monday in the week of September 12.

It was the practice at the casino that one employee could swap shifts with another provided that the substitute was qualified and that prior approval of management was obtained. On September 5 Ramos informed Rivera that it was impossible for him to work the late shift because of his other part-time job, but that he would change shifts with another employee, Eugenio Rosario Rexach. Rosario was equally as skilled as Ramos and Rivera accepted the swap for the 5 days beginning on September 11.

On Sunday, September 7, Ramos called another employee, Anibal Colon Hernandez, and asked him to substitute for that 1 night. Colon agreed and Ramos called Supervisor Abelardo Garcia and informed him of the substitution.[58] Colon worked that night and Ramos himself worked the night shift on Monday, September 8. Tuesday and Wednesday, September 9 and 10, were Ramos' days off under his new schedule.

On September 11, Ramos was working the day shift under his agreement with Rosario which had been approved by Rivera. About 2:30 in the afternoon Rivera told Ramos that the change that Ramos and Rosario had worked out could no longer continue because "they no longer wanted it." Who "they" were was not explained in the record, but I infer and find that, as with the change of shift, the orders to discontinue the arrangement between Ramos and Rosario came from above, either Maza or Luna.

In his testimony, Rivera asserted that he had authorized the swap between Rosario and Ramos, but only for 2 days, not for a week. Rivera did not deny the conversation with Ramos outlined in the previous paragraph, and I note that Thursday, September 11, was only the first day of the swap. Thus Rivera contradicted his own testimony, a further indication of his unreliability as a credible witness. Rosario was also informed of this decision and he worked his regular day shift on September 12.

While this incident was not alleged in the complaint as a separate and distinct violation, the matter has been fully litigated in this proceeding and Respondent is not prejudiced by a separate finding on this matter. Accordingly, I find that the decision to cancel the swap between Rosario and Ramos was made by Maza or Luna, and that the reason that decision was made was the same as the reason for the original change in shift and days off for Ramos, in retaliation for his testimony in this proceeding, and his election as acting president of the Union. I find this abrogation of the arrangement between Rosario and Ramos to be a separate and additional violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

On September 12, at noon,[59] Attorney Farinacci filed the charge in Case 24–CA–4381 with the Regional Office of the Board on behalf of Felix Ramos. Later that afternoon Farinacci and Ramos attended an arbitration hearing at the Commonwealth Department of Labor involving the prior discharge of an employee named Pastrana. Representing the casino at this hearing were Carlos Luna and Attorney Francisco Ramos-Acosta.

There is some conflict in the testimony of Farinacci and Ramos on the one hand, and Luna and Ramos-Acosta on the other, over what was said and done concerning the charge which had been filed earlier in the day. I do not find it necessary to resolve the questions of credibility growing out of this conflict because it is undisputed that Farinacci gave a copy of the charge to Ramos-Acosta. The latter informed Luna of the contents of the charge either by telling him orally, or by giving him a copy. Thus Respondent was aware of the matter on that afternoon.

That evening Ramos reported to the night shift at the casino. His timecard which was received in evidence shows that he punched in at 8:27 p.m.

Because of the practice in the casino of relieving croupiers as described above in connection with the incident between Padin and Ramos, it was the the custom for supervisors to schedule some employees for a break at the beginning of their shift. This was done on a rotating basis so that on alternative days or nights a croupier would either begin work at the beginning of the shift, or would begin one-half hour or so after that time. On September 11 Ramos had been scheduled to begin work at the beginning of his shift. Of course it had been Rosario and not Ramos who actually worked the night shift on September 11. The supervisor in charge on September 12, Rafael Castillo Rodriguez, was aware of that, and he scheduled Ramos to begin work at the start of the night shift at 8:30 p.m. on September 12. Ramos, however, acting on his understanding of the existing practice, did not immediately report to work, but was present in the casino a short time after 8:30.[60]

Between 8:30 and 8:35, according to Juan Rivera, Castillo and Ramos had a conversation close to the table where Rivera was eating. Rivera was not busy at the time. In fact he had nothing to do, and was able to give his full attention to the conversation. Castillo began by instructing Ramos to go to work because his shift had already started. Ramos answered that he did not have to begin because he had done so the previous night. Castillo then said that Ramos had not worked the previous night and to get to work.

Ramos then began to argue with Castillo, asking if there were something personal that Castillo had against him. Castillo continued to order Ramos to begin work.

[58] Garcia denied that he had been notified of the substitution, but raised no objection at the time. Resolution of this credibility issue is not necessary to the resolution of the issues herein.

[59] According to the date stamp imprinted by the Board's Regional Office.

[60] Ramos himself testified that he had reported to work and had a conversation with Castillo at 8:25 p.m. This is contradicted by the timecard showing that Ramos had clocked in at 8:27 and must have encountered Castillo some minutes later. Ramos' entire testimony on this incident with Castillo is defensive, contradictory, and marked by self-justification which is not warranted by the facts. While I find that Ramos' description of events later that evening is credible, I do not credit his version of the conversation with Castillo shortly after 8:30. I also had trouble with Castillo's credibility, so I have relied for the facts on this incident on the credible testimony of Juan Rivera Melendez, a cashier who works part time at the casino and is not a member of the bargaining unit here.

Ramos then began walking toward the roulette table where he was assigned, continuing to argue. He then said that if there were something personal against him the two of them could take care of it in the parking lot at 4 o'clock (when the shift ended).[61] Ramos continued, saying that he was not Ta Ta[62] and if it were something personal they could settle it themselves. Juan Rivera then cautioned Castillo not to continue the argument. Ramos went to work and the incident was over.

After this, according to Castillo, he went to the casino office and wrote a report on the incident. In fact Castillo wrote two reports. In what was identified as the first report, Castillo recited the fact that Ramos had invited him to fight at 4 a.m., and described this as a violation of the agreement and stated that Ramos was forthwith discharged.[63] He was instructed to report to Luna's office at 1 p.m. on Monday, September 15, for final processing.

Then Castillo wrote another letter allegedly correcting errors which appeared in the first. The second letter shows three substantive changes from the first. The words "attended the undersigned" in the first paragraph of the first letter were changed to "offended the undersigned" in the second. There is no question that this change makes the paragraph more accurate, and reflects what actually happened. However the other changes are more difficult to explain. Indeed Castillo furnished no credible explanation as to why, in the second letter, he eliminated the reference to Ramos' position as acting shop steward in the salutation, and the reference to Ramos as the "group representative" in the last paragraph. Despite extensive cross-examination, Castillo's explanation is so confused and contradictory as to be totally unconvincing.[64] Hector Rivera, the casino manager, likewise was thoroughly confused on his role in passing on these letters. Castillo said, for example, that he showed both letters to Rivera. Rivera stated that he saw only one, then identified that as the first letter. For these reasons I discredit the testimony of both Castillo and Rivera on this issue. I really can make no findings on this subject, but the logic and the inherent probabilities of the situation would indicate to me that Castillo prepared the first letter and showed it to Rivera when the latter arrived at the casino about 11:30 p.m. Rivera noted the references to Ramos as acting steward, and, knowing that Ramos was no longer acting steward, but acting president, decided to delete those references and so instructed Castillo. I cannot speculate as to the reason Rivera did not ask Castillo to include Ramos' current title.

After Hector Rivera arrived at the casino, Juan Rivera testified that Ramos approached Castillo and attempted to excuse himself, saying that he had lost his head. Hector Rivera then came up and suggested that they go to his office to discuss the matter.

In the office, according to Hector Rivera and Castillo, they went over the incident, Ramos again apologized, and Castillo told him that the "report" had already been prepared but that he would consult with Rivera and let Ramos know their decision later. Ramos testified that Castillo had misunderstood the reference to 4 a.m. and that what Ramos meant was that they had to settle personal matters after working time. Rivera then said that if they reached an agreement it was all right with him. Rivera then left and Castillo and Ramos reached an agreement that Castillo would ask Rivera to "revoke" the report. In this instance, I credit Ramos over Castillo and Rivera, and I find that the incident in the casino was forgiven by Castillo with Rivera's approval.

The night was not yet ended, however. Around 3:30 Rivera came up to Ramos and handed him the dismissal letter.[65] Rivera then told Ramos that he was not going to drop the charges because Castillo had spoken of the incident to Maza and Maza had told Castillo to go ahead with the discharge. This testimony by Felix Ramos was corroborated by Ruben Ramos who testified that he spoke with Rivera on the day after Felix Ramos was discharged, and that Rivera told Ruben Ramos that Maza had found out about the incident and "wanted to go on with the case." Ruben Ramos added that he had seen Castillo talking with Maza in the lobby of the hotel on the night of Felix Ramos' discharge.

Crediting this testimony by Felix and Ruben Ramos, I find that the confrontation in the casino had been adjusted and forgiven by Respondent through the actions of Castillo and Rivera at the 11:30 p.m. meeting in the casino office. This constituted a clear and unequivocal condonation of whatever misconduct Ramos may have committed. N.L.R.B. v. Marshall Car Wheel and Foundry Co. of Marshall, Texas, Inc., 218 F.2d 409 (5th Cir. 1955); Retail Wholesale and Department Store Union, AFL-CIO [Coca Cola Bottling Works, Inc.] v. N.L.R.B., 466 F.2d 380 (D.C. Cir. 1972).

After the fact of this condonation and forgiveness, Maza found out about the incident. I have already noted Maza's hostility toward Ramos as expressed in the earlier incident between Ramos and Padin. I have further found evidence of a continuation of this hostile attitude in the change of shifts and the denial to Ramos of the privilege of swapping shifts with other employees. Maza did not testify, nor did any other witness ascribe to him any reason or motive for this action. In view of this the only logical inference I can draw is that Maza ordered the discharge of Ramos, using the incident with Castillo as a pretext, because he had testified in previous phases of this hearing contrary to the interests of Respondent, and, on that very day, had filed a new charge with the Board complaining of further misconduct by Respondent. Shattuck-Denn Mining Corporation (Iron King Branch) v. N.L.R.B., 362 F.2d 466 (9th Cir. 1967). I thus find that by revoking the agreement condoning the incident in the casino, and ordering the discharge of Felix Ramos on the night of September 12, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

[61] Juan Rivera understood this remark to be an invitation to fight.

[62] Ta Ta is the nickname of an employee named Eduardo Rivera. Ramos explained that Eduardo Rivera had been humiliated in an incident with Castillo in front of a number of people, but chose not to file a grievance or complaint about it. Ramos apparently wanted Castillo to understand that he would not supinely accept that type of manifestation of Castillo's authority. Juan Rivera testified that Ramos was excited, and was talking in a loud voice with his arms extended and waving his hands.

[63] The phrase used several times in this proceeding is translated as "suspended from employment and salary permanently." I think that the plain meaning of this is that the employee is discharged.

[64] The two letters were typed by a croupier named Rosalie Rodriguez, but she did not testify in this proceeding.

[65] The second of the two letters discussed above.

After handing Ramos the discharge letter in the casino at 3:30 a.m. Rivera then said that Ramos could "defend" himself at the meeting with Luna at 1 on Monday, September 15. However, Rivera stated that he never bothered to inform Luna about the situation. I find this rather hard to believe, but even harder to believe was Luna's testimony that when Castillo and Ramos came to his office Monday afternoon he knew nothing about the matter. Since this meeting is really only a postscript to the main events in this case, I need make no findings concerning it, other than to note my disbelief of the testimony of Rivera that he never notified Luna of the meeting's purpose, and Luna's denial of any knowledge of the incident in the casino on September 12. This reinforces my lack of confidence in the credibility of either Luna or Rivera.

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that the strike which began on December 20, 1979, was an unfair labor practice strike I shall recommend that Respondent offer Jose Crespo, Humberto Sanchez, Arnaldo Delgado, and Geraldo Rodriguez immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs, or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, and make these employees, together with all other employees who went on strike on December 20 and 21, 1979, against Respondent's unfair labor practices, whole for any loss of earnings they suffered by reason of Respondent's unfair labor practices and the discrimination against them by payment to them of sums of money equal to that which they normally would have earned, absent the unfair labor practices and discrimination against them, including the 1979 Christmas bonus, less net earnings during such period, with interest thereon, to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[66]

I shall further recommend that Respondent offer Felix Ramos immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equal job, without prejudice to his seniority and other rights and privileges, and to make him whole for any loss of earnings suffered by him by reason of the discrimination against him in January and in September 1980 computed in the same manner as outlined in the preceding paragraph.

I shall further recommend that Respondent bargain on request with the Union, and that all references to certain disciplinary action be removed from the files maintained by Respondent concerning Felix Ramos.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Isla Verde Hotel Corporation d/b/a Hotel Holiday Inn de Isla Verde is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Asociacion de Empleados del Casino del Holiday Inn de Isla Verde is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By unilaterally discontinuing its Christmas bonus in December 1979, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

4. By refusing to bargain about the discontinuance of the Christmas bonus Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

5. By refusing to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

6. By sending letters threatening them with reprisals for engaging in protected concerted activity, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

7. By requiring employees to waive statutory rights in order to obtain reinstatement, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

8. By discharging its employee, Felix Ramos, on January 26, 1980, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

9. By denying an unpaid leave to its employee, Felix Ramos, in June 1980, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

10. By issuing a written warning to its employee, Felix Ramos, in July 1980, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

11. By changing the shift and days off of its employee, Felix Ramos, in September 1980, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

12. By denying to its employee, Felix Ramos, the right to swap shifts with other employees, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

13. By revoking an agreement to condone the conduct of its employee, Felix Ramos, on September 12, 1980, and thereby causing his discharge, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I issue the following recommended:

ORDER[67]

The Respondent, Isla Verde Hotel Corporation d/b/a Hotel Holiday Inn de Isla Verde, Isla Verde, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain on request with the Union.

(b) Unilaterally discontinuing its Christmas bonus.

(c) Refusing to grant benefits or discontinuing existing benefits to employees because they engaged in union activities, or in concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection, or because they filed charges with or gave testimony to the Board under the Act.

[66] See, generally, Isis Plumbing and Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[67] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(d) Issuing threats of discipline and warning notices to employees because they engaged in union activities, or in concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection, or because they filed charges with or gave testimony to the Board under the Act.

(e) Requiring employees to sign waivers of statutory rights in order to obtain reinstatement.

(f) Discharging or refusing to reinstate or revoking agreements to condone activities of its employees for engaging in union activities, or in concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection or because they filed charges with or gave testimony to the Board under the Act.

(g) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain with the Union as the representative of employees in the following unit admitted to be appropriate:

> All croupier employees of Respondent employed at its hotel, exclusive of all other employees, officer clerical employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

(b) Offer to Jose Crespo, Humberto Sanchez, Arnaldo Delgado, Geraldo Rodriguez, and Felix Ramos immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs, or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, and make them, together with all other employees who engaged in an unfair labor practice strike on and after December 20, 1979, for any losses of earnings suffered by them in the manner set forth in section IV of this Decision, entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Remove from the files maintained by Respondent and concerning Felix Ramos all reference to disciplinary actions taken against him on January 26, July 2, and September 12, and September 15, 1980.

(d) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its place of business in Isla Verde, Carolina, Puerto Rico, in the English and Spanish languages, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[68] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 24, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director for Region 24, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

[68] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On December 13, 1980, Administrative Law Judge Joel P. Biblowitz issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs.[1]

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below,[3] and to adopt his recommended Order, as so modified.[4]

1. The General Counsel excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's failure to find that the Respondent unlawfully postponed the regularly scheduled January wage increase. The record clearly demonstrates, and the Administrative Law Judge found, that the Respondent postponed the scheduled January increase because of the pendency of the Union's petition. The Board and courts have long held that the withholding of pay raises from employees who are awaiting the holding of a Board election violates the Act if the employees otherwise would have been granted the pay raises in the normal course of the employer's business.[5] Unlike the situation in Uarco Inc.,[6] the Respondent here did not tell employees that the sole reason for its action was to avoid the appearance that it sought to influence the election. More important, it placed the onus for the postponement on the Union.[7] We therefore find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

We also disagree with the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that the Respondent's repeated references to the possibility of strikes and the fact that economic strikers can be permanently replaced were protected by Section 8(c) of the Act. Rather, we view those references, when read in the context of certain other of the Respondent's campaign statements, to constitute implied threats violative of Section 8(a)(1).

A major theme of the Respondent's campaign literature and speeches was that unionization did not guarantee automatic increases in wages and benefits, or, specifically, that its office employees would receive the wages and benefits enjoyed by its unionized store employees. Thus, the Respondent repeatedly emphasized that the law did not require it to agree to any union demand, only that it bargain in good faith, that the only weapon a union had to force agreement was a strike, and that economic strikers could be permanently replaced. In conjunction with these points, Controller Cimini stated that the Respondent would do whatever it had to do to keep the Union out, that the Respondent "certainly would not agree" to pay the store rates, and that, if the Union demanded those rates, there would be a long strike. Vice President Gold stated that the Respondent knew how to protect its interests and, in both his speeches, stated that there was "no way in the world" that the Respondent would pay the store rates.

In concluding that the Respondent's strike statements were protected by Section 8(c), the Administrative Law Judge noted that the Respondent never stated that it would not bargain or never reach an agreement. To the contrary, he noted that the Respondent stated that it was required to bargain in good faith, that it spoke only of the possibility of a strike, and that it never foreclosed the

[2] The Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings. Further, there is nothing in the record to indicate that the Administrative Law Judge was biased or prejudiced against the Respondent or that the Respondent was accorded less than a full and fair hearing.

[3] In agreement with the General Counsel, we find that Vice President Gold's statements to employee Evers, following the termination of employee Medaska, are sufficient to establish the Respondent's knowledge of Medaska's union sympathies. In addition, we find it unnecessary to pass on whether the Respondent's campaign literature contained an unlawful solicitation of grievances since such would not affect the scope of the remedy. Finally, we shall leave to the compliance stage of this proceeding the determination of whether Medaska would have remained in the Respondent's employ beyond January 28, 1980.

[4] In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on any backpay due Medaska based on the formula set forth therein.

Member Jenkins does not rely on Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), for finding Medaska's discharge unlawful. As the Administrative Law Judge found, the asserted lawful reasons for her discharge were "incredible," so that no lawful reason exists and only the unlawful one remains. Wright Line is concerned only with deciding between a genuine lawful and a genuine unlawful reason for a discharge, and it is misleading and inaccurate to apply it where only the unlawful reason is genuine.

possibility of reaching an agreement. He further noted that the statements regarding the replacement of economic strikers were a correct description of the law. However, the Administrative Law Judge apparently failed to consider the Respondent's statements as they related to the Respondent's descriptions of the Union's response to unionization by its own clerical employees.

In a letter to employees dated December 28, 1979, the Respondent referred to a 1970 strike by the Union's office employees and made the following statements:

> You must think that Local 1262 would have some understanding for the needs and wants of its own office employees . . . . What Local 1262 did was to bargain the Office Employees Union into the ground, get the employees out on strike, and then permanently replaced all the strikers. The strike lasted for two months, and only one striker ever got her job back . . . .
> What makes you think that things will be any different here? This union has a track record of not treating office employees fairly. Moreover, we know how to negotiate hard, just like the union does. And we know about rights regarding the replacement of economic strikers.

In the speech given January 4, 1980, Vice President Gold reiterated that the Union had permanently replaced its own striking clerical employees and added:

> So you can ask the union what it means to be permanently replaced, because Local 1262 really knows how to do it. And I can assure you that this company knows how to do it as well.

Finally, Gold, in his last speech to employees, stated that the Union "broke" its own employees' union and, as to the Respondent's opposition to paying its employees increased wages and benefits, added that it was in "pretty much the same position that Local 1262 was back in 1970."

The above statements demonstrate that the Respondent's strike references went beyond the mere expression of "views, argument or opinion" protected by Section 8(c). Rather, the Respondent told its employees that the Union had previously bargained its own employees "to the ground," forced them on strike, and permanently replaced them. It described its opposition to its employees' demands as similar to the Union's and assured employees that, like the Union, it knew how to bargain "hard" and replace strikers. Moreover, Controller Cimini told employees that the Respondent would do whatever it had to do to keep the Union out. In this context, the Respondent's statements were not limited to the "ifs" and "possibilities" of strikes and collective bargaining but contained a not so subtle threat that, upon unionization, it too would force a strike, directly resulting in the permanent replacement of strikers and the loss of jobs.[8] Accordingly, those statements violate Section 8(a)(1).

2. The Respondent's threats to force a strike and permanently replace strikers add to the necessity for the bargaining order recommended by the Administrative Law Judge. Through its campaign statements and unfair labor practices, the Respondent made clear its opposition to its employees' unionization and, significantly, the dire consequences which would result. Thus, the Respondent threatened more onerous working conditions and told employees that, because of the union campaign, wages and benefits would be frozen. It also threatened that unionization would result in a loss of current benefits which would then have to be negotiated back.

More important, the Respondent's threat to discharge employee Plant, its threat that unionization would result in a strike and the replacement of employees, and its unlawful discharge of employee Medaska underscored its resolve to do, as Controller Cimini threatened, "whatever it had to do" to keep the Union out. As the Administrative Law Judge noted, no employer conduct is more serious than the discharge of an employee because of union affiliation, and such misconduct is particularly effective where, as here, the employer explicitly reveals to employees its unlawful motivation. Nor was the Respondent's unlawful activity limited to threats and reprisals. For, on at least two occasions, the Respondent impliedly promised to remedy employee grievances, thereby giving addded and unlawful emphasis to its contentions that the employees did not need a union to obtain the best that it could offer.

The Respondent's unfair labor practices were serious and accomplished their intended result—the dissipation of the Union's preelection majority. By its unfair labor practices, the Respondent vividly demonstrated to employees the perils of unionization and the rewards of its rejection and, with the employees so conditioned, the possibility of a fair re-run election is, at best, slight.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Progressive Supermarkets, Inc., Parsippany, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order as so modified:

1. Add the following as paragraphs 1(i) and 1(j), relettering subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(i) Threatening that unionization would result in a strike, the permanent replacement of strikers, and the loss of jobs.

"(j) Withholding wage increases because of its employees' union activity."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

> WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with the loss of benefits should they choose to be represented by Retail Store Employees Union Local 1262, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, Local 1262, AFL-CIO and CLC, or any other labor organization.
> WE WILL NOT threaten to discontinue our employees' dental benefit plan should they choose to be represented by Local 1262 or any other labor organization.
> WE WILL NOT threaten to freeze the wages or other benefits of our employees due to their activities on behalf of Local 1262 or any other labor organization.
> WE WILL NOT threaten to install a timeclock for our employees should they choose to be represented by Local 1262 or any other labor organization.
> WE WILL NOT interrogate our employees regarding their activities, and the activities of other employees, on behalf of Local 1262 or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT promise to correct the grievances of our employees in order to induce them to refrain from supporting Local 1262 or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with discharge should they choose to be represented by Local 1262 or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT threaten that unionization will result in a strike, the permanent replacement of strikers, and the loss of jobs.

WE WILL NOT withhold wage increases because of our employees' union activity.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Diane Medaska immediate and full reinstatement to her former position or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges, and make her whole, with interest, for any loss of earnings she may have suffered because of our discriminatory conduct against her.

WE WILL recognize and, upon request, bargain with Local 1262 as the exclusive representative of our employees in the appropriate unit with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The appropriate unit is:

> All full time and regular part time office clerical employees employed at our Parsippany office, but excluding confidential employees, professional employees, guards, all other employees and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

PROGRESSIVE SUPERMARKETS, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL P. BIBLOWITZ, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in Newark, New Jersey, on June 23, 24, 25, July 1 and 2, 1980. The complaint was issued on February 22, 1980, based upon a charge and amended charge filed respectively on January 7 and January 17, 1980, by Retail Store Employees Union Local 1262, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO and CLC, herein called the Union. Basically, the complaint alleges that Progressive Supermarkets, Inc., herein called Respondent, violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by the following actions: (1) threatening its employees with loss of benefits and more onerous working conditions, (2) threatening its employees with discharge if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, (3) informing its employees of the futility of selecting the Union as their collective-bargaining representative and impliedly promising its employees an improvement in their wages and benefits if they rejected or refrained from supporting the Union, (4) soliciting employee complaints and grievances to encourage the employees to refrain from supporting the Union, (5) discharging Diane Medaska due to her activities on behalf of the Union, (6) withholding an annual wage increase and then granting the annual wage increase in an amount greater than in previous years, due to its employees' activities on behalf of the Union, (7) providing its employees with a lounge and implementing split lunch breaks to discourage its employees from engaging in further activities on behalf of the Union, and (8) refusing to bargain with the Union which had been selected by a majority of Respondent's employees as their collective-bargaining representative in an appropriate unit.

On February 22, 1980, the Regional Director for Region 22 issued a Report on Objections and Order Consolidating Cases in Case 22-RC-8060 in which he found that the issues raised by the objections were coextensive with those set forth in the complaint in Case 22-CA-9686 and he therefore consolidated said objections with the unfair labor practice matter, for decision by me. The objections are as follows:

1. The employer, by its officers and agents, did solicit grievances from employees and sought methods to correct them in an effort to discourage employees' support of the petitioning union.

2. The employer, through its officers and agents, spoke to employees individually on the day before and the day of the election. During "those one on one" meetings, the employer intimidated, threatened, and coerced employees in an effort to discourage them from supporting the petitioning union.

3. The employer in remarks made at meetings of employees, threatened employees with a loss of their fringe benefits and dire consequences in the event that the Union succeeded in the election.

4. The employer, on January 4, 1980, did discharge Diana Medaska because of her support for the petitioning union and in an effort to discourage others from voting for Local 1262. By these and other acts, the Employer destroyed the laboratory conditions required by the Board in the conduct of a fair election.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a New Jersey corporation with its principal office located at 1279 Route 46, Parsippany, New Jersey, is engaged in the operation of retail supermarkets within the State of New Jersey. Annually, Respondent's gross revenues exceed $500,000 and, for the same period, it purchased goods and supplies valued in excess of $5,000 which were transported to its place of business in interstate commerce directly from points outside the State of New Jersey and purchased goods valued in excess of $50,000 from suppliers located within the State of New Jersey, who, in turn, had received said goods directly from points outside the State of New Jersey. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that the Union is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE APPROPRIATE UNIT

Respondent admits, and I find, that the appropriate unit herein is all full-time and regular part-time office clerical employees employed at Respondent's Parsippany office, but excluding confidential employees, professional employees, guards, all other employees and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

IV. THE EMPLOYEES INVOLVED

The unit involved in this proceeding is Respondent's office employees at its office in Parsippany, New Jersey. On November 16, 1979,[1] the date the Union simultaneously made its request for recognition and filed its petition with the Board, the following 12 office employees were employed by Respondent: Judy Edwards, Dorothy Evers, Christine Kelly, Diane Medaska, Linda Packard, Kathleen Piper, Katalin Plant, Nancy Rinaldo, Mary Salink, Rose Marie Scalfani, Bablir Jo Sedicavage, and Anne Shally. Between November 16 and November 30, Nancy Gerard was hired by Respondent as an office clerical employee. On December 7, when the parties entered into a consent election agreement, they listed these employees on a Norris Thermador list. Lee Cimini, Respondent's controller (and an admitted supervisor), together with Deborah Huck and Diane Branca, supervise the work of these employees. To a lesser degree, Edward Gold, Respondent's vice president, and to an even lesser degree, William Margolis, Respondent's president, spend some time in the office supervising the work of these employees.

V. THE UNION'S AUTHORIZATION CARDS AND MAJORITY STATUS

The Union obtained a total of 11 authorization cards from these employees. Under the portion of the card the employee fills in, and above the place for signature, the following legend appears: "hereby authorize United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, or its chartered local union to represent me for the purposes of collective bargaining, respecting rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment, in accordance with applicable law."

[1] Unless otherwise stated, dates in November and December are in 1979, and dates in January, February, or thereafter are in 1980.

On or about November 12, Louis Marcucci, organizing director for the Union, received a telephone call from Evers who informed him that Respondent's office employees were interested in being represented by a union and would he meet with them. They arranged to meet at a nearby motel after work on November 14. The employees who were present at this meeting were Evers, Edwards, Plant, Medaska, Packard, Piper, and Branca.[2] They spoke with Marcucci who handed out authorization cards to them all and each of them signed a card and returned it at that time to Marcucci.

Although acknowledging the existence of these signed cards and others to be discussed infra, Respondent attacks the validity of these cards on the ground that they were signed as "election only" cards. Marcucci testified that he informed the employees that the Union "wanted the cards so that we could prove to the company that we did represent a majority of the employees. We had intentions of demanding recognition." He also testified that he informed the employees that the first purpose of the card was to use them to seek recognition from Respondent and following a rejection of recognition the Union would use the cards to petition the Labor Board for an election. Evers testified that Marcucci informed them that the purpose of the card was to authorize the Union to represent them and explained the election procedures before the Board. On cross-examination, Medaska, who testified that she had read the authorization card, testified that Marcucci said that after the cards were signed a petition would be filed and a secret-ballot election would be held. In answer to a question from me, she testified that she was informed that the signing of the cards "showed that the majority of us in the office did want the union to represent us, and that this would bring about an election, and a final decision." On redirect, in answer to the question: "Did he indicate to you under what circumstances an election might be held?" She answered: "If the Company would not agree to just the cards." Plant testified as follows: "Mr. Marcucci explained to us that through the signing of the cards we would be authorizing the union to represent us, and using those cards they would have to go and make a demand for recognition. But if that didn't work, then we would have to go on to an election." Piper testified as follows: "He said that this would authorize the union to go into the office to find out—to let them know that the girls wanted a union. This would authorize him to send someone in to petition the company to get the union in, and if it got to the point where they would not accept the petition or the request, or whatever it's called, that it would go into an election so many days after this particular presentation." Packard testified that Marcucci told them that by signing the cards the employees would give the Union the authority to represent them in trying to get a union into the office, that if a majority of the employees signed the cards he would request that Cimini recognize the Union, but in all likelihood Cimini would not agree to that, and they would then go to an election. Edwards testified that Marcucci said that signing the cards showed that the employees wanted the Union to represent them:

> A. When he gave the cards to us he said that we needed a majority of the girls to sign the cards if we wanted the union to represent us, that if we got a majority it could go into an election.
> Q. That if you got a majority it could go into an election; is that correct?
> A. Yes, if the company didn't want it, if they were going to fight it, that if they didn't accept the union after the cards were shown to them, that it could go possibly into an election.

Before the conclusion of the meeting the employees requested some additional cards from Marcucci to give to some of the employees who did not attend the meeting; Evers and Medaska took cards with them. On the next day, during working hours in the office, Evers gave authorization cards to Rinaldo and Sedicavage; they read the cards and returned them to Evers, who returned the cards to Marcucci at a luncheon meeting the Union held that day with the employees. Both Sedicavage and Rinaldo were present at the meeting and Marcucci showed them their signed authorization cards and asked them if they had signed them and they said they had.

On the same day, also during working hours in the office, Medaska handed authorization cards to Kelly and Salink; she explained to them that the purpose of the cards was to get the Union to represent them and they would probably have to go to an election if the Company would not accept the cards. She also told them to read the cards and return them to her. Kelly and Salink took the cards into the back room of the office and returned them signed to Medaska later in the day. Medaska then gave these cards to Evers who returned them to Marcucci about 5 p.m. that same day. That evening, Marcucci called Kelly and Salink at home, told them that he had received their signed authorization cards, and asked them if they had signed the cards and they said that they had.

Gerard began her employ with Respondent on November 19. Medaska gave her an authorization card during a break and told her it was for the purpose of having the Union represent them. Gerard read the card, signed it, and returned it to Medaska who then gave it to Evers. At a meeting the Union held with the employees on November 21, Evers gave the card to Marcucci; Gerard was present at this meeting and Marcucci showed her the card and asked her whether she had signed it and she said that she had.

In Cumberland Shoe Corporation, 144 NLRB 1268 (1963), the Board stated that unambiguous cards or "single purpose cards" which state that the purpose of the card is to authorize the union to represent them for collective bargaining, and do not state that the purpose is to seek an election, will be counted unless it is proven that the employee was told that the card was to be used solely for the purpose of obtaining an election. This approach was approved by the Supreme Court for "single purpose cards" in N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575, 606 (1969) whence it stated that "employees should be bound by the clear language of what they sign unless that language is deliberately and clearly cancelled by a union adherent with words calculated to direct the signer to disregard and forget the language above his signature."

[2] Upon noticing that Branca set forth "accounts payable supervisor" as her position on the authorization card she signed, Marcucci had her speak to the Union's attorney and when he was satisfied that she was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act, he informed her not to come to the meetings between the Union and the employees and not to take an active part in the Union's organizational activities at Respondent. Branca did not solicit any union cards from employees.

The authorization cards herein refer only to union representation and are therefore "single purpose cards." Although the testimony of the card signers and solicitors was not as exact as a purist in labor law would desire, it is clear that the employees were told that the purpose of the card was to designate the Union to represent them and that there would be an election only if Respondent refused to voluntarily recognize the Union on the basis of these cards. The cards were therefore a valid designation of the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

On the basis of these cards the Union was designated as the collective- bargaining representative of 10 out of the 12 employees in the unit as of November 16; on November 21, when Gerard signed her card, the Union had 11 designations out of 13 unit employees. Therefore, during this period, the Union was clearly designated as the collective-bargaining representative of a majority of the employees in appropriate unit—Respondent's office employees.

VI. THE REQUEST FOR RECOGNITION

On November 16, Michael Parente, the Union's business agent, went to Respondent's office. He met Cimini, informed him that the Union represented a majority of the employees and wanted to be recognized as their bargaining agent. He also handed Cimini a letter from the Union to Respondent, entitled "Demand For Recognition" dated that day, stating:

> Dear Sir:
> This is to advise you that a majority of your employees in an appropriate unit of clerical employees located at Progressive Supermarkets, 1279 Route 46, Parsippany, New Jersey, have designated Retail Store Employees Union, Local 1262 as their exclusive representative for the purpose of collective bargaining. The bargaining unit consists of all regular full-time and part-time employees except supervisors and confidentials, as defined in the National Labor Relations Act of 1947, as amended. We accordingly demand recognition in behalf of such employees.
> We offer to prove our majority status by submitting signed authorization cards to be checked against your payroll by a mutually selected impartial person. It is the desire of this union to institute negotiations with you immediately to work out an agreement on a contract which will set forth wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment. No other person or organization now represents a majority of these employees and you are hereby cautioned against entering into any contract or negotiating with any person or organization presuming to act as agent for, or in behalf of, any such employees.

Cimini told Parente that he did not have the authority to recognize the Union, that Gold would have to do that, but that Gold was not in the office. Cimini requested to see the authorization cards, but Parente declined the request. Parente left without making an appointment to see Gold.

At the same time, Marcucci was waiting at the Board's office in Newark, petition in hand. Based upon arrangements previously made, Parente called the Union's office and left a message at the switchboard that the Union's demand for recognition had been denied. Marcucci then called the Union's office, was informed of Parente's message and filed a petition with the Board covering the instant unit. On the same day, the Union sent a telegram to Respondent, to the attention of Cimini, demanding recognition in the unit involved herein. The telegram states that the Union was prepared to demonstrate its majority status and that a petition had been filed that day. The telegram also requests an immediate response from Respondent. There was no response to the telegram until the parties entered into the consent election agreement on December 7.[3]

I find that the Union's actions on November 16 constitute a valid request for recognition. Although Cimini was, in all probability, not the proper person from whom to demand recognition, he was, admittedly, an agent of Respondent and Parente left with him the Union's demand for recognition. Even if that were not a sufficient request (and I find that it was) the Union's telegram to Respondent certainly was sufficient.

VII. THE CAMPAIGN

Between December 7 and January, Respondent sent four letters to its employees; in addition, Cimini made one speech and Gold made two speeches to Respondent's employees, in addition to speaking to a number of employees individually. As the General Counsel alleges that the speeches and meetings with the employees, combined with the contents of the letters, constitute the unfair labor practices and objectionable conduct herein (together with the termination of Medaska) it is necessary to set forth the letters verbatim. The letters are dated December 13, December 21, December 28, and January 7, were all prepared by Respondent's counsel and retyped on Respondent's stationery, were signed by Cimini, and end with a "Yes" and a "No" box, with an X in the "NO" box.

A. The Letters

To Our Employees:

[3] At the election conducted on January 10, there were five votes for the Union and six votes against. One ballot (that of Medaska) was challenged, but was not determinative.

As you know, on Thursday, January 10, 1980, the National Labor Relations Board will hold a secret ballot election among the Company's office employees. The purpose of this election is to determine whether or not you want to be represented by Retail Clerks Local 1262.

In a very real sense, you will be deciding whether you want to turn over your most important affairs to union officials about whom you know very little and who represent primarily store employees. I feel sure you want to make this vital decision based on the facts and not campaign talk or worthless promises. The Company is sincerely convinced that a union would not be in your best interests, and during the next few weeks we intend to submit to you facts clearly showing the soundness of this position.

The following answers to questions often asked by employees have been prepared to provide accurate information on which you can make a sound decision as to whether or not you want a union to act and speak for you. We want to be sure that you are not misled by any false claims or empty promises from union representatives. It is only right and fair that you should know the truth on the whole matter before you make up your mind.

1. Q. Will I lose my job in the event the union is rejected and I may have signed a union authorization card or was active in behalf of the union?

A. Positively not! The Company will not penalize, punish or discriminate against employees because they signed union cards. No matter how unwise we think it is that you may have signed a card, no employee will suffer at the hands of the Company because of his union activity. And if anyone has told you anything contrary to this—whether he be a union organizer or a fellow employee working for the union—he has told you something that is absolutely untrue.

2. Q. If I vote against the union, will I lose my job in the event the union wins the election?

A. Definitely not. Neither the law nor the Company will permit or tolerate discrimination among employees.

3. Q. Will those who vote for the union get special advantages if the union should win the election?

A. No. In the first place the election is held in secret and how an individual votes is unknown by the Company or the union. Secondly, following the election employees will be treated alike. The Company will not permit any discrimination whatever. Under no circumstances will union members get any special advantage over non-members.

4. Q. Do I have to vote for the union if I have signed a union authorization card or paid money to the union for dues or initial fees?

A. Certainly not. It doesn't make any difference whether you have signed a union card or attended union meetings. The election will be your opportunity to vote in freedom and by secret ballot. No matter what commitment you may have made, verbally or in writing, to any union representative or to any fellow employee, no matter what you may have done or said in advance of the election, you are entirely free to vote as you please.

5. Q. Can the union guarantee me an increase in wages or any other benefit?

A. No. Only the Company can give you more money. It is the Company that furnishes your job and your paycheck—not a union. A union will never furnish you a day's work or a cent of pay.

6. Q. If the union wins the election, will the law compel the Company to reach an agreement with the union?

A. Absolutely not! The Company does not have to agree to a single thing the union proposes so long as we bargain in good faith. The law itself provides that bargaining in good faith does not require the Company to agree to any union demands or to make any concessions to the union. Thus, we do not have to sign any contract which we don't believe to be in the Company's best interest. There is no law that forces us to agree with the views and demands of the union.

7. Q. If the union wins the election, will we automatically get the things the union has been promising, such as the retail clerks store contract?

A. No. Even if the union wins an NLRB election, nothing happens automatically. The union could ask for anything, but as long as we bargain in good faith, the Company does not have to give in to any demand which we believe would not be good business practice or might be harmful to the Company or its employees. Thus, there is no way for the union to guarantee promises that they may have made. Ask yourself if you can guarantee to spend someone else's money.

8. Q. If the union wins the election, will we be called out on strike?

A. The only way that the union can try to force the Company to agree to what the union has been promising is to call you out on strike. Promises are cheap, but it is something else for the union to fulfill those promises. There is only one sure way to avoid the possibility of strikes and that is not to have a union.

9. Q. If the union calls us out on strike, will we get paid while the strike is going on?

A. No! If you strike, you lose your pay. The Company is not required to pay you while you are on strike. Under New Jersey law, strikers are not entitled to unemployment compensation. Moreover, your Company-paid insurance benefits might also be stopped in the event you do go out on strike. The union might give you a handout, or pay you some limited benefits, but you also ought to know you can't even get unemployment benefits while you are striking. A good question to ask yourself here is who will pay your bills if you are walking in a picket line.

10. Q. If the union calls a strike and I go out on strike, can I lose my job?

A. Yes! Under the law, if the union calls a strike to try to force the Company to agree to the union's economic demands, the Company is free to permanently replace the strikers. This means that if you are permanently replaced in such a strike, the law does not force the Company to rehire you immediately after the strike is over. You might end up on a preferential hiring list, having to wait weeks or months for a vacancy to occur.

11. Q. Will I lose my right to discuss on my own behalf with Company officials about my wages, hours and working conditions if the union is voted in?

A. Yes. If the union were to win the election, all the employees, even those who vote against the union, will absolutely lose their right to discuss these subjects individually with management. None of them will be able any longer to come to me or their supervisors and discuss privately their own personal cases regarding wages, hours and working conditions.

12. Q. If the union wins, who will be the union shop stewards and committeemen who will handle the affairs of everybody else?

A. Look around you and see who is active in pushing this union. In all probability, there is your answer.

They will be running things for you. They will be the ones working with the union negotiators and officers in bargaining with the Company over your pay, your working hours, and your employment benefits. They will be the ones handling your grievances.

Ask yourself this question: Are they people whom you consider to be capable of handling your problems and into these hands you are now ready to trust your affairs for the future?

13. Q. Does it cost money to belong to a union?

A. Yes! It could cost quite a bit, about $150.00 a year. Unions collect monthly dues, and besides that, there could be other charges such as initiation fees and assessments. Unions can also fine members who violate union rules. A union must have income to keep going and to pay its officers and organizers, and its biggest source of income is dues. This explains its interest in YOU—not as an individual but as a dues payer!

14. Q. What if we vote for the union just to try it out; can't we get rid of it if we don't like it?

A. Getting rid of a union once it is in, would be a hard job. Once a union gets in, it normally remains your bargaining agent until a new election is held. In order to get an election, 30% of the employees would have to sign a petition or some other document. Voting a union in is easy. But when you find you made a mistake, it's a pretty hard job to get out of it. You're best off not getting into it in the first place.

15. Q. Why is the Company opposed to a union?

A. The Company feels that a union will only cause dissension among our employees and bitterness between those who are for or against the union. It feels that a union will try to generate trouble between the management and its employees in order to justify its own existence.

We feel that we are able to work out our problems with our employees on a personal basis, without the interference of outsiders. The Company does not feel that its employees have to pay their good money to a union to get the best the company can give to its employees. And we think that we have done pretty well by our employees, both in salary rates and in fringe benefits.It is my sincere hope that these facts will be helpful to you in making the important decision you will have an opportunity to make on January 10. I would recommend that you think seriously about them and if further questions occur to you, please feel free to ask me about them.

To Our Employees:

By now, you have had an opportunity to reflect on this union election that's going to be held here on January 10, 1980.

We have tried to explain to you that even if the union were to win the election, you would not automatically get any increases in your salary or benefits. All a union wins, even if it wins an election, is the right to sit down and negotiate with the Company about wages and benefits.

But negotiation does not necessarily mean agreement. The law provides quite clearly that the obligation to bargain does not require the Company to agree to any union proposal. The enclosed leaflet, which is excerpted from an official National Labor Relations Board publication, explains what this bargaining obligation means. What it does not mean is that either party must agree to anything it feels is not in its best interests.

What happens if the Company and the union negotiate but can't reach agreement? The only weapon the union would have would be to pull you out on strike. Remember, strikers don't get paid and they are not eligible, under New Jersey law, for unemployment compensation. Moreover, the Company would not have to pay insurance premiums for employees who are out on strike.

Finally, employees who strike for more money or higher benefits are called "economic strikers" and are subject to being permanently replaced by other employees. Remember, just because the union calls a strike, it doesn't mean that everybody has to go out on strike and it doesn't mean that the Company has to stop its operations. So if an employee goes out on strike and gets permanently replaced, when the strike ends she does not get her job back right away but has to wait until a vacancy occurs. That could take weeks or even months. The first paragraph of the enclosed leaflet gives you the official word from the Labor Board on that subject.

You don't need a union to get the very best this Company has to offer. Vote for yourselves on January 10; vote NO.

To Our Employees:

I hope that none of you are being fooled into believing that getting a union in here is a guarantee of anything at all, except perhaps lots of trouble for all of us.

There's something that you all ought to know about; and it deals with how this union treats its own office employees. Some years ago, back in 1970, the Union's office employees organized, went to a Labor Board election and won. The Union was forced to sit down and bargain with the Office Employees Union that represented its own office employees.

You might think that Local 1262 would have some understanding for the needs and wants of its own office employees. You might think that—but you'd be dead wrong. What Local 1262 did was to bargain the Office Employees Union into the ground, get the employees out on strike, and then permanently replaced all the strikers. The strike lasted for two months, and only one striker ever got her job back. That's how this union handled negotiations with the union of its own office employees.

What makes you think that things will be any different here? This union has a track record of not treating office employees fairly. Moreover, we know how to negotiate hard, just like the union does. And we know about rights regarding the replacement of economic strikers.

Ask the union how it treats its own office employees. Ask the union if it's paying its own employees the same wages that the store employees get. It doesn't. The Union's own office employees earn about the same as you do, and they don't get cost-of-living increases. There is no set time for increases, while you get reviewed twice a year.

Your salary and benefit package is every bit as good as what the Union pays, and probably a lot better. You don't need a union to get the best this Company has to offer.

Vote for yourselves on January 10. Vote NO.

To Our Employees:

The Labor Board election will be held on Thursday, January 10, 1980 in the vacant office across the hall. The polls will be open from 3:00 p.m. to 3:30 p.m. and you may vote at anytime during that 30 minute period.

All of the office personnel, except for the two supervisors, are eligible to vote. This election will be decided by a majority of those who actually vote. If you don't vote, your future could be decided by someone else.

Here are a few things you should keep in mind before you vote:

1. Voting Procedure. The ballot you will receive will have two spaces, the one on the left marked "Yes" and the one on the right marked "NO." If you do not want the union, you should put an "X" in the "NO" space. Do not sign your ballot; if you do, your vote will not count.

2. Secrecy of the ballot. The election will be conducted by an agent of the U.S. Government, who will insure that the election is conducted by secret ballot. No one will ever know how you vote.

3. Freedom of choice. This is your election and your choice to make. You owe it to yourself and your family to vote strictly on the basis of FACTS, and not on the basis of some vague union promises. You are free to vote as you wish regardless of what you may have said and done in the past. Even if you signed a union card, you are 100% free to vote NO in the election. If anyone has told you that you are committed to vote for the union, he is telling you a lie. You are free to vote as your conscience dictates.

4. Union promises. Don't be misled by empty union promises. The union cannot guarantee you a single thing. Even if the union were to win the election, the Company's only obligation would be to bargain with the union. But as we have pointed out to you, the law does not require the Company to agree to any union demands or to make any concessions to the union. Nor can the union guarantee you job security. All a union can bring you is job insecurity in the form of a strike.

5. The cost of a union. The only thing that a union victory will guarantee is that you will have to pay union dues of $150.00 or more a year. Having a union would also subject you to union discipline, and the union could fine you for "conduct unbecoming a union member," for crossing a picket line, or for some other silly charge.

6. What does joining a union mean? The U.S. Supreme Court put it this way: Joining a union "extinguishes the individual employee's power to order his own relations with his employer and creates a power vested in the chosen representative to act in the interests of all employees." What this means is that you would lose your individual rights, and in return some stranger would do your talking—and your thinking for you.

Be sure to vote. Some of you have said that you want no part of the union and that you don't want to vote. That's wrong. If you don't want the union but don't vote, you're really helping the union get in here. You've got to cast your ballot while the polls are open. Otherwise, you'll be letting someone else decide your future.

Before you vote, remember all the benefits you now enjoy, benefits that not only exceed what other office employees in this area get but are also as good as, if not better than, what the store employees get. These benefits include 11 paid holidays a year; an excellent paid vacation schedule; 12 days of sick leave per year; an excellent medical/hospitalization/major medical policy; funeral leave; a pension plan; competitive salaries with regular reviews and regular increases; a comfortable place to work; and steady work with no layoffs.

You didn't need a union to get these benefits, and you don't need a union to keep them and to improve upon them.

I hope that you'll give a lot of thought to this important election, and that you'll vote NO on January 10.

B. The Speeches

All the speeches were made to all the employees present on that particular day. The first speech was made by Cimini on December 20 in the office. The prepared speech that Cimini had in his hand on this occasion, is as follows:

> I'm sure all of you know what this meeting is all about. For reasons that I'm only now becoming aware of, a number of you have gone to the union and have asked for union representation. As you know, there's going to be an election here on Thursday, January 10, 1980, at which all of the people in the office, with the exception of two supervisors, will be able to vote by secret ballot about whether or not you want a union to be your exclusive bargaining representative.
> The Company's position in all of this is pretty clear, and I want to make sure that all of you understand it. We do not think that you need a union to get the very best that this Company has to offer, and we hope that you will vote No in the election on January 10.
> We think that a union would be a mistake, both for the Company and for you. Between now and January 10, we intend to explain our position to you and we hope that you will agree with us, or that at least a majority of you will agree with us, that you don't need a union here.
> You may be asking yourselves why the Company is opposed to a union here in the office when it has the very same union representing its employees in its store in Northern New Jersey. Well, the reason is pretty simple. We know what having a union means. It means a lot of problems, both for the employees and for the Company. We're stuck with it in the stores, and there's nothing we can really do about it so we have learned to live with it. But the stores are remote from the office. Mr. Gold and I aren't out there on a regular basis, and we don't know the people and we can't handle their problems directly. But the office is another situation entirely. Mr. Gold and I are here all the time. There's a small number of people involved, a total of about 15. We see each other everyday, and if any of you have any problems, you are free to bring them to us right away, directly without interference by anyone else. You don't need a union to do your talking for you as far as your relationship with us is concerned. That makes it a bit different from the situation in the stores. In the stores, there are a number of levels of management between Mr. Gold and the employees. That doesn't hold true here in the office.
> What I am saying is, if you have any problems you can bring them directly to us, without having to pay a union $10 or $12 a month in dues to do your talking for you. Unions tend to be devisive, and they cause problems simply to justify their existence. We don't need that kind of aggravation here in the office, not you and not me. I had always liked to think that we could resolve our problems together. I really don't know what makes you think that you need an outside party to do that for you now.
> There is, however, one thing that I have heard that distresses me because it demonstrates that the union is trying to sell you a bill of goods. I understand that the union has been telling you that if it wins an election here, the employees in the office will get the store rates of pay. Frankly, I don't blame employees for wanting to make more money. That's the American way. But I hope that none of you will be fooled into believing that if the union gets in here, you will automatically get what the food employees are getting in the stores.
> First of all, there is nothing automatic about anything even if the union wins an election. If the union were to win the election, all it would win would be the right to sit down and negotiate with us about your wages and working conditions. That's all we would have to do. We would have to bargain with the union in good faith. The union would be free to make certain demands, and we would be free to make demands of our own. And if we could not reach agreement, all the union could do would be to call you out on strike in an effort to try to force us to agree to its demands. I'll be talking more about these bargaining obligations and the business of strikes at another meeting.
> The most important thing I would like to get across to you right now is that there is a major distinction between the work done by the food employees in the stores and the work done by nonfood employees in the stores and by you people here in the office. The food employees work long hours, standing on their feet, dealing face to face with customers, handling cash, and generally performing work that is harder physically than the work that you do here in the office. I don't think that there's any reason in the world why you should expect to be paid more than, or even as much as, the food employees in the stores. Your work is a great deal easier from a physical standpoint. You sit in a nice office, you perform work at > your own pace, you take breaks on a regular basis and whenever you want to, you work Monday through Friday only, and day shift hours only, and you generally have an easier time of it. Now, if any of you are really interested in doing store work, I'll be glad to do my best to get you a job in one of the stores. But you can't expect to get paid the very same thing in an office that the food employees get in the stores.

> The union recognizes this. The union contracts that we have covering our store here in Northern New Jersey, our contract with Retail Clerks Local 1262, has separate rates for full time food employees and for full time non-food employees. These non-food employees earn considerably less than the food employees, and they earn considerably less than you do. For example, as of April 8, 1979 and continuing until there is a raise of 20 cents an hour on April 6, 1980, a non-food employee after six months will be earning $3.35 an hour, going up to a high of $4.10 an hour after two years of employment. That rate is significantly lower than the rates of pay you now enjoy. So don't kid yourselves into believing that the union is going to press for a food rate for office people, or that if they do press for it, that we will ever agree to it. That's just not the way it works.
> The union itself recognizes this. The Retail Clerks Union, including Local 1262, have a contract with Two Guys, and it provides for wage rates that are just a little bit less than you people are now earning. Those are non-food rates, and the union realizes that rates of that nature are lower than the food rates in the supermarkets.
> I hope that none of you will be fooled into believing that if you vote the union in here, you will automatically get the food store food rates. That's just not in the cards. The union might be promising it to you, and if it is it's not telling you the truth. I can tell you here and now, however, that even if the union were to try to get that for you, we certainly would not agree to it. Then, the only weapon the union would have to try to force us to give in would be to call you out on strike. I know that none of you like that idea, and I know that I certainly don't either. But that's what it would take, a long strike, if the union were to make the demand for food employee rates in this office.
> You don't need that kind of trouble, and neither does the Company. We have a pretty good organization here, and we do pretty well by you. Your fringe benefits are every bit as good as the fringes in the stores, and your salaries are every bit as good as the salaries for other office employees in this area. We compete pretty well in that regard, and we shall continue to do so.
> Well, I've talked on a bit longer than I had intended to, now, if any of you have any questions, I'll be glad to answer them for you.

Cimini first testified that "I basically read it. I read the whole thing." He then testified," I would say ninety nine percent of the speech I read." After looking over the speech, he testified that he said everything that was in the speech and said nothing that was not in the speech. Later, in answer to a question from me as to whether he said anything that was not in the prepared speech, he testified: "Maybe one or two words as I took my eyes off the paper, that might have been changed." Cimini also testified that he never said that Respondent would take whatever steps it had to in order to keep the Union out.

Evers testified that Cimini said that the Union was trying to get into the office, and that the employees had great benefits and good salaries and that Respondent was going to do everything it could to keep the Union out. Plant testified that Cimini did not read from the speech, but referred to it several times and elaborated on what it said. She also testified that Cimini said that the employees were all aware that the Union had made a demand for recognition, but that he could not understand why the employees needed a union to get the best that Respondent would have to offer. He then discussed the benefits they were receiving and how good they were and concluded by saying that Respondent would do anything it could to keep the Union out. Gerard testified that Cimini referred to the speech that he had in his hand and said that there was going to be a secret-ballot election coming up and that he did not think the employees needed a union to get the best that Respondent had to offer and he could not understand why the employees wanted a union and that the employees should have come to speak to him about it. Cimini then discussed the fact that Respondent's store employees are represented by unions, including the Union, but since he and Gold were always available to the office employees they did not need a union to do their talking for them. He went on to say that if the Union won the election all it would win was the right to sit down and negotiate and the company would be required to bargain in good faith and if the parties could not reach an agreement all the Union could do would be to call a strike. He also said that Respondent would do whatever they had to do to keep the union out. He then informed the employees of the difference between the kind of work performed by Respondent's store employees and its office employees and that the office employees could not expect the same rate of work as that received by its store employees. He informed the employees that their fringe benefits were as good as those received by Respondent's store employees and that their salaries were as good as that of other offices employees in the area.

Packard testified that Cimini told the employees that they had good benefits and that he did not think they needed a union; if the Union did come in, everything would be negotiable. She testified that Cimini never said that Respondent would do anything it had to keep the Union out. Edwards testified that Cimini was holding papers in his hand reading from them; he informed them of the upcoming election and that Respondent did not think that they needed a union to get the best that Respondent had to offer; that the Union would be a mistake for the employees and Respondent. He said that the Union has represented its store employees, but he and Gold are not in the stores, but in the office and able to deal directly with the office employees and that they did not need a union to do their talking for them. He said that they did not need to pay dues when you can discuss any problems directly with Respondent. He then said that even if the Union won the election, the office employees would not get the store rates of pay, that all the Union would win would be the right to negotiate with Respondent. He informed them that their fringe benefits were as good as that of the store employees. Edwards testified on direct examination that Cimini said that Respondent would do anything to keep the Union out. During a point-by-point questioning on cross-examination about Cimini's speech, she did not again refer to this statement.

Gold made his first speech on January 4. He testified that on this occasion, and for his second speech on January 9, he had with him the speech that was prepared for him by Respondent's counsel. Gold testified in the following manner of the use he made of the prepared text in both of these speeches:

> Q. How did you use them?
> A. I read them to a great degree. I used some of my own words, but I followed the content meaning of the speeches completely.
> Q. Did you vary the content of the speeches at all?
>
> A. Perhaps in one instance when I mentioned that there could be a time clock.
> Q. All right, but except for time clocks you followed the speeches, is that correct?
> A. That is right.

In answer to questions from the General Counsel, Gold testified as follows:

> Q. And while you followed the text fairly closely, you also deviated from the speech somewhat, did you not?
> A. Not to any great extent.
> Q. But you did say things that were not in these speeches themself?
>
> A. A word here and a word there.
> Q. Are you saying that you read right from the text?
> A. No.
> Q. How did you give the speech then? In what fashion? If you didn't read from the text?
> A. I just used my own language.

Gold testified that preceding these speeches he had learned that the Union had promised the employees that their wages would be increased to the level of Respondent's store employees and that whatever benefits they had could only increase in negotiations. The prepared text that Gold had in his hand for his first speech on January 4 is as follows:

> It's only a week now until the Labor election on January 10. I'm sure that many of you are getting tired of hearing from the Company, and I'm sure you are hearing from the Union as well, about how you should vote in this election. Well, that's the way things go in the political arena, and a Labor Board election is no less political than an election for presidents, for congressmen, or for mayor.
> In fact, a Labor Board election is probably a bit more important to each of you than is a political election, because the Labor Board election will have a very direct, immediate and real impact upon your working lives. What I mean is, if the Union gets in here, your working lives are going to be very radically affected. And when I talk about being "radically affected," I don't mean affected for the good, but for the bad. I really believe that if you vote a union in here, you'll be hurting the Company but, most importantly, you'll be hurting yourselves.
> Why do I say this? As I have said before, we get along with Local 1262 in our store, and I don't thing (sic) it is a bad union for the store employees. But I think it would (sic) an unmitigated disaster for you here in the office.
> After all, what is it that you really hope to gain by getting a union in here? It would be one thing if you were badly treated on a personal basis here at the office. I could understand it if I or anyone else in the management of this Company treated you with disrespect, fired people without reason, or generally did bad things to you. But that's not the case. We do our level best to treat you fairly and with the respect and dignity to which you are entitled. You don't need a union to get that. and I don't think that any of you should have any claim that we have not treated you fairly and with respect. If any of you think differently, I would really like to hear about it.
> It would be another thing if your fringe benefits were bad. But that's not the case. Your fringe benefit package is an outstanding one, every bit is good as to what the employees have in the store and certainly better than what the union itself provides to its office employees. You've got 11 holidays a year, 8 of them fixed holidays and 3 personal days. You've got an outstanding vacation schedule, with one-week vacation after six months, two weeks after one year, and three weeks after five years. In fact, your vacation schedule is more favorable than what the employees in the store have. You've got funeral leave, whenever anyone is unfortunate enough to need it. You've got twelve days a year of sick leave, more than they have in the stores. You've got medical, hospitalization and major medical insurance, including dental and optical insurance. The Company pays for that for each of you. You've got an outstanding pension plan, and you've got life insurance, paid for by the Company. That fringe benefit package is every bit as good as you would hope to get, and is a lot better than what the union itself has for its own employees in this office. I'll talk a little bit more about that later.
> As far as your wages are concerned, your salary rates are in line with what other people pay for office personnel in this area, and perhaps a little > better. Employees start here at $140 a week, and get a $10 a week increase after 90 days. Thereafter, all of you are reviewed twice a year, and increases are given as deserved. I don't think anyone can honestly say that she is being unfairly treated or underpaid for the work she is doing. If anyone thinks that, I would certainly like to hear it.

> Now here is what it (sic) my understanding that the union is offering. The union appears to be promising—or at least some of you think that the union is promising—that if the union wins the election you will automatically get the store rate of pay. Let me disabuse you of that right now. There is no way in the world that we are going to pay a store rate for office work. In fact, under the union contract for the stores, there is a non-food rate, which is a lot less than what you are now earning. As I told you before, there's no way that we are going to pay a store rate for office personnel. The union doesn't do that for its office employees, and we certainly won't either.
> Now let's suppose the union were to get in here and we would have to negotiate with it. Remember now, all the union wins if it wins an election is the right to sit down and negotiate with the Company about your wages and working conditions. In that letter I sent to you, I enclosed a copy of this leaflet [at this point, hold up a copy of the "Get the Real Facts" leaflet]. This leaflet is excerpted from this pamphlet [at this point, hold up a copy of the "Guide to Law and Procedure" pamphlet]. This pamphlet is an official publication of the National Labor Relations Board, and it explains what collective bargaining means. It means that while the parties have to confer in good faith, the bargaining obligation "does not, however, compel either party to agree to a proposal by the other, nor does it require either party to make a concession to the other."
> This means that if we have to negotiate with the union, we would do so but we would be under no obligation to agree to anything that we felt was not in your best interests or in the Company's best interests. I can assure you that we know how to protect our interests. The union can make all sorts of demands, and we would be entirely free to reject them. Incidently, we would be entirely free to make demands of our own, to trade off for certain other things the union would want by getting the union to concede away certain of the things that you now have. For example, if the union wanted a union-shop clause, which would mean that everyone would have to join the union and pay dues in order to keep her job here, we might be willing to give that in return, for example, for a reduction of your sick leave. Those kinds of trade-offs are common in collective bargaining, as I'm sure that most of you know.
> Well, let's suppose we had to negotiate with the union and we could not reach an agreement. What would happen then? Well, the only weapon the union would have would be to call you up on strike. I know that none of you like to hear that, but you might as well hear it now, and from me, because I'm sure that the union isn't talking about strikes with you. The only economic weapon a union has, to try to force an employer to give in to the union's demands, is to call the employees out on strike. Remember, strikers don't get paid, and they are not eligible for unemployment compensation benefits. Moreover, the Company is under no obligation to pay insurance premiums for strikers, so if employees go off on strike they might find that they might have to pay their own medical insurance premiums in order to maintain their coverage.
> But there is a more important problem with economic strikers. An economic striker is an employee who goes out on strike for higher wages and more benefits. The Company is free to replace economic strikers permanently, and to continue to operate its business during the strike. That's what this leaflet and this pamphlet say. If employees go out on strike and they are permanently replaced, they don't get their jobs back when the strike ends, but they have to wait until a vacancy occurs.
> This is no idle statement. Ask Retail Clerks Local 1262 about economic strikers, because that union knows first-hand how to replace strikers. Back in 1970, the Office Workers Union won an election among the employees of Local 1262's office. The union was certified and negotiated with Local 1262 but couldn't reach an agreement. So the Office Workers Union called a strike against Local 1262. That strike lasted for two months, from August to October, 1970. By the time the strike had ended, the union had replaced every one of the strikers. Out of the goodness of its heart, the union took back only one of the employees that went on strike; all of the others lost their jobs.
> So you can ask the union what it means to be permanently replaced, because Local 1262 really knows how to do it. And I can assure you that this company knows how to do it as well.
> I really don't like to have to say such things to you, but I think it is important that you understand what it is you might be getting yourself into if you vote this union in on January 10. All it would mean would be trouble, for the Company and for you.
> As I have said before, you don't need a union here to get the very best this Company has to offer. We have always been able to deal with each other, without outside interference, in the past and I am sure that we can continue to do so in the future. Now, if you have any questions, I would be glad to anwer them for you.

Evers testified that Gold did not read from the speech he was holding; once in a while he referred to it, but he spoke mostly without reading from the speech. She testified that Gold began by telling the employees that their salaries were comparable to those of other office employees in the area; that they weren't as good as the store employees received, but they didn't do the same kind of work as store employees. She also testified that Gold said that some of the employees were going around the office discussing the Union and the employees knew who they were. She testified that Gold said that if the Union won the election he would have to negotiate with the Union and everything would be negotiable; you do not start from where you are now. All the employees' benefits would be frozen and the employees would have nothing and would have to start at ground zero and renegotiate everything; for example, that if they had $5,000 worth of dental bills[4] they better pay for it themselves because everything would be frozen and they would not be able to use their benefits.[5] According to Evers' testimony, Gold then told the employees that Respondent's policy of granting wage increases in January would be frozen until everything was cleared up with the Union. Evers also testified that Gold said that if the employees went on strike, Respondent might not rehire them; that the Union had a strike of its employees and very few of them were rehired by the Union; he said that none of the other offices were unionized and that he was not going to be number one; that he can be very hard and he would do everything he could and would use every means to keep out the Union.

Piper testified that Gold seemed to be using the speech he was holding "as a guideline." She testified that he spoke about the upcoming election and that although the Union represents some of Respondent's store employees, he did not think it would be a good idea for them to represent the office employees; he also told them that if the Union won the election Respondent would be obligated to negotiate with the Union; that the Union would be free to make demands and Respondent would also be free to make demands and that he would be tough; everything would have to be negotiated from ground zero. She further testified that he said that if the Union and Respondent could not reach an agreement there was a possibility that the Union would call a strike and that Respondent could hire employees to replace the strikers, and if that occurred, the strikers might not get their jobs back immediately, but might have to wait until a vacancy occurred; he then mentioned the strike by the Union's employees and said that the Union knows how to replace strikers.

Gerard testified that Gold began by speaking about the election and said that the Union represented some of Respondent's store employees and that it was a pretty good union in the stores, but he did not think it was good for the office employees. He spoke about their wages and other benefits and compared them to wages and benefits paid to Respondent's store employees. He said that the Union appeared to be promising that if it won the election the employees would automatically receive the stores rate of pay[6] but there was no way that Respondent would do that. Gerard also testified that Gold said if the Union won the election, Respondent would have to negotiate with the Union and everything was negotiable; the employees would not start from one step better, "they would start from ground zero, scratch, and that everything would have to be renegotiated; he also said that anyone who had incurred bills using their dental plan, would have to pay these bills on their own because these benefits would be frozen." According to Gerard's testimony, Gold then informed the employees that if the parties could not reach an agreement there was a possibility that the Union would call a strike and, if this occurred, Respondent could hire permanent replacements and, at the conclusion of the strike the striking employees would have to wait for a vacancy before being reemployed by Respondent. Gerard testified that Gold concluded by saying that the employees do not need a union in order to get the best that Respondent could offer.

Rinaldo[7] testified that Gold began by telling the employees that they had good benefits, compared them with the benefits received by Respondent's store employees, and compared the work of the store employees with that of the office employees. She testified further that he said that if the Union won the election everything would be negotiable; according to her testimony, Gold never used the term "ground zero" nor did he ever say that dental benefits or any benefits would be frozen; he discussed dental benefits, but only along with the other benefits Respondent provided its office employees. Rinaldo then testified about Gold's mention of a time clock in his speech: "There was a comparison being made about the store personnel, the different types of work that they did, the dealing with the public, the punching of the time clock . . ." "There was not one there—we don't have to punch a clock now, but with the union coming in, there could be one installed" and "one could possibly be installed."

Packard testified that Gold spoke about the benefits Respondent gave to its office employees (although she did not remember any specific discussion of dental benefits) and said that if the Union won the election all the employees' benefits would be negotiable. According to Packard's testimony, Gold never used the term "ground zero" nor did he say that the employees would lose any benefits if the Union won the election.

Shally testified that Gold discussed the benefits the employees were then receiving and that if the Union won the election, all the benefits would be negotiable. According to Shally's testimony, Gold never said that if the Union won the election the benefits would be frozen or that, if he had to negotiate, everything would start at ground zero, nor did he say that if the Union won the election the employees might lose benefits. Other than that, Shally remembered very little of either of Gold's speeches.

Cimini, who was present at Gold's speeches, testified that Gold told the employees of the benefits Respondent gave them and said that if the Union won the election everything would be negotiable; "that they weren't automatically started from what we already had"; Gold never said that benefits would be frozen and never used the term "ground zero"; in addition, according to Cimini's testimony, Gold never said anything about dental benefits being frozen, or that dental benefits would be adversely affected by the Union winning the election, only that they would negotiable.

[4] There was much testimony to the effect that Rinaldo had a lot of dental work about that time, that Respondent's benefit plan covered a large part of the expense, and that the other employees were aware of this.

[5] The employees' existing benefits with Respondent covered dental bills.

[6] Gerard testified that the Union never told her that.

[7] Rinaldo testified that the Union had informed the employees that in negotiations benefits would start from where they were and go up from there; that they were not going to lose anything.

Edwards testified that Gold had the speech in his hand and, at times, appeared to be reading from the speech, and at other times spoke without looking at it. Edwards testified that Gold began by stating that the Union represented some of Respondent's store employees, but he did not think the office employees needed a union; he then informed the employees of Respondent's fringe benefits for the office employees and said that they were good benefits and that their wages were in line with other office employees in the area. Edwards testified that Gold then said that he understood that the Union was promising that if it won the election, the employees would automatically get the rates received by Respondent's store employees, but that was not so; the office employees would not receive the same wages as the store employees because of the job differences. Edwards also testified that Gold stated that if the Union won the election he would have to negotiate with the Union over the benefits; he said that the employees should not expect the package plan they then had because bargaining would start from ground zero; he said that wasn't it nice that Respondent pays part of a $5,000 dental bill, "we don't guarantee anything that we have now, that he could be very hard and tough on the employees," and "don't expect what we have now"; Gold also said that all benefits would be negotiable. Edwards testified that Gold then said that if no agreement was reached the employees could go out on strike, but there was no guarantee that they would all get their jobs back. He also said, according to Edwards' testimony, that Respondent didn't want to be the first one to have a union in their office and that they would go to any measures to keep it out; he also told the employees that although they were due for a raise, their wages would be frozen until after the election. He concluded the speech by saying that the employees did not need a union to get the best Respondent had to offer.

Medaska, who did not attend Gold's January 9 meeting because she was terminated by Respondent later in the day on January 4, does not remember the term "ground zero" being used by Gold in his January 4 speech.

Gold testified that at this speech he discussed the employees' benefits, including dental benefits, but without any specific emphasis, but he never told the employees that they had better get their dental work done at that time because they would have to pay for it themselves if the Union won the election, nor did he ever threaten to freeze the employees benefits if the Union won the election. He testified that he informed the employees that all benefits were negotiable; he never said that benefits would be frozen or lost, and never used the phrase "ground zero." As regards the timeclocks, he testified that he informed the employees "that it was possible that if the Union won, the same as we had time clocks in the stores, it could be possible that there would be time clocks in the office." He testified that he never told the employees that wages would be frozen if the Union won the election.

The prepared text that Gold had in his hand for his second speech which took place in the empty office across the hall from Respondent's office on January 9 is as follows:

> This is the last opportunity we're going to have to get together as a group before this Labor Board election tomorrow. I would like to discuss the mechanics of the election with you, and then get into some of the issues.
> First of all, the election will be conducted here at the office, in the vacant office across the hall, between 3:00 and 3:30 in the afternoon. It will be conducted by an official of the National Labor Relations Board, out of the Labor Board's Newark, New Jersey regional office. The Labor Board official will conduct this election by secret ballot, which means that no one will ever know how you voted.
> The election is going to be decided by a majority of those who actually show up at the polls and vote. There are no proxy ballots, and there are no absentee ballots. Therefore, if you want your voice to be heard, you have to show up in person at the polls and vote between 3:00 and 3:30 p.m. on Thursday, January 10. If you don't, your entire future might well be decided by someone else.
> When you go in to vote, there will be two employees present, one serving as an observer for the Company and one serving as an observer for the Union. The purpose of these observers is simply to identify the voters. There will also be a person from the Labor Board. All you have to do is give your name to the observers, who will check your name off the list. Then, the Labor Board person will give you a ballot, which you will take into the voting booth and mark. Make an "X" in one of the boxes; do not sign your ballot or make any identifying marks on it. Then fold the ballot, come out of the voting booth, put the ballot in the ballot box and leave. That's all you have to do. The ballots will be counted just after 3:30, and we should all know the results at that time.
> Now, let's talk a little bit about what this election is all about. It seems that Progressive Supermarkets is in the vanguard of the Union's organizational efforts among office employees. What is happening is that Local 1262 has decided that it wants to expand its membership to include, not just employees in the stores, but also office employees. What it has done is to send out letters to its stewards in the stores, asking the stewards to help "talk up" the Union among the office employees of the companies that they work for. I have here a copy of just such a letter [At this point, hold up a copy of the Union's "Stewards Newsletter"]. Enclosed with this letter was this leaflet [At this point, hold up a copy of the leaflet], which is what the Union has been distributing to office employees. I don't know whether any of you have gotten one of these leaflets, but if you haven't, this is what it looks like.

It's really sort of funny, and somewhat hypocritical, for Local 1262 to be telling office workers like yourselves that it has the "strength, unity and bargaining experience" to enable it to succeed as the bargaining agent for office workers where others have failed. Why have others failed? Well, the Office and Professional Employees union failed in New Jersey among office workers because Local 1262 broke that union. You don't have to believe me; I have copies of a 1970 newspaper article all about the strike that occurred at Local 1262's headquarters. Here are copies of that article [At this point, distribute copies of the Star-Ledger article]. This article tells how the strike began in August, 1970, but it doesn't tell how the strike ended. The strike ended in October, 1970 with the office workers union giving up and offering to have the employees abandon the strike and return to work. However, Local 1262, which knows how to do things like this, had permanently replaced all the strikers. As a result, not all of the strikers got their jobs back; most of them were permanently replaced and had to wait a long time to get back to work.

What was the strike over? Well, the article says the office workers wanted more money and the Union wasn't about to give it to them, because Local 1262 felt that it was paying its employees a fair wage. The last couple of paragraphs of the article sum it up pretty well [At this point, read the last two paragraphs of the Star-Ledger article].

Now, we're in pretty much the same position that Local 1262 was in back in 1970. We think that we are treating our office employees just as fairly and just as well as we possibly can. Your fringe benefits are every bit as good as what the store employees have, and in some instances your fringes are even better. As far as your salaries are concerned, those salary rates are competitive with what other employers pay office employees in this area. I'm not going to kid any of you into saying that your salary rates are as good as the salaries for 40 hours for store employees. But your rates are a lot better than the union rates for non-food employees in the stores, and your pension is a lot better than the non-food pension that Local 1262 has for its non-food and store employees.

What I am saying to you is that Local 1262 itself recognizes that there is a distinction between food employees and non-food employees in the stores, and we agree. That distinction is equally true between store employees and office employees. Working in an office is a lot more pleasant than working in a store. In a store, employees stand on their feet, have to load and unload merchandise, have to stand at cash registers, have to work nights and weekends, and generally have a far less pleasant job life than you here in the office. That distinction in job requirements reflects itself in the rate of pay. Office employees generally earn less than blue collar store employees. I'm not looking down my nose at those store employees, by any stretch of the imagination. And if any of you are really interested in doing store work, I would certainly do my very best to accommodate any of you who would like to go out into a store. I'm sure, however, that there aren't many of you who would like to do that.

It's just a bit unfair for you to expect that you are going to get all the benefits of the store employees when you have none of the burdens of those employees.

If the union is telling you that it will get you store pay in the office, it is really misrepresenting the facts. There's no way in the world that we can afford to pay store rates in the office, and there is no way in the world that we would pay store rates in the office.

As it has been explained to you before, if the union were to get in here, all we would have to do is to sit down and negotiate in good faith with the union. We would be under no obligation to agree to any union demand; all we would have to do would be to negotiate in good faith. If we could not reach agreement—if we refused to make any concessions—like Local 1262 did in 1970, the same thing that happened there could happen here. The union would be free to call you out on strike, and we would be free to permanently replace any employee who went out on strike. Ask the union how that is done; they really know.

I don't want to spend a lot of time reviewing your fringe benefits, except to say that your fringe benefits are every bit as good as the benefits the store emoloyees get, and in some cases they are even better. For example, you start getting two weeks vacation after one year of service, while in the stores employees have to work two years before they get two weeks of vacation pay. In the stores employees get ten days of sick leave; you get 12 days. Your medical insurance program, which includes dental and optical insurance, is better than the plan that the union has. And your pension plan is every bit as good as the store employees pension plan.

I'd like to talk about that pension plan for just a minute. Local 1262 has two pension plans, one for food employees and one for non-food employees. The food employees pension plan provides $14.00 to $16.00 a month of pension for each year of credited service. The non-food employees pension plan provides $5.50 a month of pension for each year of credited service. That's one third as much as the food employees get. Remember, as far as the union is concerned, you are non-food employees. It could be that if the union were to get in here, and it tried to get a non-food contract for you, you might lose some of the benefits you now enjoy. I don't know that that would happen, but I can tell you that it's a real possibility.

You don't need a union here to get the very best this Company has to offer. You don't have to pay $12.00 or $14.00 a month in union dues in order to > work here or in order to keep your jobs here. You don't have to pay dues to a union in order to get the very best this Company has to offer.

> I hope that none of you will be fooled into making yourselves parties to the union's grandiose schemes to increase its membership. We have always treated you fairly, and we hope to be able to deal directly with you in the future and to continue to solve our problems together, without the intervention of outside parties that could bring strikes and unpleasantness here.
> Now, if any of you have any questions, I'll be glad to answer them for you.
> There's one other thing I want to mention before we end this meeting. Last week, we replaced two of the employees here. We replaced Mary Salink because we needed someone full-time for her job, and we hired someone. We also replaced Diane Medaska, who had resigned in December and had given us notice that she would be leaving the end of January. We had been looking for a replacement for Diane and we found one who could start this past Monday. So we called Diane in last Friday and told her that we were accepting her resignation as of that day. But because she had given us plenty of notice; we paid her through the end of the month. In other words, we gave her 3 weeks paid vacation. So Diane certainly wasn't hurt by what did.
> It's true that she told us last Friday that she was thinking of staying beyond the end of the month, but unfortunately she didn't tell us that until after we had hired a replacement for her, and there simply wasn't anything we could do now.
> I should tell you that the union is trying to make an issue out of this. It has gone to the Labor Board and has filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that we replaced Mary and Diane because of their union activities. That's an outright lie, and the union knows it. But they're trying to use this as a campaign tactic. We don't plan to let them get away with it, and I hope that none of you will be fooled by this union trick.
> Well, that's about all I have to say. I hope that you'll vote NO tomorrow and keep this a good place to work. Now, if any of you have a question, I'll be glad to answer it for you.

Evers testified that Gold told the employees that the salaries they received were fair and comparable for office work in the area and that even though it was less than Respondent paid its store employees, the work they perform was different; he also informed them of the strike by the Union's employees. Evers also testified that Gold said that if the Union won the election "we'd have to renegotiate everything. That we'd have to start from ground zero and renegotiate all our benefits . . . That he was the one who paid us our salaries and gave us our benefits and we would have to renegotiate everything." According to Ever's testimony, Gold also said "that we may have a time clock if we got the union in."

Plant testified that Gold had some papers with him, and he referred to these papers and read a few lines from them and elaborated on what he read; he told the employees of the strike by the Union's employees; that at the conclusion of the strike only a few of the striking employees were rehired and he passed out copies of newspaper articles about the strike. He then said that the election would be by secret ballot and to consider Respondent and vote no. He also told the employees that they were receiving good salaries and benefits which were comparable in the area. Plant further testified that Gold said that all a union wins in an election is the right to sit down and negotiate with a company; that you do not necessarily start from where benefits are, but that the Union would have to start from scratch, from ground zero to negotiate for the benefits the employees then had, that all the benefits were negotiable. Gold then mentioned dental benefits and "he said that if we were having work done on our teeth, we would have to pay for it ourselves, because that benefit would be frozen until the Union renegotiated for it." He also stated that if the employees went on strike they could be replaced. Plant also testified that Gold said that members of the Union that worked in the store had a timeclock which the office employees did not have, and if the Union won the election that could be put into effect.

Piper testified that Gold said basically the same thing that he said in his first speech; he began this speech by discussing the mechanics of the election and that it would be a secret-ballot election; that at one time the Union's employees went on strike and some of them had been permanently replaced. He then spoke about their benefits, that Respondent's contract with the Union differentiated between food and non-food employees, that there was a distinction between the work that store employees perform as compared to non-store employees and Respondent could not afford to pay its office employees the same as it paid its store employees. According to Piper's testimony, Gold also spoke about Respondent's obligation to bargain in good faith with the Union if it won the election, the permanent replacement of strikers, the Union's dues that the employees would have to pay, that Respondent had always treated them fairly and they did not need a union to bring strikes and unpleasantness to the office. Piper also testified that Gold informed the employees "that the stores have a time clock, and if we wanted to punch in, and punch out, then they could install a time clock if that's what it came down to," although he did not connect the installation of the timeclock with the Union winning the election.[8] Gold ended his speech by saying that Respondent had let Medaska go because she had given notice of her resignation, that they had obtained somebody to replace her and they had paid her through the time she had given notice for, and they felt they had treated her fairly.

Gerard testified that Gold referred to, but did not read directly from the notes he had with him. He began by explaining the secret-ballot procedure for the Board election the next day. He then spoke about the Union and the strike in 1970 that Respondent's employees engaged in and that most of those striking employees did not get their jobs back immediately after the strike. He said that the employees salaries were comparable to that of other office employees in the area and their fringe benefits were as good, or better, than those of the store employees; he told the employees of the differences between food and nonfood work and wages, and that the Union, in its contract, recognized the difference. Gerard also testified that Gold said that if the Union won the election Respondent would have to sit down and negotiate in good faith with the Union, but that any benefits they had would be frozen. "They would start from ground zero to be renegotiated for. And if, for example, we had any dental benefits, they—the amount incurred would have to be paid for on our own, as they would be frozen . . . that benefits would start from ground zero . . . if the union got in." Gold also said that the wages would be frozen until the matter was settled. As regards the use of a timeclock, Gerard testified as follows regarding Gold's speech: ". . . was going over the fact that the people in the stores do have to punch and that we did not have to and that it could be arranged, and that we shouldn't vote for the union because—so that the office would remain on friendly and personal manner. He felt that the Union coming in would change . . . I recall him saying that we did not have a time clock now, but that could be arranged—that we could have one should the union prevail."

[8] On direct examination, however, Piper testified that Gold said, "there was no time clock now, but there was the possibility that if the Union came in there would be one installed." In answer to a question from me, she testified that Gold said that as the stores had a timeclock, there was a possibility that they could have one installed.

> Q. Isn't it true that when he talked about a time clock, he talked about it coming in, or that it could come in, in connection with negotiations with the Union.
> A. No.
> Q. He did not. It was totally apart from negotiations with the Union.
> A. Yes.
> Q. But if the Union won the election.
> A. Yes.

In answer to a question from me as to what Gold said regarding the circumstances under which a timeclock would be installed, she testified:

> A. Well we, right then, did not have to punch a time clock. And that we should consider the people that work in the stores do, and he said that that could be arranged for us.
> JUDGE BIBLOWITZ: Did he say under what circumstances?
> A. No. He just said that that could be arranged.

Gerard also testified that Gold said that they were the first office employees the Union was attempting to represent and he did not want to be first, and that they did not need a union and the payment of union dues to get the best Respondent had to offer. He ended by saying that they had replaced Medaska because she had resigned and they needed someone to replace her, that they had paid her through the end of January so she was not hurt by their actions.

Rinaldo, Packard, and Shaily, on direct examination in answers to questions from counsel for Respondent, and in cross-examination, referred to this speech and the earlier speech together. Therefore, for a discussion of their testimony see supra, re the January 4 speech.

Edwards testified that Gold began the meeting by discussing the mechanics of the Board election to be conducted the following day. He told the employees of their excellent fringe benefits and the difference between store and nonstore employees and, regardless of what the Union was telling them, they should not expect the same rate of pay as the store employees receive because the office employees do not have to deal with the public. She testified that Gold said that if the Union won the election, Respondent would have to sit down with the Union and try to come to an agreement, and if they could not reach an agreement, the employees could strike, but there was no guarantee that their jobs would be available when they came back because they could be permanently replaced. Gold then spoke about the fringe benefits the office employees were receiving and he said that if the Union won[9] the election "that they could be frozen; that we'd have to start from ground zero as far as negotiations go." He also said, "at this point you're not punching in the time clock but you could be in the future." She also testified that Gold said that he knew that the employees were due for raises, but that they would be frozen until after the election. Gold ended the speech by saying that all the employees knew that Medaska was getting married and he felt that Respondent gave her a fair shake by asking her to leave at that time and that her replacement would be in on Monday.

For the discussion of what Gold testified he said, and did not say, in this speech, see the discussion, supra, re the January 4 speech.

Credibility Determination

In determining what was said by Cimini and Gold in these three speeches, it has been necessary to carefully scrutinize the testimony of all the witnesses to, and participants in, these speeches. After doing so, I have determined that the most credible witnesses in this regard were Piper and Gerard; their testimony was the most direct, they were the least evasive on cross-examination and had the least amount of contradictory testimony. I would therefore find that in his speech, Cimini did say, inter alia, that Respondent would do whatever it had to do in order to keep the Union out.

As regards Gold's first speech, I would find that he said, inter alia, that if the Union won the election, he would have to negotiate with the Union; everything was negotiable and that he would be tough; that in negotiations the employees would start from ground zero and everything would have to be renegotiated. There was a possibility that the Union would call a strike and Respondent could hire strike replacements and, if that occurred, the strikers might not get their jobs back immediately, but might have to wait until a vacancy occurred. I would also find that Gold said that anyone who had incurred bills using their dental plan would have to pay these bills on their own because these benefits would be frozen.

[9] Edwards testified that Gold, in both speeches, used the expression "ground zero," but did not use the expression "start from scratch."

As regards Gold's second speech, I would find that Gold said, inter alia, that if the Union won the election, Respondent would have to negotiate in good faith with the the Union, but that any benefits they had would be frozen, that they would start from ground zero to be renegotiated for; that if the employees incurred any expenses for dental benefits they also would be frozen and would have to pay for it themselves. I would also find that Gold said, inter alia, that the employees' wages would be frozen until the matter was settled, that the employees in the stores punch a timeclock and there was a possibility that if the Union won the election they could have one installed, and that he also spoke about possible strike replacements as he had in his earlier speech.

VIII. INDIVIDUAL MEETINGS WITH EMPLOYEES

Gold conducted a number of individual meetings with employees; with Evers on January 4, and with a number of other employees on January 9 and 10.

Evers testified that after Gold's first speech he asked her to have a cup of coffee with him in the back room. The two of them went into the room and Gold said, "Tell me now, what's going on? What's happened? Why did you go to the union?" Evers told Gold that she did not start it, that it was a group effort of the employees who were dissatisfied with their working conditions. Gold asked why they did not go to Cimini, and Evers said that the employees will not go to Cimini because they had tried in the past and gotten nowhere. Gold asked her what the problem was, and she said that they were not concerned with their benefits, but they were dissatisfied with their salaries, the demands that they work overtime, and the days they had to stay in the office during their lunch hour to answer the telephone. Gold mentioned that Evers had worked for Respondent for a long time and asked: "Why can't you help me with the girls?" (Although he did not explain what he meant.) Gold then said that it did not seem like a big problem to him, to go to the Union, that they could easily be taken care of and "maybe we can have a meeting once a month and discuss the problems of the office."

Plant testified that about a half hour after Gold's second speech Cimini asked her to see Gold in the new office across the hall, which she did. At this meeting, attended only by her and Gold, he told her how good Respondent's benefits were and that she should consider Respondent when she voted the following day; that she should not be fooled into believing that if the Union won the election they would start from where they were and go one step better; they would have to start from scratch, ground zero and renegotiate each one of the benefits they had. Gold then asked her why she thought the Union had gotten involved in Respondent's office and Plant answered that the employees were unhappy because the increased amount of work had required the employees to work overtime. Plant testified that on the following day, prior to the election, Cimini again asked her to see Gold in the office across the hall. Again, the two were alone and Gold said that the reason he called her back was that he had forgotten to mention the day before that nobody should worry about losing their jobs because of the union matter. Plant then asked Gold to explain what he meant by her benefits being frozen, which, she said, meant to her that she was losing them. Gold's answer was that yes, she could say that she would be losing them; they would have to renegotiate for those benefits—some you may get back and some you may not.

Following Gold's first speech, Piper was called into a private meeting with Gold. Piper testified that Gold asked her if she had thought about what was taking place and if she had made up her mind, she answered that she had been thinking about it, but not anything definite. Gold then asked her if she would be afraid to discuss any problems she had with Cimini and she said that she would not. The following day, prior to the election, Piper was again called into a private meeting with Gold in the new office space across the hall. Gold asked her if she made up her mind as to how she was going to vote; he told her that he did not want her to tell him, he just wanted to know if she had decided. Piper told Gold that she had not decided; that she would weigh both sides and do what was right for herself. She also told Gold that she and a lot of the other girls were afraid of losing their jobs whether or not the Union came in, and Gold told her that everyone's job was secure, that they had nothing to worry about. Gold then said that after the election there might be some unpleasantness in the office because one party would be unhappy that it lost the election, but that would pass. Gold also told Piper that the election would be close, but he felt Respondent would win.

Shortly after Gold's second speech, Cimini asked Gerard to go into a private meeting with Gold in the new office across the hall. He spoke about the employees' benefits and asked if she had been harassed or pushed into making a decision about the Union and she said she had not. Gold then informed her that their benefits would start from ground zero and would have to be negotiated for; he also informed her that if the Union lost the election he would try to hold meetings once a month to go over the problems the employees were having and see if he could work something out. The next morning Gerard was again called into a private meeting with Gold in the new office across the hall. He reminded her that she was still employed on a trial period and he hoped that she would still be there when the trial period was over; he discussed the employees' benefits, said that the employees did not need the Union, and that he hoped that she would consider Respondent when she voted, so that the office would remain in a friendly and personal manner.

Gold testified that after his second speech he met individually with most of the employees; he told them that he thought Respondent had been treating them fairly and he hoped they would give Respondent consideration in the matter. He testified that he never asked the employees what their problems were, nor did he ask any employee how she was going to vote in the election.

As regards the above conversations, where there are conflicts I would credit the employees' testimony over that of Gold. As will be discussed further, infra, I do not find Gold to be a credible witness. His testimony is contradictary, in places, and he was extremely evasive during examination by the General Counsel. The employees, on the other hand, generally, testified in a direct and straightforward manner on both direct and on cross-examination. Although I may not have fully credited their testimony in other situations, supra, I would credit their testimony herein over Gold's denials.

IX. SPLIT LUNCHES AND NEW LOUNGE

Until January, Respondent had a system by which all employees, except one, would have their lunch hour from 12 to 1 p.m.; the employee who did not get her lunch hour would spend that hour answering all telephone calls to Respondent's office. The employees alternated on this "telephone day" so that each employee performed this task about once every 2 weeks, and they were not paid for this time spent in the office; not surprisingly, the employees were not happy with this procedure. In early 1979, an employee named Cindy Pisani asked Cimini if he could institute a split lunch program so that half the employees would take their lunch between 12 and 1 p.m. and the other half between 1 and 2 p.m., thereby obviating the necessity of having one employee remaining, on her own time, to answer the phone. Cimini informed her that he had previously tried split lunches, but that it did not work out well because some of the employees ate lunch at their desks and spoke among themselves and the noise made it difficult for the other employees to work at their desk at the same time.

Shortly thereafter, Cimini discussed with the landlord of Respondent's office location the possibility of Respondent obtaining additional space in the building, but nothing was available at the time. About September 1979, a room across the hall from Respondent's office became available and Respondent entered into an oral agreement with the landlord to rent this office.[10] Cimini testified that, about that time, he made an announcement to all the office employees that Respondent had obtained this new office space and that either it would be used as a lounge for the employees, or desks and machinery would be put in the new office space and an employee lounge would be set up in the original office. The employees had their Christmas party in this new office (albeit without any new furniture) and the election was conducted in this new office.

In late January, after the election, the employees' lounge was set up with the coffee machine from the old machine-break room, couches, table, and chairs (together with some office machines in the rear of the room separated by a divider) in the new office space across the hall, and the employees began using it at that time; at the same time, Respondent instituted the split lunch program, thereby obviating the need for the unpopular telephone day. The General Counsel, although conceding that the acquisition of the new office space preceded the advent of the attempted organization of Respondent's employees by the Union, alleges that Respondent did not definitely determine that this space was to be used as a lounge for the employees until after the Union's appearance, and was therefore a granting of a benefit to the employees to induce them to withdraw their support from the Union. It is therefore necessary to examine the testimony of the employees as to what they were told regarding the lounge.

Evers testified that Cimini informed her about Respondent's acquisition of this office space prior to the petition having been filed in this matter, but that he had not decided what would be done with the space—an employee lounge was mentioned to her as one of the possible uses of the space about a month prior to the election. Branca testified that although she knew that Respondent had acquired this space prior to the advent of the Union at Respondent's office, it was not until after the election that Respondent decided to use this space as a lounge for its employees. In December, however, Cimini told her that there would be a lounge for the employees and that it would be taken care of when the auditors left Respondent's premises at the end of January. Plant testified that she first learned that Respondent had acquired the new office space in early fall of 1979, but that the alternative that Cimini listed for the use of this space was to make it into a file room, installing the computer there, or transferring accounts payable or payroll to the new room; Plant does not recall Cimini saying anything about a lounge being there until January.

Piper testified that she was informed of Respondent's acquisition of the space prior to November, but cannot recall any discussions by Gold or Cimini regarding the uses of this room. Rinaldo testified at some length on this subject, but her testimony came down to this:

> Q. Prior to November 16, had Mr. Cimini said there would be a lounge somewhere with tables and chairs?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And he wasn't sure whether it was going to be across the hall or in the old room or where?
> A. Right.

Packard testified that about September 1979 she was informed that Respondent had acquired the additional office space and that either an employee lounge would be set up there or the machine-break room would be altered, expanded, and converted to a lounge for the employees. Shally testified that about a week prior to November 14 Cimini informed her that as soon as the auditors (who were there at the time) left Respondent's premises Respondent would fix up the new office as a lounge for the employees.

As stated above, the parties stipulated that Respondent acquired the additional office space prior to the Union's attempt to organize Respondent's employees. On the basis of the above testimony, I would find that also prior to the Union's appearance Respondent informed its employees that it would set up a lounge for them (without specifying what furniture would be in the lounge) either in the newly acquired space or in the old machine-break room, which would be expanded for the purpose.

[10] The parties stipulated that this space was acquired by Respondent long before the Union's appearance in November.

X. THE WAGE INCREASES

The record establishes that Respondent has generally granted wage increases to its employees in January. The election herein was conducted on January 10. In February, Respondent announced and granted to all its employees a $20-a-week wage increase retroactive to January 14. The General Counsel alleges two violations in this regard: one for withholding its annual increase from January to February, and the other[11] for granting an increase in an amount significantly greater than those granted in the past, all, allegedly, to discourage support of the Union.

Respondent prepared a summary of the wage increases which were granted to its employees since 1975 (G.C. Exh. 11). Of the 11 employees listed as being employed in 1975, 1, who began her employment in April received a $5 increase in that year, 4 received $10 increases, 1 received a $15 increase, and 5 received $20 wage increases. In 1976, three employees received $10 increases, four received $15 increases, two received $20 increases, and two received $25 increases. All of the above wage increases were granted to the employees either in January or 3 months after they began their employment with Respondent. In 1977, the following wage increases were granted, together with the month in which they were granted: $15 and $20 in April and December; $10 in June; $5 and $20 in May and December; $25 in July; $15 in April; $10 and $5 in April and July; $10 and $20 in April and July; and $10 and $5 in April and July. The wage increases in 1978 were: $20 in July; $20 in January; $20 in July; $15 and $10 in January and July; $15 and $10 in January and September; $10, $10, and $10 in January, April, and July; in January and July; $10 in January; and $20 in January. In 1979, the wage increases were generally granted in January and July; Shally received $15 and $20; Evers, $10 and $15; Rosemary Scalfani, $15 and $20; Rinaldo, $10 and $15; Plant, $10 and $20; Packard, $15 and $20; Piper, $10 and $25; and Medaska, $10 and $15 (Piper's and Medaska's increases were granted in March and July, presumably because they commenced their employment with Respondent in November and December 1978, respectively). Edwards, who began her employ in May 1979, received $15, presumably 3 months later.

Respondent's position is that the wage increases were not granted in January because that was when the election was conducted and their attorney informed them not to grant wage increases at that time because it might be considered as a bribe to the employees. By February, however, some of the employees had become "edgy" about the absence of the wage increase.[12] At this time, the Regional Office of the Labor Board was investigating the Union's unfair labor practice charge and objections in this matter. According to counsel for Respondent (and stipulated to by the General Counsel), he met with the Regional Office representative on two occasions regarding the investigation of this charge and the objections—the first time at the end of January, when Cimini was questioned, and again on February 8 when both Cimini and Gold were questioned. As stated by counsel for Respondent: ". . . it became readily apparent to me that this matter was going to go to a hearing, because there were serious credibility issues. I also know, which is common knowledge, of the backlog with the Administrative Law Judges, and its going to take a few months to get a hearing."

On the basis of that, counsel for Respondent instructed Respondent to grant the increases and make them retroactive to January, and on February 18 he wrote to counsel for the Union, informing him of the increases and the reason, as stated above.

Respondent explains that the increase was retroactive to January because that is when the employees would have received the increase, if not for this pending matter, and that everybody was given the same increase because Respondent did not have an opportunity to review the employees' performance and grant a corresponding merit increase, as they had done in the past.

XI. THE MEDASKA TERMINATION

Medaska began her employ with Respondent in November 1978; she was admittedly a good employee. About the beginning of December, Medaska informed Cimini that she would be leaving Respondent's employ at the end of January when she was to get married and move to Florida. About mid-December, Medaska told a number of the employees, including Supervisor Branca, that there was a possibility that she would not be getting married and would be remaining at her job, but that she was not sure and would not know for sure until she returned from vacation, at which time she would inform Branca one way or the other.[13] While Medaska was on her vacation, Cimini informed Branca that he was looking for someone to replace Medaska and Branca told him that before she left for her vacation Medaska was unsure of what she would do and there was a possibility that she would be coming back. (Cimini admits that Branca told him this and testified that he told Branca to inform Medaska to speak to him because he was looking for her replacement.) Cimini said that as far as he was concerned Medaska had told him that she was not coming back, and he had to plan for the future and look for another employee.

Medaska returned from her vacation on Wednesday, January 2. Although Medaska had made up her mind to remain in Respondent's employ, she was nervous about informing Cimini of her decision and did not attempt to speak to him until late in the afternoon of Friday, January 4, although Branca told her that she had told Cimini that she was unsure about leaving and encouraged Medaska to speak to Cimini. At that time, Medaska informed Cimini of her decision to stay and Cimini told her that it was too late because he had already located another employee who was capable of performing the work and did not want to let the opportunity pass. Cimini then took out of his desk a prepared check for Medaska's salary through January 28 (she had earlier that day received her regular paycheck for the week). Medaska said that she could not believe that he was going to let her leave since she wished to continue working, and that it was quite a coincidence that he was letting her go 1 week before the election. Cimini said that it had nothing to do with it, Medaska told him that Branca had informed him that she would not be leaving, and Cimini said that he knew nothing about it and would continue with his previous plans.

[12] In fact, Evers testified that in her discussion with Gold on January 4, she informed him that she was disturbed that she had not gotten a raise.

[13] Medaska testified that before she left for her vacation during the Christmas to New Year's week she definitely decided that she would remain in Respondent's employ and informed Branca of this decision. Branca testified, however, that Medaska did not inform her that her marriage plans were off and that she would definitely remain in Respondent's employ until after she returned from her vacation. Although not crucial to the issue, I would credit Branca in this regard, as her memory appears superior to that of Medaska.

Before leaving the office, Medaska met Respondent's president, Margolis, who asked if she were alright, she said that she was, and he asked if he could do anything for her. Medaska answered no, since the new employee had already been hired. Margolis then said that she should understand the position of Respondent, that they were set up; Medaska asked him what he meant and he said that the employees do not understand how much Respondent pays for their benefits. Medaska then informed Margolis that the employees were not upset about the benefits, but about their wages and Cimini.

Medaska left this meeting and began clearing out her desk; Evers noticed that she was crying, asked her what was wrong and Medaska said that Respondent had paid her off until the end of the month and it was her last day. As Evers was leaving the office, she met Gold and asked to speak to him. They went to Gold's office and were joined by Cimini and Margolis. Evers' uncontradicted testimony is that she asked why they let Medaska go when she wanted to stay and Cimini knew it. Gold said that she had told them that she would leave at the end of the month and he paid her for that period; he asked what she would do and Evers said she would have kept her. Gold said that he had already hired somebody else. Evers answered, "but isn't it sensible to keep her? She was a good employee, she was a very likeable girl, we liked her very much and it will cost money to hire somebody else and train them." Gold then said, "Well, I have to do everything I can to save my company" and Evers said, "What you're saying then, is that you are doing it for the vote" and Gold said, "do you blame me?" Evers then said, "Well, you do what you have to do." They then began discussing the benefits Respondent was giving its employees and the meeting ended.

Respondent's position regarding the termination of Medaska on January 4 is as follows: when she gave Cimini the notice in early December that she would be leaving Respondent's employ at the end of January they began to look for a replacement for her. Because it was the holiday season they could not locate a replacement. Sometime during the week after Christmas (when Branca informed Cimini that Medaska was "up in the air" about leaving) Gold contacted Joe Greenblatt, a man he knew, who was the controller of Consolidated Supermarkets, herein called Consolidated, and asked him if he could recommend any employee whom Gold could hire to replace Medaska. Greenblatt told him that he had employee Karen Gordon who performed the same type of work as Medaska. Cimini went to Consolidated's office, interviewed Gordon, and hired her to begin on January 7. Gordon remained in Respondent's employ for about 2-1/2 weeks, left without any explanation to Respondent, and returned to her former position at Consolidated. While employed at Respondent, Gordon was paid $175 a week.

Consolidated's payroll records establish that just prior to Gordon's brief employment at Progressive she was paid $5 an hour by Consolidated. Gordon testified, and Consolidated's payroll records further establish that, during her brief employment at Respondent, in the evenings she voluntarily returned to Consolidated's office to perform some of her regular work there; for the week ending January 12 she worked 5 hours at regular time and 17.25 hours of overtime at Consolidated; for the weeks ending January 19 and January 26 these figures were, respectively, 5 and 18.75, and 19 and 15.50.

Gordon testified that just prior to the events in question she had been employed by Consolidated for 2-1/2 years. Shortly before she was interviewed by Cimini, Greenblatt called her into his office and told her that Progressive was short-handed and needed someone in the office and would she help out until they found someone else. Greenblatt told her what work she would be performing at Respondent, but she was not sure whether he informed her of the wages she would be receiving or any other benefits. When asked on direct examination if she were given any choice about going to Respondent, Gordon answered: "I was asked to go. I don't question what my boss asks me to do. If he asks me to go, I go."

> Q. Did you apply for a job at Progressive?
> A. No.
> Q. Did you interview for the job in anyway, like you would for any other job you might apply?
>
> A. No.
> Q. What did Mr. Cimini say to you?
>
> A. He asked if I was qualified, if I knew the work.
> Q. And what did you tell him?
> A. Yes.

Gordon later testified that she did not believe Cimini asked her anything else during this interview, nor did anybody ask her if she would be available for employment at Respondent at the end of January, rather than the beginning of January; Cimini admits this.

After approximately 2-1/2 weeks' employment at Respondent, Gordon called in sick at Respondent because it was too long a trip from her home; she lived approximately 5 minutes' distance from Consolidated, and approximately 45 minutes from Respondent, and Cimini was aware of this. She then called Greenblatt and told him that she could not travel anymore. Greenblatt told her that he would find out about it and called her back and told Gordon that she could continue her work at Consolidated.[14]

On cross-examination, Cimini testified as follows regarding Gordon's sick leave absence from Respondent:

> Q. . . . did you attempt to reach Karen Gordon to find out what the problem was?
> A. No, I did not.
> Q. You had her home phone number, didn't you?
> A. Right.
> Q. But you made no effort to contact her? She just didn't come to work for a few days. She called in sick one day, and yet you made—you just assumed that she didn't want to work there anymore, correct?
> A. Correct.

Cimini testified that during the period in which Gordon was employed by Respondent he continued to look for a replacement for Medaska. He also testified that he hired a new employee to replace Medaska and Gordon "right after Karen left." He also testified that the reason he did not rehire Medaska after Gordon left (or keep her in Respondent's employ on January 4) was because she was always changing her marriage plans and she therefore was not dependable enough, although he admitted that Medaska's notice of leaving in December was the only notice she had ever given Respondent.

Probably the most interesting question in regard to Medaska's termination is why, on January 4, when Cimini was informed by Medaska that she changed her plans and wished to remain in Respondent's employ, it did not cancel Gordon's employment or, at least cancel it until January 28, her original notice date, especially since they paid Medaska up until January 28. Cimini and Gold's answers were simply that they had a "commitment" to Gordon. Cimini, on cross-examination, was asked:

> Q. You're telling me, then, that you thought that because you had told Karen Gordon to start working the following Monday, that there was no way that you could change that. That was irreversible?
> A. No, it wasn't irreversible.

The corollary question is why, since Respondent paid both Medaska and Gordon for the last 3 weeks in January, it did not at least keep Medaska in its employ for that period. Respondent's answer to this was the lack of space at Respondent's premises; although the office was very busy at the time, there was no room for an additional employee. When it was pointed out to Gold that Respondent, at that time, had the new additional space across the hall, he testified that it was not proper for the purpose since new telephone lines would be needed if an employee were placed there.

I do not credit Gold and Cimini's version of Medaska's termination. I found Gold, and to a lesser degree Cimini, not to be credible witnesses. Gold's testimony was often contradictary, his answers to the General Counsel's questions were often evasive and hostile, and, generally, his testimony, and that of Cimini regarding Medaska's termination, was implausible; for example, why was Respondent in such a hurry to obtain a replacement for Medaska at the end of December after Branca had informed Cimini that Medaska was "up in the air" about leaving? Even if Medaska did leave, it would not be for another month, presumably when it would be easier to locate a replacement, being after the Christmas season; in addition, Medaska's replacement, Gordon, who had been employed by an acquaintance of Gold's, never applied for the job, but "was asked to go" to Respondent by her employer, Consolidated, had only a pro forma interview by Cimini, earned less at Respondent than she had been earning at Consolidated, continued to do substantial work in the evenings at Consolidated during the brief period of her employment at Respondent, had to travel 45 minutes to her employ at Respondent rather than the 5-minute commute to Consolidated (which Cimini was aware of), and was never asked if she would be available to begin working for Respondent at the end of January. Also especially revealing is the fact that after Gordon called in sick during the third week of her employ at Respondent, and never returned there without any explanation to Respondent, Cimini never attempted to contact her to find out if she would be returning, together with the fact that even during the brief period of Gordon's employ at Respondent Cimini continued to look for a permanent replacement for Medaska. Additionally, as Respondent's office was very busy at the time of Medaska's termination, it is difficult to understand why, even if it had a "commitment" to Gordon, Respondent could not place Medaska in the new office across the hall, with or without a telephone. (If Respondent was able to arrange an employee lounge shortly thereafter, it could certainly have arranged to have a telephone installed there a few weeks earlier for Medaska or Gordon). Also puzzling is why Respondent never contacted Medaska to return when Gordon left its employ after only 2-1/2 weeks. Finally, sealing this matter was Gold's answer to Evers—"do you blame me?"—when she asked him if he was terminating Medaska for her vote 6 days later? All of these factors lead to the inescapable conclusion that Respondent precipitously terminated Medaska to prevent her from voting in the upcoming election.[15]

XII. ANALYSIS

I have found that Gold, in his two speeches to the employees on January 4 and January 9, said inter alia, that if the Union won the election he would have to negotiate with the Union and that he would be tough; everything was negotiable and that in the negotiations employees would start from ground zero and everything would have to be renegotiated; any benefits they had would be frozen and that their wages would be frozen until the matter was settled. I would also credit Plant's testimony regarding her private meeting with Gold on January 10 where he informed her of what he meant by saying that the employees' benefits would be frozen, which, to her, meant that she was losing them; that yes, she could say that she would be losing them; that they would have to renegotiate for those benefits—some they may get back and some they may not.

---

[14] One week after returning to Consolidated's employ, Gordon received a 7-1/2-percent wage increase.

[15] I make this finding being aware that there was no definite proof that Respondent was aware that Medaska was one of the prounion employees.

There have been numerous cases recently on the legality of statements such as Gold's "ground zero" statements herein. The question is whether, under Section 8(c) of the Act, they are lawful statements explaining to the employees the mechanics of bargaining or are unlawful threats of withdrawal of benefits should the employees choose the Union as their collective-bargaining representative. In Coach and Equipment Sales Corp., 228 NLRB 440 (1977), the Board stated:

> "Bargaining from scratch"[16] is a dangerous phrase which carries within it the seed of a threat the employer will become punitively intransigent in the event the union wins the election. The Board has held that such "hard bargaining" statements may or may not be coercive, depending on the context in which they are uttered. Thus, where a bargaining-from-scratch statement can reasonably be read in context as a threat by the employer to unilaterally discontinue existing benefits prior to negotiations, or to adopt a regressive bargaining posture designed to force a reduction of existing benefits for the purpose of penalizing the employees for choosing collective representation, the Board will find a violation. Where, on the other hand, the clearly articulated thrust of the bargaining-from-scratch statement is that the mere designation of a union will not automatically secure increases in wages and benefits, and that all such items are subject to bargaining, no violation will be found. A close question sometimes exists whether bargaining-from-scratch statements constitute a threat of economic reprisal or instead constitute an attempt to portray the possible pitfalls for employees of the collective-bargaining process. The presence of contemporaneous threats or unfair labor practices is often a critical factor in determining whether there is a threatening color to the employer's remarks.

In Plastronics, Inc., 233 NLRB 155 (1979), the Board stated that statements which indicate that collective bargaining "begins from scratch" or "starts at zero:"

> . . . are objectionable when, in context, they effectively threaten employees with the loss of existing benefits and leave them with the impression that what they may ultimately receive depends in large measure upon what the Union can induce the employer to restore. On the other hand, such statements are not objectionable when additional communication to the employees dispels any implication that wages and/or benefits will be reduced during the course of bargaining and establishes that any reduction in wages or benefits will occur only as a result of the normal give and take of collective bargaining.

Gold's statements to the employees herein regarding negotiations went beyond the permissible limits. Prior to these speeches Cimini, in his speech, informed the employees that Respondent would do whatever it had to do in order to keep the Union out. In addition to Gold's statements regarding negotiations starting from "ground zero" he informed the employees that if he had to negotiate with the Union, the employees' benefits would be frozen, and that their dental benefits would be frozen and they would have to pay for any dental expenses on their own. He also informed the employees that their wages would be frozen until the matter was settled. This, together with his above-mentioned statement to Plant and Respondent's numerous comments to the employees in its letters and speeches about strikes and strike replacements[17] and the other 8(a)(1) and (3) violations discussed and found, infra, convince me that Gold's references to negotiations beginning from "ground zero" were more than simply an explanation of the processes of collective bargaining; rather they were threats to take action detrimental to the employees should they choose to be represented by the Union, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[18] I would likewise find that Gold's statements regarding the employees' wages and benefits being frozen were unlawful threats within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1).

Additionally, I find that Gold's statements in his speeches that anyone who incurred bills using Respondent's dental plan would have to pay these bills on their own because these benefits would be frozen, and that there was a possibility that if the Union won the election a timeclock could be installed both violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Both statements were made in the context that all benefits would have to be renegotiated, would be frozen, and would start at ground zero, if the Union won the election and Respondent had to negotiate with the Union. As stated in N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575, 618 (1969):

> If there is any implication that an employer may or may not take action solely on his own initiative for reasons unrelated to economic necessities and known only to him, the statement is no longer a reasonable prediction based on available facts but a threat of retaliation based on misrepresentation and coercion, and as such without the protection of the First Amendment. . . . [As] stated elsewhere, an employer is free only to tell "what he reasonably believes will be the likely economic consequences of unionization that are outside his control," and not "threats of economic reprisal to be taken solely on his own volition." NLRB v. River Togs, Inc., 382 F.2d 198, 202 (2d Cir. 1967).

[16] I consider "bargaining from scratch" and "start from ground zero" to be synonymous.

[17] I have found, infra, that Respondent's numerous references to strikes and strike replacements in its letters and speeches do not, in themselves constitute a violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[18] South Hills Health System, 240 NLRB 69 (1979); Buckeye Tempo Gamble-Skogmo, Inc., 240 NLRB 723 (1979); TRW-United Greenfield Division, 245 NLRB 1135 (1979).

That is the situation herein; it was the threat to take action solely on its own initiative should the employees choose the Union as their collective-bargaining representative in the upcoming election. It was not a prediction ". . . carefully phrased on the basis of objective fact to convey an employer's belief as to demonstrably probable consequences beyond his control . . . ." Gissel, supra. Both statements therefore violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Although I have found, supra, that Gold's references to negotiations starting from "ground zero" violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I would find that Respondent's statements about strikes and strike replacements in its letters and speeches do not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. All Respondent's letters, except the last, and both of Gold's speeches clearly refer to Respondent's right to hire permanent replacements for employees who engage in a strike. But this is not a situation where Respondent informed its employees that it would not bargain with the Union or would never sign a contract with the Union. Gold informed the employees that if the Union won the election he would have to negotiate in good faith with the Union. Although he did say he would be tough, he said that he would negotiate.[19] Additionally, he never foreclosed the possibility of reaching an agreement with the Union; he referred to the possibility of the Union calling a strike.[20] Further, Respondent's reference to the fact that economic strikers can be permanently replaced is a correct description of the law. Although the speeches and letters repeated this message on numerous occasions during the preelection period, I would find that these statements are lawful under Section 8(c) of the Act and therefore do not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

As regards Gold's individual meetings with the employees, I would find his questioning of Evers—"tell me now, what's going on? What's happened? Why did you go to the Union?"—to be interrogation in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. There could have been no lawful purpose to the inquiry with the election only 6 days away, Evers was given no assurances against reprisals, there was, as is true with all interrogation of this sort, a lack of anonymity, and Respondent engaged in numerous other unfair labor practices during this period.[21]

I would also find that Gold by his statement to Evers on January 4, "maybe we can have a meeting once a month and discuss the problems of the office" impliedly promised to correct grievances in the future if the Union were defeated in the upcoming election, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

In Uarco, Incorporated, 216 NLRB 1 (1974), the Board stated:

> the solicitation of grievances at preelection meetings carries with it an inference that an employer is implicitly promising to correct those inequities it discovers as a result of its inquiries. Thus, the Board has found unlawful interference with employee rights by an employer's solicitation of grievances during an organizational campaign although the employer merely stated it would look into or review the problem but did not commit itself to specific corrective action; the Board reasoned that employees would tend to anticipate improved conditions of employment which might make union representation unnecessary. However, it is not the solicitation of grievances itself that is coercive and violative of Section 8(a)(1), but the promise to correct grievances or a concurrent interrogation or polling about union sympathies that is unlawful; the solicitation of grievances merely raises an inference that the employer is making such a promise, which inference is rebuttable by the employer.

In Uarco, supra, the Board found no violation because the employer rebutted the inference by repeatedly informing the employees that it could make no promises regarding the grievances raised.[22] Additionally, the Board found the record devoid of any showing of union animus or concurrent unfair labor practices on the part of the employer.

In Merle Lindsey Chevrolet, Inc., 231 NLRB 478 (1977), the employer, a few days after the Union began its organization drive, informed his employees that he "wanted to find out what kind of problems they were having" and that he "would talk to them concerning such problems." The Board, quoting the above-mentioned language from Uarco, supra, found a violation of Section 8(a)(1), stating: "In the instant case, there is no evidence that Respondent made any statement or took any action to establish that it was not promising to remedy grievances and we therefore find that Respondent did not meet its burden of rebutting the inference."

In the situation herein, Gold asked Evers what the problems were, and after she informed him of them he said that it did not seem like a big problem and that they could easily be taken care of; he then suggested the monthly meetings to discuss the office problems (without making any "no promises" statement.) This was clearly an implied promise to correct the employees' grievances in the future in exchange for the defeat of the Union, a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

As regards Gold's individual meetings with Plant, I would find that his statements to her regarding benefits starting from ground zero and being renegotiated if the Union won the election, together with his statement that she would be losing some benefits—some she may get back and some she may not—violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act for the reasons stated, supra. During the individual meeting with Plant on January 9, Gold also asked her why she thought the Union had gotten involved in Respondent's office. Although this interrogation did not directly question Plant's union sympathies, I would find that it violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as the question served no valid purpose with the election only 1 day away and took place in the context of other unlawful statements made by Gold to Plant.[23]

[22] See also Tiffin Division of Hayes-Albion Corporation, 237 NLRB 20 (1978), where the Board found no violation in the employer's soliciting grievances and questions at meetings with employees, since the employer took a no "promises" position at these meetings.

I find that Gold's statements to Piper came within the protection of Section 8(c) of the Act.

Gold's statement to Gerard on January 9 regarding benefits starting from ground zero is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) for the reasons stated, supra. In addition, his statement to Gerard that if the Union lost the election he would try to hold meetings once a month to go over the problems the employees were having and see if he could work something out is an implied promise to correct the employees' grievances in the future if the Union lost the election, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, Uarco, supra. On the next morning (the day of the election) Gerard was again called in to speak to Gold and he reminded her that she was still employed in her trial period and he hoped that she would still be there when the trial period was over. It requires no case citation to find (as I do) that an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when he makes such a statement which could have no other purpose than to serve as a threat to the employee.

I find that the General Counsel has not sustained his burden of establishing that Respondent instituted the split lunch program and established the lounge for the employees in the new office in answer to the Union's organizational drive. Although I did not credit Cimini's testimony regarding Medaska's termination, I would credit his testimony regarding the split lunch program and the new lounge; his testimony on these matters was clear and concise, believable, and generally supported by the testimony of other witnesses. It appeared to me that, on this subject, Cimini, knowing that he was testifying truthfully, was open and direct in his testimony.

It is reasonable to assume that a change in Respondent's "telephone day" system required a separate lounge where the other employees could have their lunch without disturbing the employees who were answering the telephones. The evidence herein establishes that prior to September Respondent had no such place available to it, although Respondent had been receiving numerous complaints from its employees regarding "telephone day." The parties stipulated that Respondent acquired new office space across the hall from its existing office long before the Union's appearance in November. The testimony also establishes that prior to the Union's appearance in November Cimini informed the employees that Respondent had acquired this space and that Respondent would establish a lounge for the employees either in the new office space or that desks and machinery would be placed in the new office space and an expanded lounge would be established in the existing office space. As Respondent had therefore decided to create a lounge for its employees prior to the appearance of the Union, I find it unnecessary to make a determination as to when Respondent made its final decision as to which location the lounge would be at; either way the employees would have a new expanded lounge (and correspondingly a split lunch system) and this was decided prior to the Union's appearance in November. I would therefore dismiss this 8(a)(1) allegation.

I would likewise dismiss the allegation that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by withholding its annual wage increases from January to February and the allegation that it violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by granting a wage increase in Feburary that was significantly greater than those granted in the past. As regards the first allegation, Respondent was clearly in a bind; the records establish that Respondent generally granted wage increases to its employees, at least, in January of each year. Presumably because of the election conducted on January 10, Respondent delayed granting its usual wage increase to the employees at that time. In fact, Respondent may well have placed itself in a precarious legal situation if it had granted the increase in the first 10 days of January (why could not it wait until after the election?) or if it had granted the increase during the last 20 days of January (why could not it wait until the Regional Office issued a determination on the Union's objections to the election?) I would therefore find that Respondent's action in withholding the regular wage increase for a 1-month period did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[24]

Whether the amount of the increase given to the employees in February, retroactive to January, violates the Act is a more difficult issue. All employees were granted a $20-a-week wage increase. The record establishes that the January 1979 weekly wage increases granted to the employees ranged from $10 to $15, and that the weekly wage increases granted by Respondent to its employees in July 1979 varied from $15 to $25. In addition, in 1978, four employees received $20 increases in their weekly wages at one point in the year. This establishes that in the past Respondent had occasionally granted $20 wage increases to its employees; however, Respondent never adequately explained why it granted all employees $20 weekly wage increases where it previously had granted varying merit increases to its employees. Cimini's testimony that ". . . we didn't have a chance for the reviews" does not ring true; if anything, Respondent had an additional month in which to evaluate the work of its employees in order to determine the amount of increase to grant each of them. However, as the amount of the increase granted in February 1980 was not greatly in excess of the increases granted in 1979, with the increasing rate of inflation during this period, and the arithmetic fact that a higher rate of salary requires a larger actual increase to maintain the same percentage rate of increase, I find that the General Counsel has not met his burden herein; and I will therefore dismiss this 8(a)(1) allegation.

In Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083, (1980), the Board set forth the rule it will henceforth apply in dual motive or pretextual cases such as the instant matter: "First, we shall require that the

[23] Baker Manufacturing Co., Inc., 218 NLRB 1295 (1975).

[24] In making this determination, I am cognizant of the fact that Gold, in his second speech, stated that the employees' wages would be frozen until the matter was settled and that I have found that statement, in the context in which it was made, violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act.

General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a 'motivating factor' in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct."

The General Counsel has made such a prima facie showing herein. Respondent's explanation for Medaska's termination (as discussed, supra) is so incredible as to lead to the inescapable conclusion that she was terminated to prevent her from voting in the upcoming Board election. Although there was no clear evidence of Respondent's knowledge of Medaska's union activities or preference, I believe this knowledge can be imputed to Respondent under the small-plant doctrine.[25] This doctrine is applicable here in that, during the period in question, there were only 12 or 13 employees in the unit working within an enclosed office area. In addition, Cimini had a view of this area from his office. There was also testimony that after the Union began organizing these employees Medaska spent a lot of time during her breaks speaking with Evers, the employee known by Respondent to be the leading adherent on behalf of the Union.

That being established, the remaining question is whether Respondent has satisfied its burden to demonstrate that it would have terminated Medaska on January 4 even if not for the election taking place 6 days later. On the basis of all the evidence herein, the answer is clearly that it has not. As stated above, there was no valid business reason (as compared to an antiunion reason) for terminating Medaska on January 4. The evidence leaves no doubt that, if it were not for the election, Medaska would not have been terminated at all, or at least not until January 28; Medaska was a good employee, Respondent's office was busy during this period, and Respondent was not able to locate a permanent replacement for her until the end of January, long after she informed Cimini, on January 4, that her wedding plans had been terminated and that she wished to remain in Respondent's employ. I therefore conclude that Respondent terminated the employment of Medaska in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

XIII. THE EFFECT OF SUCH CONDUCT ON THE ELECTION

The objections include certain of the allegations contained in the complaint herein. The finding that Respondent promised Evers and Gerard to correct the employees' grievances in the future, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, sustains Objection 1. The finding that Respondent interrogated Evers in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, threatened and interrogated Plant in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, and threatened Gerard in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act sustains Objection 2. The finding that Respondent, by Gold's speeches of January 4 and January 9, threatened employees with the loss of benefits in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act sustains Objection 3, and the finding that Respondent's termination of Medaska on January 4 violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act sustains Objection 4. In view of the bargaining order found applicable herein, infra, it is recommended that that election conducted on January 10, 1980, in Case 22-RC-8060 be set aside and that the representation proceeding be dismissed.

XIV. THE REFUSAL TO BARGAIN

The Supreme Court, in N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., supra, set forth the situations where bargaining orders would be appropriate relief: the first were those situations where an employer had committed "outrageous and pervasive" unfair labor practices which eliminate the possibility of holding a fair election; the second were the "less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive practices" where there is a showing at one point that the Union had authorization cards from a majority of the unit employees, and the Board concludes that the extensiveness of the unfair labor practices "have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes."

As of November 15, the Union represented a majority of the employees in the unit herein; therefore, the only remaining question is whether the extensiveness of the unfair labor practices committed by Respondent warrant the imposition of a bargaining order under the tests established by Gissel, supra. The events herein took place among a unit consisting of 12 to 13 employees working together in 1 office. The unfair labor practices found, which immediately affected all the employees, were the threats made by Gold in his speeches that negotiations would start at ground zero and that their benefits would be frozen if the Union won the election and he had to negotiate with the Union, that their wages would be frozen until the matter was settled, that any employee who incurred dental bills would have to pay for them on their own because these benefits would be frozen, and that there was a possibility that if the Union won the election a timeclock could be installed. These threats rate high on the "Gissel scale of seriousness" because they were to all of the employees. The Board also considers 8(a)(3) terminations as serious in determining whether a bargaining order is warranted. As the Board stated in Armcor Industries, Inc., 227 NLRB 1543 (1977):

> The Board is well aware that no employer conduct is more serious or has consequences more crippling to the free exercise of Section 7 rights than the discharge of an employee because of the employee's union affiliation. Indeed, both the Board and the courts have frequently pointed out that such conduct "goes to the very heart of the Act." . . . The effect of such a discharge is particularly pronounced when, as is true of the instant case, one of the victims is well known as the instigator of the Union's drive. In such circumstances, only the most remarkably obtuse employee would fail to perceive and to heed the employer's message that any employee who advocates the Union is embarking on a perilous venture.

[25] Wiese Plow Welding Co., Inc., 123 NLRB 616 (1959).

Although Medaska did not initiate the drive to have the Union represent Respondent's employees, she solicited authorization cards from three employees. When she was terminated by Respondent 6 days before the election, the message was clear to all the employees that supporting the Union can be dangerous.

I have also found 8(a)(1) violations by Gold directed at three employees individually: interrogation of Evers and Plant, the promise of the future corrections of grievances to Evers and Gerard, and threats to Gerard and Plant.

Considering the small size of the unit involved herein, the number and seriousness of the violations referred to, supra, and that they were committed not by a low level supervisor, but by Gold, Respondent's vice president, I find that a bargaining order is warranted herein under the "less extraordinary" test of Gissel, supra,[26] and that the duty to bargain commenced on November 16, 1979, the date the Union requested recognition after it had attained majority status the previous day.

XV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in sections VII through XI, above, occurring in connection with Respondent's operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by:

(a) Threatening its employees with the loss of benefits should they choose to be represented by the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

(b) Threatening to discontinue the employees dental benefits should they choose to be represented by the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

(c) Threatening to freeze the employees' wages and other benefits due to their activities on behalf of the Union.

(d) Threatening to install a timeclock if the employees chose to be represented by the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

(e) Interrogating its employees regarding their activities, and the activities of other employees, on behalf of the Union.

(f) Promising to correct the grievances of the employees in order to induce them to withdraw their support from the Union.

(g) Threatening employees with discharge in order to induce them to withdraw their support from the Union.

4. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating the employment of Diane Medaska because she engaged in activities on behalf of the Union.

5. The following unit is appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act: All full-time and regular part-time office clerical employees employed at Respondent's Parsippany office, but excluding confidential employees, professional employees, guards, all other employees and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

6. Since November 15, 1979, and at all times material thereafter, the Union herein represented a majority of the employees in the above-described appropriate unit, and has been the exclusive representative of all said employees for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

7. By refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the above-described unit since on or about November 16, 1979, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

9. Respondent's unlawful conduct interfered with the representation election conducted on January 10, 1980.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

As I have found that Respondent unlawfully terminated Diane Medaska, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer her immediate and full reinstatement to her former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges, and to make her whole for any loss of earnings suffered as a result of the discrimination by payment of a sum equal to that which she would have earned, absent the discrimination, with backpay and interest computed in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Company,[27] and Florida Steel Corporation.[28]

For the reasons set forth above, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to recognize and, upon request, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the above- described unit. As a bargaining order has been found appropriate, it would be consistent that the election in Case 22–RC–8060 be set aside and that the petition in that matter be dismissed.[29]

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[30]

The Respondent, Progressive Supermarkets, Inc., its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Threatening its employees with the loss of benefits should they choose to be represented by the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

(b) Threatening to discontinue its dental benefit plan if its employees choose to be represented by the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

(c) Threatening to freeze the employees' wages and other benefits because of their activities on behalf of the Union.

(d) Threatening to install a timeclock if the employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

(e) Interrogating its employees regarding their activities, and the activities of other employees, on behalf of the Union.

(f) Promising to correct the grievances of its employees to induce them to withdraw their support from the Union.

(g) Threatening its employees with discharge should they choose to be represented by the Union.

(h) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees because of their union activities or sympathies.

(i) Refusing to recognize, and, upon request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time office clerical employees employed at Respondent's Parsippany office, but excluding confidential employees, professional employees, guards, all other employees and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

(j) In any like or related manner, interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer Diane Medaska full and immediate reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges, and make her whole for any loss of pay suffered as a result of the discrimination against her in the manner set forth above in the section entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Recognize and, upon request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the bargaining unit set forth above with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an agreement is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(c) Post at its Parsippany, New Jersey, location, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[31] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 22, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint herein be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found herein.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election in Case 22-RC-8060 be set aside and that the petition in that matter be dismissed.

[30] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided by Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[31] In the event that this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

December 7, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On October 17, 1980, Administrative Law Judge Roger B. Holmes issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge, to modify his remedy,[1] and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.[2]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Ventura County District Council of Carpenters, Ventura, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a):

"(a) Restraining and coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act by charging, trying, fining, or otherwise disciplining Ron Purseley, Mel Ellison, Steve Gerhardt, Mike O'Connor, Mark Valencia, Ray E. Thomas, John Schembri, Roger Haynes, Richard Crawford, and Tim Becker, or any of its members, in order to induce or encourage them to withhold their services from a neutral employer, with an object of forcing or requiring the neutral employer to cease doing business with a primary employer."

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROGER B. HOLMES, Administrative Law Judge: The unfair labor practice charges in Cases 31-CB-3572 and 31-CC-1264 were both filed on January 18, 1980, by Commercial Industrial Constructors, Inc., which is referred to herein as the Employer or the Charging Party. (See G.C. Exhs. 1(a) and (c).)

The Regional Director for Region 31 of the National Labor Relations Board, herein called the Board, who was acting on behalf of the General Counsel of the Board, issued on February 22, 1980, an order consolidating cases and consolidated complaint and notice of hearing against Ventura County District Council of Carpenters, herein called the Respondent or the Union. (See G.C. Exh. 1(e).)

The General Counsel's consolidated complaint, which was amended at the outset of the hearing, alleges that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein called the Act. The Respondent filed an answer to the General Counsel's consolidated complaint, and the Respondent denied that it had committed the alleged unfair labor practices. (See G.C. Exh. 1(g).) In response to the additional allegations which were made by the General Counsel at the beginning of the hearing, the attorney for the Respondent entered the Respondent's denial of those allegations on the record. (See G.C. Exh. 2, which sets forth the additional allegations.)

The hearing was held before me on July 1, 1980, in Ventura, California. The time for filing post-hearing briefs was extended to September 5, 1980. Both counsel for the General Counsel and the attorneys for the Respondent prepared and filed briefs which have been considered.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE EMPLOYER

At all times material herein, the Employer has been a California corporation with an office and place of business located in Ventura, California, where the Employer has been engaged in the building and construction industry as a framing subcontractor.

In the course and conduct of its business operations, the Employer annually purchases and receives goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 from sellers or suppliers located within the State of California, which sellers or suppliers receive such goods in substantially the same form directly from outside the State of California.

In view of the foregoing admitted or stipulated facts, I find that the Employer has been at all times material herein an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE UNION

It was admitted in the pleadings that the Respondent has been at all times material herein a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. In view of the foregoing, and the entire record in this case, I find that fact to be so.

III. THE WITNESSES

In alphabetical order by their last names, the following four persons appeared as witnesses at the hearing in this proceeding:

Doug Chickering has been the secretary-treasurer of the Employer for the past 3-1/2 years. He also works as a field superintendent for the Employer.

Douglas Dole is a business representative of the Respondent.

Samuel Heil has been the executive secretary of the Respondent for approximately 7 years.

John Schembri worked for the Employer as a journeyman carpenter from mid-November 1979 until mid-January 1980.

IV. CREDIBILITY RESOLUTIONS

The findings of fact made herein are based upon portions of the credible testimony of each one of the witnesses named above in section 3. There are a few minor differences in some parts of the testimony, but there are no differences which are of consequence or significance in resolving the issues raised in this proceeding.

Additionally, certain findings of fact are based upon documentary evidence which was introduced by the parties at the hearing.

V. FACTS NOT DISPUTED IN THE PLEADINGS

Certain allegations in the General Counsel's consolidated complaint were not disputed in the pleadings. Accordingly, those facts are found to be true. (See Sec. 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended.)

The findings of fact set forth below are numbered to correspond with the numbers given to those paragraphs in General Counsel's Exhibit 1(e):

> 2. (c) At all times material herein, Buena Vista Properties, Inc. (herein called Buena Vista), with an office and principal place of business located in Ventura, California, has been engaged as a general contractor in the building and construction industry.
> (d) At all times material herein, Buena Vista has been engaged in the construction of an office building in Ventura, California (herein called the jobsite).
> (e) At all times material herein, Buena Vista subcontracted the framing work at the jobsite to the Employer.
> (f) At all times material herein, Buena Vista subcontracted the finishing carpentry work at the jobsite to Cal-Built Construction (herein called Cal-Built).
> (g) At all times material herein, Cal-Built has been a general partnership with an office and place of business located in Ventura, California, where it is engaged as a finishing carpentry subcontractor in the building and construction industry.
>
> 6. (a) At all times material herein, the Respondent has had a labor dispute with Cal-Built.

> (b) At no time material herein has the Respondent had a labor dispute with any person herein other than Cal-Built.
> 7. Commencing on or about December 13, 1979, and continuing to the latter part of December 1979, the exact date presently unknown, Respondent picketed the jobsite with placards containing the following legend: "Cal-Built Construction not in Compliance With Area Standards—Ventura DC of Carpenters."

VI. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Jobsite Involved in This Proceeding

As indicated above in section V, an office building was being constructed at the jobsite involved in this proceeding. The building was three stories in height, and was surrounded on three sides by a parking lot.

The jobsite was located just north of the Ventura freeway. It was located on Alessandro Street approximately one-quarter mile west of Seaward Avenue. The project was on the north side of Alessandro Street which is a dead end street. Except for some clumps of dirt, the construction site was on flat ground.

There were two driveways from Alessandro Street to the parking lot surrounding the office building. One such driveway was on the west side of the building, and the other was on the east side of the building.

There was a sign at the driveway to the west of the building, which for convenience herein will be referred to as the west gate. The sign posted at the west gate indicated that the gate was reserved for the employees and the suppliers of Cal-Built and Royal Electric. As indicated in section V herein, Cal-Built had the subcontract to perform the finishing carpentry work at the jobsite. As further indicated in section V herein, the Respondent has had at all times material herein a labor dispute with Cal-Built. Royal Electric was described at the hearing as being a nonunion contractor on the project.

Another sign was posted at the driveway to the east of the building, which for convenience herein will be referred to as the east gate. The sign at the east gate indicated that the gate was reserved for all of the employees and suppliers other than the employees and suppliers of Cal-Built and Royal Electric.

Located between the west gate and the east gate were two construction shacks on the project. The general superintendent of the project occupied one of the construction shacks, and the Employer occupied the other construction shack. The shacks were described as being within 20 feet of each other.

Doug Chickering served as the field superintendent for the Employer on the jobsite, as well as on other projects for the Employer. Thus, Chickering was not at that one project on a full-time basis, but he had a full-time foreman who did work on that one jobsite. His name was Gary Fishback. Fishback had the authority to hire, to fire, and to assign work to employees. The Employer had a varying number of journeymen carpenters and apprentice carpenters at the jobsite between the middle of September 1979 and March 1980, during which time the Employer performed framing work at the jobsite. Chickering estimated that the number of the Employer's employees varied from 2 employees a day to 45 employees a day, with an average of approximately 25 employees a day.

Identified as employees of the employer who worked at the jobsite during the month of December 1979 were Ron Pursley, Mel Ellison, Steve Gerhardt, Mike O'Connor, Mark Valencia, Ray E. Thomas, John Schembri, Roger Haynes, Richard Crawford, and Tim Becker.

Schembri testified that he worked at the jobsite from mid-November 1979 until mid-January 1980. He worked as a journeyman carpenter performing framing work. Schembri was a member of the Respondent.

Although Chickering was a field superintendent, he also was a member of the Respondent in December 1979.

B. The Picketing and Other Occurrences at the Jobsite

Picketing by the Respondent was first observed at the jobsite at 8 a.m. on December 13, 1979. The Respondent's pickets were at the west gate of the project. The wording on the picket signs has been described in section V above. There were no pickets at the east gate of the project.

In addition to the pickets at the west gate, the Respondent also had pickets at the corner of Alessandro Street and Seaward Avenue, but those pickets were not on the jobsite location.

Chickering said that he drove his truck to the project, and that he parked his truck on Alessandro Street between the west gate and the east gate. He then walked onto the project. On occasion Chickering walked through the east gate, and sometimes he walked onto the project in the area adjacent to the construction shacks. Sometimes he left the project by walking out near the construction shacks. Chickering never went through the west gate.

Schembri also parked his vehicle on Alessandro Street, and he walked onto the project in the area adjacent to the construction shacks. He also left the project by walking out in the same area.

Dole observed persons walk onto the jobsite at the construction shacks located between the two gates. He also saw some persons park their vehicles at the curb, and he saw some persons drive their vehicles over the curb and onto the project on a couple of occasions. Dole did not observe anyone using the east gate.

On December 13, 1979, a steward's report was taken by the Respondent on the project. Schembri stated that he wrote his own name on the steward's report on that occasion. Chickering asked the Respondent's executive secretary, Heil, on that same date on the jobsite "why he was harassing my troops on that job—my employees." Heil responded that he was simply checking union cards, whereupon Chickering volunteered showing his union card to Heil.

C. The Sign Posted at the Christmas Party and the Sign Posted at the Respondent's Office

One of the local unions affiliated with the Respondent held its annual Christmas party on either December 17 or 21, 1979, at the fairgrounds.

As Schembri entered the area where the Christmas party was being held, he noticed that there was a sign posted where persons came in to show their union cards. The sign was about 2 feet by 3 feet in size.

According to Schembri, the sign stated, "Members of CICI have crossed the union-sanctioned picket line at the . . . jobsite." Thereafter listed on the sign were the names of the 12 persons involved in this proceeding.

On January 14, 1980, Schembri observed a similar sign posted at the Respondent's office. However, he said the sign at the Respondent's office was not as large as the one which had been posted at the Christmas party.

D. The Filing of the Intraunion Charges on January 4, 1980

Business Representative Dole filed on January 4, 1980, intraunion charges against certain members of the Respondent. Copies of those charges were introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 4(a) through (l). The charges were filed against Ron Pursley, Mel Ellison, Steve Gerhardt, Mike O'Connor, Mark Valencia, Ray E. Thomas, John Schembri, Roger Haynes, Richard Crawford, Gary Fishback, Tim Becker, and Doug Chickering.

The intraunion charges allege a violation of the provisions of section 55,A, paragraph 10, of the constitution and laws of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America. Specifically, the charges allege, "This member was working behind a duly authorized picket line of the United Brotherhood." The offense is alleged in the charge to have occurred on December 13, 1979, at the jobsite.

Copies of the intraunion charges were sent by mail to the individuals named in the charges. Accompanying the charges was a letter dated January 4, 1980, from Executive Secretary Heil to the member involved. The letter advised the member of the time, date, and place for his appearance before the Respondent's executive board to answer the charges brought against the member. (See G.C. Exhs. 5(a) through (l).)

The Respondent's procedure in such situations was also to include a copy of certain sections of the constitution and laws of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America in order to advise the member of his rights. Those sections reproduced for the member were: Section 55, "Offenses and Penalties"; section 56, "Charges and Trials"; and Section 57, "Appeals and Grievances." (See G.C. Exh. 6.)

The Respondent's executive board did meet as scheduled, and the executive board referred the charges to the Respondent's trial committee.

E. The Conversation on January 14, 1980, Among Heil, Chickering, and Schembri

About 1 or 1:30 p.m. on January 14, 1980, there was a conversation in Heil's office among Heil, Chickering, and Schembri. Schembri had a good recollection of what was said by those persons on that occasion. He testified:

> All right. Doug asked Mr. Heil if he knew about the charges that were brought against us, and he said he did. Doug wanted to know if there was any way that we could settle it or have the charges dropped.
> And Mr. Heil told us that he hadn't brought the charges, that Doug Dole had and that we should be speaking to him.
> We asked him if we could see Mr. Dole, and he told us that he was out sick that day.
> Mr. Heil also stated that there was a member of the Sierra Group on the job site December 13th, and that somebody had called them to be there at that time. And we didn't respond to this because we didn't know who had called him.
> I asked Mr. Heil if he was familiar with the two signs that had been posted, and he said he was. And I asked him if he didn't think it was harassing and discriminatory to put those signs up before we were even given a chance to defend ourselves, and he said he did not.
> Doug Chickering also told Mr. Heil that if there was no way that we could settle the charges, that he would bring counter charges with the NLRB. And Mr. Heil responded by saying that he wished we would, because he wanted a test case. And people were asking him how members of CICI could work behind a picket line without getting in trouble.
> Doug also mentioned that it would cost the union money if they had to go through this legal battle. And Mr. Heil said well, it was our money anyway, meaning the money of the members of the union. That is about all I can recall from that day.

F. The Conversation on January 17, 1980, Between Dole and Chickering

There was a very brief conversation on January 17, 1980, between Dole and Chickering. The conversation took place at the jobsite.

Chickering asked Dole if Dole could drop the charges. Dole responded that he would not drop the charges.

G. The Proceedings Regarding the Intraunion Charges

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 7(a) through (l) were copies of the Respondent's "Official Notification to Appear Before Trial Committee." The documents were dated February 22, 1980, and they directed the persons previously named above to appear before the Respondent's Trial Committee on March 4, 1980. Copies of the trial committee's reports were introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 8(a) through (l). The reports for Pursley, Valencia, and Thomas were dated April 1, 1980. (See G.C. Exhs. 8(a), (e), and (f).) The other reports were dated March 4, 1980. All of the persons previously named were found guilty of the charges which had been filed by Dole.

The following persons received a fine of $100 with $50 suspended and were placed on 1 year's probation: Pursley, Ellison, O'Connor, Valencia, Thomas, Schembri, Haynes, Crawford, Fishback, and Chickering. (See G.C. Exhs. 8(a)–(b), (d)–(j), and (l).)

Gerhardt was given a $50 fine with $50 suspended and placed on 1 year's probation. (See G.C. Exh. 8(c).)

Becker was given a $50 fine with $25 suspended and placed on 1 year's probation. (See G.C. Exh. 8(k).)

General Counsel's Exhibits 9(a) through 9(l) are copies of the Respondent's "Official Notification of the Action of Ventura County District Council of Carpenters."

Only 1 of the 12 members of the Respondent appealed the foregoing action. That person was Roger Haynes. His appeal had not been decided by the time of the hearing in this case.

H. Conclusions

In analyzing the evidence presented herein, it is especially helpful to study the Board's decision in Orange County District Council of Carpenters; and Carpenters Local 2361 (J. A. Stewart Construction Co.), 242 NLRB 585 (1979).

The Board found that the respondents in that case had violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by imposing internal union discipline, including fines, upon certain employees in order to induce or encourage them to withhold their services from a neutral employer with an object of forcing or requiring the neutral employer to cease doing business with a primary employer.

In the J. A. Stewart case, as in the present case, the respondents therein had a labor dispute with one of the several employers who were engaged in the construction of a building. There was picketing of the common situs jobsite, and two reserved gates were established. Three carpenters worked for neutral employers on that jobsite, and they observed the reserved gate system for neutral employees. Nevertheless, a business representative brought internal union charges against the three carpenters for "working behind a duly authorized picket line." J. A. Stewart, supra at 586. Thereafter, as a result of the charges, two of the employees were assessed fines, and the other one was cited to appear before the council to select a trial committee.

The Board distinguished the Court's opinion in N.L.R.B. v. Allis- Chalmers Manufacturing Co., 388 U.S. 175 (1967), and the Board specifically relied on the Court's holding in Scofield, et al. v. N.L.R.B., 394 U.S. 423 (1969), where the Court stated at 430: "§8(b)(1) leaves a union free to enforce a properly adopted rule which reflects a legitimate union interest, impairs no policy Congress has imbedded in the labor laws, and is reasonably enforced against union members who are free to leave the union and escape the rule."

The Board held in J. A. Stewart, supra at 587:

> We have no trouble in finding that such discipline not only frustrates the policy reflected in the secondary boycott provisions of the Act, which forbids labor organizations from enmeshing neutral employers in primary labor disputes, but, as alleged, would also require a finding of unlawful secondary boycott activity. We are guided to this conclusion by Board precedent.

In Belleville, supra, as pointed out by the General Counsel, the Board found that a union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A), as well as Section 8(b)(4)(i)(B), by fining and threatening with internal union discipline members who worked for a neutral employer during a labor dispute involving another employer at a construction site. The Board assumed, without deciding, that the picket line aimed at the primary employer by another union was lawful and concluded:[7]

> While it is true that a union may lawfully impose internal union discipline on an employee for refraining from certain kinds of activity from which he has a Section 7 right to refrain (for example, making a delivery across a primary picket line or working during a primary economic strike against his own employer), a union may not lawfully impose such discipline on a member for working for a secondary employer at a common situs where an employer other than his own is being subjected to a primary (or, a fortiori, a secondary) picket line.

The rationale supporting this result is that such discipline induces or encourages employees of a neutral employer to refuse to perform services, within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(i)(B), a natural and apparent object of which is to cause the neutral employer to cease doing business with the primary employer.[8]

The case referred to by the Board in the text of the above quotation is Local Union No. 153, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO (Belleville Electric & Heating, Inc.), 221 NLRB 345 (1975). In that case, the Board found violations of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) where the respondent therein threatened its members with internal union discipline and other reprisals if they worked for a neutral employer, and fined and expelled a member because he worked for a neutral employer, with an object of forcing or requiring certain neutral employers to cease doing business with a primary employer.

In addition to the foregoing cases, I have also looked for guidance to the Board's decision in Glaziers and Glassworkers Local Union No. 1621, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades (Alameda Glass and Mirror Co., Inc.), 242 NLRB 1011 (1979). In that case, the Board followed the rationale and holding in J. A. Stewart, supra. The Board concluded on "nearly an identical factual situation" as in J. A. Stewart (242 NLRB at 1012–13):

> We conclude, therefore, on the authority of our holding in Stewart, that Respondent unlawfully fined Ginestra and Bentley for working for a neutral employer at a common situs, thereby inducing or encouraging employees of a neutral employer to refuse to perform services, with the natural and apparent object of causing the neutral employer to cease doing business with a primary employer.[6]

I conclude that the rationale and the holdings in the Board precedents cited above are applicable to the present case. Here the Respondent's picketing of the common situs jobsite was directed at Cal-Built with whom the Respondent had a labor dispute. The Employer in this case was a neutral employer. The 12 persons involved in this case worked for the neutral employer. Of those 12, 10 were employees, and 2, Chickering and Fishback, were supervisors.

The west gate was the gate reserved for the employees and the suppliers of Cal-Built and another non-union employer, Royal Electric. There is no evidence that the 12 persons involved in this case used the west gate in entering or leaving the jobsite.

There is evidence that they had entered and left the jobsite near the Employer's construction shack, rather than through the east gate. Nevertheless, that area near the construction shack was not a part of the west gate, where the picketing was being conducted and which was reserved for the primary employer's employees and suppliers. Because the 12 persons involved herein did not use the west gate in entering or leaving the premises, I conclude that their failure to use the east gate is not such a crucial or determinative fact which would negate the applicability of the Board precedents cited above.

Accordingly, for the reasons stated by the Board in its decisions referred to above, I conclude that the Respondent in this case has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act as alleged in the General Counsel's consolidated complaint.

In the Respondent's brief at pages 9 and 10, it is urged that:

> II. THE BOARD SHOULD HAVE REQUIRED
> THE EMPLOYEES IN THIS CASE TO > EXHAUST INTERNAL UNION REMEDIES.
> Section 101(a)(4) of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act provides that a union member may be required to exhaust internal union hearing procedures not exceeding four months before instituting proceedings before a court or administrative agency. In this case, had the Board stayed its hand and required the members to exhaust their remedies within the Union, the protected character of the fines imposed to ensure respect for the Union's picket line at the entrance reserved for the struck employer would have been obvious and the > expensive and long complaint and hearing process of the Board would have been obviated. This is not a case in which members have been punished for filing charges with the Board, nor in which internal union procedures are inadequate, nor in which public policy rather than the internal affairs of the Union are involved. It is instead a case in which a union has sought to protect the effectiveness of a strike and picketing by using available internal measures to require its own members to observe the reserved gate system. Where no unlawful secondary object was pursued, the Board should have respected those internal union measures.

[6] It makes no difference that the union discipline was imposed upon Ginestra and Bentley after they had completed work on the project. As we said in Stewart, quoting from an earlier case, "The 'cease doing business' element of Sec. 8(b)(4)(B) embraces prospective as well as existing business relationships, and does not require that the company-party to the primary dispute even be known at the time of the union conduct in question."

With regard to a person's "unimpeded access to the Board," the Supreme Court stated in N.L.R.B. v. Industrial Union of Marine & Shipbuilding Workers of America, AFL-CIO. et al. [United States Lines Company], 391 U.S. 418 at 424 (1968):

> A proceeding by the Board is not to adjudicate private rights but to effectuate a public policy. The Board cannot initiate its own proceedings; implementation of the Act is dependent "upon the initiative of individual persons." Nash v. Florida Industrial Comm'n, 389 U.S. 235, 238. The policy of keeping people "completely free from coercion," ibid., against making complaints to the Board is therefore important in the functioning of the Act as an organic whole.

Congress has not incorporated the language found in Section 101(a)(4) of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act into the National Labor Relations Act. After considering the foregoing, I conclude that the failure of 11 persons involved in this proceeding to exhaust their internal union remedies does not preclude the processing of the General Counsel's consolidated complaint nor the finding of unfair labor practices under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Employer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Cal-Built Construction and Buena Vista Properties, Inc., are persons and employers engaged in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

3. The Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by restraining and coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act by charging, trying, fining, or otherwise disciplining Ron Pursley, Mel Ellison, Steve Gerhardt, Mike O'Connor, Mark Valencia, Ray E. Thomas, John Schembri, Roger Haynes, Richard Crawford, and Tim Becker in order to induce or encourage them to withhold their services from a neutral employer, with an object of forcing or requiring the neutral employer to cease doing business with a primary employer.

5. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act by charging, trying, fining, or otherwise disciplining Ron Pursley, Mel Ellison, Steve Gerhardt, Mike O'Connor, Mark Valencia, Ray E. Thomas, John Schembri, Roger Haynes, Richard Crawford, Tim Becker, Gary Fishback, and Doug Chickering in order to induce or encourage them to withhold their services from a neutral employer or other person engaged in commerce, or in an industry affecting commerce, with an object of forcing or requiring such neutral employer or other person to cease doing business with a primary employer.

6. The unfair labor practices set forth above affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Since I have found that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act, I shall recommend to the Board that the Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from engaging in those unfair labor practices.

I shall also recommend to the Board that the Respondent take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act. Such affirmative action will include rescinding the disciplinary action taken against the 12 persons involved in this proceeding, expunging from the Respondent's records all references to the intraunion charges a and refunding the amount of the fines paid by the individuals involved. In addition, appropriate interest is to be paid by the Respondent to the individuals on the amounts to the refund. Such interest is to be computed in accordance with the Board's decisions in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). See also the Board's decision in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

In accordance with the Board's decision in Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), I shall recommend to the Board a narrowly drafted cease-and-desist order rather than a broadly drafted one.

On the basis of the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record in this proceeding, and pursuant to the provisions of Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[1]

The Respondent, Ventura County District Council of Carpenters, Ventura, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

[1] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Roger Haynes, Richard Crawford, and Tim Becker, or any of its members, in order to induce or encourage them to withhold their services from a neutral employer, with an object of forcing or requiring the neutral employer to cease doing business with a primary employer.

(b) Charging, trying, fining, or otherwise disciplining Ron Pursley, Mel Ellison, Steve Gerhardt, Mike O'Connor, Mark Valencia, Ray E. Thomas, John Schembri, Roger Haynes, Richard Crawford, Tim Becker, Gary Fishback, and Doug Chickering, or any of its members, in order to induce or encourage them to withhold their services from a neutral employer or other person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, with an object of forcing or requiring such neutral employer or other person to cease doing business with a primary employer.

(c) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is deemed necessary in order to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Rescind disciplinary action taken against the 12 persons named above and expunge from its records any reference to that discipline.

(b) Refund to each one of the 12 persons named above any money held on account of the fines assessed against them in connection with the aforesaid disciplinary action, with interest, as set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Post at its offices and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[2] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being duly signed by the Respondent's representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Sign and return to the Regional Director for Region 31 sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix" for posting by Commercial Industrial Constructors, Inc., if that employer is willing to do so, in conspicuous places, including all places where the employer customarily posts notices to its employees.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 31, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT restrain and coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, by charging, trying, fining, or otherwise disciplining Ron Pursley, Mel Ellison, Steve Gerhardt, Mike O'Connor, Mark Valencia, Ray E. Thomas, John Schembri, Roger Haynes, Richard Crawford, and Tim Becker, or any of our members, in order to induce or encourage them to withhold their services from a neutral employer, with an object of forcing or requiring the neutral employer to cease doing business with a primary employer.

WE WILL NOT charge, try, fine, or otherwise discipline Ron Pursley, Mel Ellison, Steve Gethardt, Mike O'Connor, Mark Valencia, Ray E. Thomas, John Schembri, Roger Haynes, Richard Crawford, Tim Becker, Gary Fishback, and Doug Chickering, or any of our members, in order to induce or encourage them to withhold their services from a neutral employer or other person engaged in commerce, or in an industry affecting commerce, with an object of forcing or requiring such neutral employer or other person to cease doing business with a primary employer.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL rescind the disciplinary action taken by us against the 12 persons named above, and WE WILL expunge from our records any reference to that discipline.

WE WILL refund to the 12 persons named above any money held on account of the fines assessed against them in connection with the aforesaid disciplinary action, and WE WILL pay them appropriate interest on such money.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On July 1, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed in the instant cases a Motion for Summary Judgment and To Transfer Cases to the Board alleging that Harbor Construction Company, Inc.; Peninsula Metal Structures, Inc.; Pac West, Inc., et al.; Bruce Beard, individually; Bruce Beard d/b/a Peninsula Metal Structures; Bruce Beard d/b/a Pac West; Bruce Beard d/b/a Harbor Construction Company, Inc., et al., hereinafter called Respondent, constitute a single employer, and that, as such, it had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. A copy of the motion was sent by certified mail to each entity named as Respondent. On July 9, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause, granting Respondent until July 23, 1981, to respond to the motion. On July 29, 1981, 6 days past the filing deadline, Bruce Beard, individually, and Pac West, Inc., hereinafter called Beard and Pac West, respectively, filed a motion requesting that the Board deny the General Counsel's motion, and permit Beard and Pac West to file an answer to the complaint, or permit them to file a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

The proceeding was originated by a charge in Case 19–CA–12824 filed on October 1, 1980,[1] by Seattle District Council of Carpenters, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, hereinafter called the Union, against Peninsula Metal Structures, hereinafter called Peninsula, alleging that Peninsula had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by repudiating the parties' collective-bargaining agreement. A copy of the charge was sent by certified mail to Peninsula at its business address, 131 Second Avenue South, Edmonds, Washington. On November 12, the Union amended the charge to include Harbor Construction Company, hereinafter called Harbor, as a Respondent. The amended charge was sent by certified mail to Harbor at the same Second Avenue address listed for Peninsula.

On October 27, Darrell Dewayne Bash filed a charge in Case 19–CA–12904 alleging that Peninsula had violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging him because he cooperated with the Union and by refusing to pay him the wages required by the collective-bargaining agreement Peninsula had with the Union. He amended the charge on November 12 to include Harbor as a Respondent. Both the original and amended charges were sent by certified mail to Peninsula and Harbor at their Second Avenue address.

On October 27, Lonnie Bash filed a charge in Case 19–CA–12905 alleging that Peninsula had violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying him off because he "joined with" the Union and by refusing to pay him in accordance with the parties' collective-bargaining agreement. He amended the charge on November 10 to include Harbor as a Respondent. Peninsula and Harbor were sent copies of the original and amended charges by certified mail at their Second Avenue address.

On November 13, the Regional Director for Region 19 ordered the consolidation of these three cases and issued a consolidated complaint and notice of hearing. The consolidated complaint alleges, inter alia, that Peninsula and Harbor are a single integrated enterprise and/or are alter egos, and that Peninsula and Harbor had violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act in the manner set forth in the charges. The consolidated complaint was served by certified mail on Peninsula and Harbor.

On January 20, 1981, the attorney asigned to the cases by the Region wrote the following letter:

> Harbor Construction Company
> Peninsula Metal Structures
> 131 Second Avenue South

Case Nos. 19-CA-12824, 19-CA-12904, 19-CA-12905

Dear Mr. Beard:

As you were advised telephonically on April 15, 1981, unless an Answer to the Complaint issued in the above referenced cases are [sic] received in this office by Friday, April 17, this office will move for a Summary Judgment in those cases.

My records indicate that you are not represented by Counsel in these cases. If you retain Counsel, please advise me accordingly.

As I previously advised you, it would be mutually beneficial if these cases were settled outside of trial. Thus, in the event you now wish to discuss settlement possibilities, or require my assistance, please contact me at 442-5693.

Sincerely yours,
Cora Vaughn
Attorney

On April 22, 1981, the Union filed a charge in Case 19-CA-13483 naming Harbor, Peninsula, "Pac West, Inc., et al.; Bruce Beard, Individually; Bruce Beard d/b/a Harbor Construction Company, Bruce Beard d/b/a Peninsula Metal Structures, Bruce Beard d/b/a Pack [sic] West, Inc., et al." as Respondent. The charge alleges that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by repudiating the collective-bargaining agreement in a number of specified ways. The charge also alleges that the "Employer is currently operating under the name Pac West, Inc.," and that "Pac West is a joint employer or alter-ego of Harbor Construction Company and Peninsula Metal Structures." The charge further alleges that "[a]ll of the above companies are either owned or managed by Bruce Beard." A copy of this charge was sent by certified mail to the Second Avenue address listed for Respondent on the charge.

On June 4, 1981, the Regional Director for Region 19 issued a second order consolidating cases and consolidated complaint and notice of hearing. The second consolidated complaint alleges that "Respondents Peninsula, Pac West, Harbor, Bruce Beard and any other companies that have been or may be formed by Respondent Bruce Beard to disguise the continuation of Harbor are, and have been at all times material herein, alter egos and a single employer within the meaning of the Act." The second consolidated complaint also alleges that "Respondents Harbor, Peninsula and Pac West have common ownership, common supervision, interchangeability of employees and equipment and centralized control of labor relations policies." The violations alleged in this second consolidated complaint are identical to those alleged in the first consolidated complaint. Return receipts for service of the second consolidated complaint show that service was made in the names of Peninsula and Harbor at the Second Avenue address listed on the charge.

On July 1, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment and To Transfer Cases to the Board. The motion restates the history of the proceedings, summarizes the alleged violations, and further alleges that, since January 5, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel sought to communicate personally by telephone and letter with Respondent's president, Bruce Beard, regarding the need for prompt compliance with the requirement for filing an answer. The motion also alleges that Respondent had neither filed an answer nor requested an extension of time to file an answer. A "Certification of Nonfiling of Answer," made by the Acting Regional Director for Region 19, certified that Respondent had neither filed an answer nor requested an extension of time. The certificate of service attached to the motion shows individual service by certified mail on Peninsula, Harbor, Pac West, and Beard.

On July 9, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause, granting Respondent until July 23, 1981, to answer the motion. Harbor and Peninsula failed to respond, while on July 29, 1981, Beard and Pac West filed their motion seeking leave to file an answer to the complaint, or to respond to the Notice To Show Cause, and requesting that the Board deny the General Counsel's motion.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, provides as follows:

> The respondent shall, within 10 days from the service of the complaint, file an answer thereto. The respondent shall specifically admit, deny, or explain each of the facts alleged in the complaint, unless the respondent is without knowledge, in which case the respondent shall so state, such statement operating as a denial. All allegations in the complaint, if no answer is filed, or any allegation in the complaint not specifically denied or explained in an answer filed, unless the respondent shall state in the answer that he is without knowledge, shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board, unless good cause to the contrary is shown.

Beard and Pac West argue that their motion should be granted because their admitted failure to meet the deadlines for filing was excused by "confusion, lack of proper notice to them, and excusable neglect on their part and the part of their employees and agents in not recognizing that the nature of the case had changed with the addition of more parties." The motion also asserts that Beard never did business as Peninsula or Harbor, that Pac West is not a successor corporation to Harbor or an alter ego of Harbor or Peninsula, and that Beard and Pac West had a "valid and true defense." The motion also contends that neither Pac West, Inc., nor Bruce Beard, individually, were ever mailed a copy of the charge in Case 19-CA-13483 or of the second order consolidating the cases.

The return receipt and the letter mailed with the charge in Case 19-CA-13483 indicate that Beard and Pac West were not individually served with copies of the charge. Rather, it appears that one copy of the charge, which named Pac West and Beard, was mailed jointly to all those named as Respondent at the Second Avenue address. Similarly, the affidavit of service attached to the second order consolidating the cases names Peninsula and Harbor as receiving copies at the Second Avenue address, but does not list Beard or Pac West as individually receiving copies. Concerning the failure to respond to the second consolidated complaint, neither Beard nor Pac West claims that they had no notice of the charge and the complaint in Case 19-CA-13483. In fact, their motion, which requests that they be excused from their failure to respond to the second consolidated complaint by the June 18, 1981, deadline because of "excusable neglect on their part and the part of their employees and agents in not recognizing that the nature of the case had changed with the addition of more parties," essentially admits having received the documents here in issue. As to their failure to respond to the Notice To Show Cause by the July 23, 1981, deadline, Beard and Pac West offer no excuse whatsoever.

We note that copies of the charge and complaint in Case 19-CA-13483 were sent to Respondent's business address, 131 Second Avenue South.[2] Section 11(4) of the Act provides that "[c]omplaints, orders, and other process and papers of the Board, its member, agent, or agency, may be served either personally or by registered mail or by telegraph or by leaving a copy thereof at the principal office or place of business of the person required to be served." There is no contention that Beard and Pac West did not share the Second Avenue business address, and, in fact, the affidavit of service attached to the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, which Beard and Pac West admit having received, shows service to Beard and Pac West at that address.

Accordingly, it appears that Beard and Pac West had actual notice and were served in accordance with the statutory requirements. Because they failed to respond in a timely manner to the complaint or to the Notice To Show Cause, or to demonstrate good cause for failing to do so, we hereby deny their motion. Furthermore, no good cause having been shown for Harbor's and Peninsula's failure to file an answer, the allegations of the complaint are deemed admitted and true, and we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Harbor and Peninsula are Washington corporations with an office and place of business in Edmonds, Washington, where they are engaged in the business of general construction. During the past 12 months, a representative period, Harbor and Peninsula had gross sales of goods and services valued in excess of $50,000, and purchased and caused to be transferred and delivered to their facilities within the State of Washington goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources outside that State or from suppliers within that State which in turn obtained such goods and materials directly from sources outside that State.

[2] The General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, which Beard and Pac West do not deny having received, asserts that this Second Avenue address is Respondent's business address. Nowhere in Respondent's motion does it challenge this assertion.

Pac West is a Nevada corporation with an office and place of business in Edmonds, Washington, where it is engaged in the business of general construction. During the past 12 months, a representative period, Pac West had gross sales of goods and services valued in excess of $500,000, and purchased and caused to be transferred and delivered to its facilities within the State of Washington goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources outside that State or from suppliers within that State which in turn obtained such goods and materials directly from sources outside that State.

Harbor, Peninsula, and Pac West have common ownership, common supervision, interchangeability of employees and equipment, and centralized control of labor relations policies.

Peninsula and Pac West were established by Beard as a subordinate instrument to and a disguised continuation of Harbor.

Peninsula, Pac West, Harbor, Bruce Beard, and any other companies that have been or may be formed by Beard to disguise the continuation of Harbor are alter egos and a single employer within the meaning of the Act, and have been at all times material herein.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Harbor, Peninsula, Pac West, and Bruce Beard, are, and have been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Seattle District Council of Carpenters, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO, is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All employees employed by Respondent as journeymen or apprentice carpenters in the construction industry.

The Union has been the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit since October 1972, and it continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Refusal To Bargain

Respondent has entered into successive collective-bargaining agreements with the Union since October 1972. The most recent collective-bargaining agreement is effective by its terms for the period June 1, 1977, to May 31, 1981. Since on or about June 5, 1980, Respondent has refused to apply the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement to, or to recognize the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of, its employees working as journeymen or apprentice carpenters in the construction industry.

Accordingly, we find that, by the conduct described above, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

C. The Threat and the Discriminatory Discharges

In or about the month of June 1980, Respondent told employees that they could retain their jobs only if they agreed to work for below union scale wages.

Accordingly, we find that, by the conduct described above, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

In or about the month of June 1980, Respondent laid off or discharged employees Darrell Dewayne Bash and Lonnie Bash, and has failed and refuse to recall or reinstate them to their same or to substantially equivalent positions, because they joined or assisted the Union or otherwise engaged in union activities.

Accordingly, we find that, by the conduct described above, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with Respondent's operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We will, inter alia, order Respondent to give effect to the terms and provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement retroactively to June 5, 1980. We will also order Respondent to make whole its employees for any losses they may have suffered as a result of Respondent's refusal to abide by that agreement, plus interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[3]

We will also order that Respondent make whole Darrell Dewayne Bash and Lonnie Bash for any losses they may have suffered because of Respondent's unlawful conduct in discharging or laying them off by paying them a sum equal to what each would have earned, less any net interim earnings, in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as set forth above.

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Harbor Construction, Inc.; Peninsula Metal Structures, Inc.; Pac West, Inc., et al.; Bruce Beard, individually; Bruce Beard d/b/a Peninsula Metal Structures; Bruce Beard d/b/a Pac West; Bruce Beard d/b/a Harbor Construction Company, Inc., et al., is an employer engaged in commerce with the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Seattle District Council of Carpenters, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Since on or about October 1972, and at all times material herein, the Union has been the designated exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees, pursuant to Section 9(a) of the Act, in the following appropriate unit:

> All employees employed by Respondent as journeymen or apprentice carpenters in the construction industry.

4. In or about the month of June 1980, Respondent, at its construction site, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening its employees that they could retain their jobs only if they worked for below union scale wages.

5. At all times material herein, Respondent has refused to recognize the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees working as journeymen or apprentice carpenters, and has refused to apply the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement to its employees working as journeymen or apprentice carpenters, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. In or about the month of June 1980, Respondent, at its construction site, discharged or laid off Darrell Dewayne Bash and Lonnie Bash, and has failed and refused to recall or otherwise reinstate them to their same or substantially equivalent positions, because these employees joined or assisted the Union or otherwise engaged in union activities, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Harbor Construction Company, Inc.; Peninsula Metal Structures, Inc.; Pac West, Inc., et al.; Bruce Beard, individually; Bruce Beard d/b/a Peninsula Metal Structures; Bruce Beard d/b/a Pac West; Bruce Beard d/b/a Harbor Construction Company, Inc., et al., Edmonds, Washington, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to recognize and to bargain collectively regarding wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with Seattle District Council of Carpenters, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All employees employed by Respondent as journeymen or apprentice carpenters in the construction industry.

(b) Refusing to apply the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union effective from June 1, 1977, to May 31, 1981.

(c) Threatening its employees that they could retain their jobs only if they agreed to work for below union scale wages.

(d) Discharging or laying off its employees, and failing and refusing to reinstate them to their same or substantially equivalent positions, because they have joined or assisted the Union or otherwise engaged in union activities.

---

[3] Member Jenkins would award interest on sums due under the Order herein based on the formula set forth in his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit described in paragraph 1(a) above regarding wages, hours, and other terms, and conditions of employment.

(b) Give effect to the terms and provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement retroactively to June 5, 1980.

(c) Make whole its employees for their loss of wages and other benefits which are provided for in the collective-bargaining agreement as provided in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(d) Offer Darrell Dewayne Bash and Lonnie Bash immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed.

(e) Make employees Darrell Dewayne Bash and Lonnie Bash whole for any loss of earnings due to the discrimination practiced against them in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(f) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(g) Post at its Edmonds, Washington, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(h) Notify the Regional Director for Region 19, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Act gives all employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

We will not refuse to recognize or to bargain collectively regarding wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with Seattle District Council of Carpenters, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the following appropriate unit:

All employees employed by us as journeymen or apprentice carpenters in the construction industry.

We will not refuse to apply the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union effective from June 1, 1977, to May 31, 1981.

We will not threaten our employees that they could retain their jobs only if they agreed to work for below union scale wages.

We will not discharge or lay off our employees, and fail and refuse to reinstate them to their same or substantially equivalent positions, because they have joined or assisted the Union or otherwise engaged in union activities.

We will not in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

We will, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit described above regarding wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.

---

[4] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

WE WILL give effect to the terms and provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement retroactively to June 5, 1980.

WE WILL make whole our employees for their loss of wages and other benefits which are provided for in the collective-bargaining agreement, plus interest.

WE WILL offer Darrell Dewayne Bash and Lonnie Bash immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed.

WE WILL make employees Darrell Dewayne Bash and Lonnie Bash whole for any loss of earnings due to the discrimination practiced against them, plus interest.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On May 13, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Lowell Goerlich issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, both the General Counsel and Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified herein, and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.

The Administrative Law Judge found, and we agree, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating employees with respect to their union activities and sympathies, by threatening employees with reprisals and soliciting grievances from employees in order to influence their union affection, and by promulgating and continuing in effect an invalid no-solicitation rule.[2] We also agree with the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by suspending employees Jeffrey Smith and Richard Burton,[3] and by discharging employees Michael Smead,[4] James Hunt, and Roy Rine because of their union activities,[5] and that Re-

[1] Both the General Counsel and Respondent have excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] The Administrative Law Judge found that Respondent's maintenance of a no-solicitation rule violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act because it prohibited solicitation of union support by employees during the entire workday. Specifically, rule 16 in Respondent's personnel manual read as follows:

> Employees will be subject to disciplinary action for any of the following offenses . . . . Vending, soliciting, or collecting contributions for any purpose, unless authorized by Management.

Respondent excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's finding. Respondent does not claim that the above rule was valid, but contends that the rule was rescinded on February 14, 1980, and a valid no-solicitation rule was promulgated on that date. The new rule, rule 17, reads:

> The following will constitute violations of company rules . . . . Distributing written or printed literature during working time.

We agree with the Administrative Law Judge. We note that union organizing campaigns at the Company had existed for several months prior to Respondent's rescission of Rule 16, and we may reasonably infer that, during this time period, Respondent's maintenance of an invalid rule inhibited the union activities of its employees. We further note that, at the time Respondent promulgated rule 17, it never explicitly repudiated rule 16, and there is no evidence that employees were aware that the rule had been changed. Respondent's belated and unannounced rescission of its invalid no-solicitation rule does not absolve its violation of the Act. See, e.g., Automated Products, Inc., 242 NLRB 424 (1979).

Moreover, under our recent decision in T.R.W. Bearings Division, a Division of T.R.W. Inc., 257 NLRB No. 47 (1981), rule 17 would also be invalid. The phrase "working time" no longer confers presumptive validity upon a no-solicitation rule. For a no-solicitation rule to be acceptable, it must clearly indicate to employees that they may engage in protected activity during periods of the workday when they "are properly not engaged in performing their work tasks." T.R.W. Bearing Division, a Division of T.R.W., Inc., supra, sl. op., p. 6. Rule 17 does not conform to this requirement. However, the General Counsel has not alleged that Rule 17 was invalid and the validity of this rule was not litigated at the hearing. Therefore, we shall not find herein that Respondent, by promulgating rule 17, committed an independent violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[3] The Administrative Law Judge correctly found that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act by suspending employees Smith and Burton because of their union activities. He also found that, when Respondent's personnel director, Mark Nicolai, informed Smith and Burton of their suspensions, he told them that they were not to enter company premises during the length of their suspensions and, if they needed to contact anyone in the Company, they had to clear it through him. Nicolai also told Burton that "if [he] was to ever hand out any more printed literature that [he] would be terminated." The Administrative Law Judge found that "[s]ince the suspensions were invalid the above-noted restrictions placed by Respondent upon Smith and Burton interfered with their Section 7 rights and were in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act." The General Counsel agrees that these restrictions were invalid, but excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's reasoning as to why they were invalid. The General Counsel contends that they were invalid because they improperly interfered with the employees' union activities, not merely because they derived from the illegal suspensions. We agree with the General Counsel.

Respondent did not demonstrate that it routinely limited access to company property to suspended employees. Nor did it demonstrate that these restrictions were in any way related to the maintenance of company production or discipline. These restrictions were directed solely to union activists and were aimed at hindering their ability to pursue union activities. For these reasons, the restrictions violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[4] We agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent discharged employee Michael Smead because of his union activities, in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. However, we do not agree that the determination of whether Smead is fit for reemployment with Respondent should be left to the compliance stage of these proceedings. The record evidence convinces us that we should order reinstatement herein.

Smead was discharged during the morning of November 2, along with six other employees, for wearing a union button. He returned later in the day and directed obscene language toward two of Respondent's managers and verbally threatened them with physical harm. Smead's abusive behavior was provoked by his discriminatory discharge. While we do not condone his conduct, we do not believe that it warrants his forfeiting the opportunity for reinstatement. See Hagerty Catering Company, 236 NLRB 1553, 1557 (1978). Key City Mechanical Contractors, Inc., 227 NLRB 1884, 1888-89 (1977).

Member Jenkins would compute interest on backpay due in the manner set forth in his partial dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

[5] Member Jenkins does not rely on Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), in finding the discharges herein violative of the Act. That decision applies only to cases in which it is necessary to identify the cause of a discharge where both a genuine lawful spondent did not violate the Act by discharging employee Joseph Hadley.[6]

However, we disagree with the Administrative Law Judge in two respects. We find certain statements made by Respondent's foreman, William Wagner, to employee Charles Pelfrey to constitute threats of reprisal for union activity in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. We also find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging employee David Hall because of his union activities.

In late March 1980, Pelfrey, an outspoken UAW adherent, was working overtime in the presence of Wagner. As set forth by the Administrative Law Judge, Pelfrey testified with respect to their conversation as follows:

> Well, I asked Mr. Wagner if there was any truth to the Company moving to Indiana because there had been rumors going around that the Company was going to move. Frequently rumors travel through the Company, and he told me that he wasn't sure whether or not the Company was going to move, but if it was, that he had planned on moving with the Company. I asked him if the employees would have the opportunity to move with the Company or whether they would just be left behind, and if the Company would hire all new employees, and he told me that the Company would probably give the employees a chance to relocate except for the union organizers. He said that the Company would not be taking them with them, because if they moved, that is what they would be trying to get away from in the first place.

The Administrative Law Judge found that Wagner's statements were "highly speculative and lacked positiveness" and therefore did not violate the Act. The General Counsel excepts to this finding and contends that these remarks consituted a veiled threat that Respondent would close its plant and relocate in order to avoid unionization. We agree with the General Counsel.

Although Wagner did not positively declare that Respondent would relocate, his statement strongly suggests that Respondent was at least contemplating moving. Moreover, by stating that if it did relocate, Respondent would not hire the union organizers because "that is what they would be trying to get away from," Wagner indicated that Respondent planned to retaliate for the employees' union activity. It is clear that this statement, made during the course of Respondent's extensive unfair labor practices, would tend to discourage union activities among the employees. In fact, Pelfrey repeated Wagner's statement to at least five other employees. Accordingly, we find that, through Foreman Wagner, Respondent threatened its employees with reprisals for their union activities, thus coercing them in the exercise of their Section 7 rights, and violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[7]

David Hall was originally hired by Respondent on June 28, 1979, and was discharged for poor attendance on September 18 of that year. In early January 1980,[8] he was reemployed by the Company.[9]

On February 22, Hall attended a luncheon provided by Respondent for its employees. Hall wore a button and a cap indicating that he was a member of the United States Steelworkers of America and he sat at a table with several employees who were similarly decorated. An individual who introduced himself as Jim Lauren of Respondent's sales department walked over to Hall's table and asked him his views concerning unionization at the plant. Hall replied that he desired union representation, because the employees needed a "middle man" between themselves and Respondent.[10]

In fact, Lauren was not a member of Respondent's sales department but was the vice president of West Coast Industrial Relations, a management consulting firm. According to Respondent's personnel director, Mark Nicolai, Lauren came to the plant on February 22 "to ascertain whether or not his firm would be of any service to us in initiating and conducting a union avoidance campaign." Lauren spent the day investigating the likelihood of reason and a genuine unlawful reason exist. In each of the discharges found violative in this case, Respondent's asserted reason has been determined to be a pretext, leaving only the genuine unlawful reason as the actual cause for the discharge. To attempt to apply Wright Line in such situations is futile, confusing, and misleading.

[6] In excepting to the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Respondent's discharge of Hadley did not violate the Act, the General Counsel attributes considerable significance to events which occurred on April 16, one day before Hadley was informed of his discharge. On that day, Hadley leafleted at Respondent's plant and was observed by several supervisors. We note, however, that Hadley was discharged by Nicolai on April 11 as part of an overall reduction in Respondent's work force necessitated by slow sales. Hadley had been laid off for lack of work since April 3, and thus was not informed of his discharge until he returned to work on April 17. However, his termination slip is clearly dated April 11, and the General Counsel provides us with no direct evidence that this date is not authentic. Accordingly, Respondent's knowledge of Hadley's activities on April 16 is not relevant to our determination of whether his discharge violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act.

[7] See PPG Industries, Inc., Lexington Plant, Fiber Glass Division, 251 NLRB 1146 (1980).

[8] All dates are in 1980 unless otherwise indicated.

[9] Hall applied to Vonda Shay, the wife of Respondent's president, and she decided to rehire him.

[10] This account of the incident is, of necessity, based entirely on Hall's testimony, as Lauren failed to respond to a subpena ordering him to appear at the hearing.

unionization at the plant and conferring with Nicolai and other management personnel.[11]

On February 29, Nicolai discharged Hall. He informed him that his reemployment violated a company policy prohibiting rehire of former employees who had previously been discharged for cause. At the hearing, Nicolai testified that this policy was instituted when he became personnel director on January 21, 1980.[12] He stated that he had not known that Hall had been discharged for cause until February 22, when Harry Shay informed him of this fact and Shay suggested that Hall be fired.

The Administrative Law Judge found that the General Counsel did not demonstrate that Lauren's conversation with Hall was communicated to any representative of Respondent. On this basis, he found that the General Counsel failed to establish a prima facie case sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to discharge Hall. He further found that Respondent would have discharged Hall in the absence of protected conduct, on the basis of Respondent's policy prohibiting rehire of employees discharged for cause.[13] We find, to the contrary, that there is adequate evidence on the record to demonstrate that Respondent was aware of Hall's union activity, that this activity was a motivating factor in his discharge, and that Respondent would not have discharged Hall in the absence of this activity.

Although, as indicated by the Administrative Law Judge, there is no direct evidence that Respondent had knowledge of Hall's support for the Steelworkers, on the basis of the record evidence we may easily infer that Respondent was aware of Hall's union activity. Hall wore Steelworkers insignia for several weeks prior to his discharge. It is unlikely that Shay, who told Nicolai that he saw Hall on February 22, would have failed to notice his union button and cap. Moreover, it is inconceivable that Lauren did not relate his conversation with Hall to Nicolai, Shay, or other managerial employees of Respondent with whom he met later that day. Lauren's visit to the plant was subsidized by Respondent so that he would personally determine the extent of unionization among the employees. We cannot believe that he would have kept the results of his surreptitious investigation to himself. This conclusion is further reinforced by the fact that Hall was discharged within 1 week of his conversation with Lauren, and by the clearly pretextual nature of Respondent's asserted reasons for discharging him.

Respondent's alleged policy of not hiring employees who had been previously discharged was never reduced to writing. Moreover, the alleged policy was not even in existence when Hall was rehired. Additionally, although Nicolai claims that he refused to hire several applicants who had previously been discharged, Respondent does not claim that the Company ever fired any other employee who was rehired in violation of this policy. In fact, Nicolai admitted that he never looked through the personnel files to determine whether there were any other such employees. For these reasons, we find that Respondent failed to demonstrate that it discharged Hall pursuant to a consistent, uniformly applied policy. Rather, Respondent invented this policy as a convenient pretext after the decision was made to discharge Hall because of his union activities.[14] Accordingly, we find that Hall's discharge violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Model A and Model T Motor Car Reproduction Corporation, Battle Creek, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a):

"(a) Discouraging activities on behalf of United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC, or International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), or any other labor organization, by discharging, suspending, or otherwise discriminating against employees in any manner with respect to their hire or tenure of employment, or any term or condition of employment."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a):

"(a) Offer Michael Smead, Roy Rine, David Hall, and James Hunt immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging if necessary any employees hired to replace them, and make them whole for any loss of pay or other benefits suffered by Respondent's unlawful discharge of them, in accordance with the recommendations set forth in the section of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision entitled 'The Remedy.'"

---

[11] Respondent compensated Lauren for his work on February 22, and reimbursed him for expenses incurred. However, Respondent did not further retain his firm.

[12] The policy was thus instituted subsequent to Hall's reemployment.

[13] His analysis was based on the test that we set forth in Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., supra.

[14] In light of our disposition of this issue, we find it unnecessary to rule on the General Counsel's contention that Lauren was acting as an agent of Respondent and that his knowledge should therefore be imputed to Respondent.

3. Insert the following as paragraph 2(c) and reletter subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(c) Expunge from its files any reference to the disciplinary suspensions of Smith and Burton and to the discharges of Smead, Rine, Hall, and Hunt, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of those unlawful disciplinary actions will not be used as a basis for future discipline against them."

4. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT discourage activities on behalf of United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC, or International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), or any other labor organization, by discharging, suspending, or otherwise discriminating against employees with respect to their hire or tenure of employment, or any term or condition of employment.

WE WILL NOT unlawfully interrogate employees with respect to their union activities or sympathies.

WE WILL NOT unlawfully solicit grievances in order to influence our employees' union affection.

WE WILL NOT continue in effect an invalid no-solicitation rule.

WE WILL NOT unlawfully threaten reprisals because of our employees' union sympathies.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL offer Michael Smead, Roy Rine, David Hall, and James Hunt immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if their jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, discharging if necessary any employees hired to replace them, and WE WILL make them whole, with interest, for any loss of pay they may have suffered because we unlawfully discharged them.

WE WILL make whole Jeffrey Smith and Richard Burton, with interest, for any lost pay they may have suffered by reasons of their suspensions from February 18 to February 21, 1980.

WE WILL expunge from our files any references to the disciplinary suspensions of Smith and Burton, and to the discharges of Smead, Rine, Hall, and Hunt, and WE WILL notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful actions will not be used as a basis for future discipline against them.

MODEL A AND MODEL T MOTOR CAR REPRODUCTION CORPORATION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

LOWELL GOERLICH, Administrative Law Judge: The charge in Case 7-CA-17064, filed by United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC, herein referred to as the Steelworkers, on November 13, 1979, was served by registered mail on Model A and Model T Motor Car Reproduction Corporation, Respondent herein, on November 15, 1979. A complaint and notice of hearing was issued on December 28, 1979. The charges in Cases 7-CA-17412(2) and 7-CA-17450 filed by the Steelworkers on February 15, 1980, and February 27, 1980, respectively, were served on Respondent by registered mail on or about February 20 and 29, 1980. The charges in Cases 7-CA-17561(1) and 7-CA-17561(2), filed by International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), herein referred to as the Autoworkers, on March 24, 1980, were served on Respondent by registered mail on or about March 27, 1980. An order consolidating cases and amended complaint and notice of hearing was issued April 30, 1980. The charge in Case 7-CA-17643, filed by the Autoworkers on April 11, 1980, was served on Respondent by registered mail on or about April 14, 1980. A complaint and notice of hearing in Case 7-CA-17643, and an order consolidating cases, were issued May 27, 1980. The charge in Case 7-CA-17774, filed by the Steelworkers on May 14, 1980, was served on Respondent on or about May 16, 1980. A complaint and notice of hearing in Case 7-CA-17774 and an order consolidating cases was issued on June 30, 1980. The charge in Case 7-CA-18030, filed by the Autoworkers on July 21, 1980, was served by certified mail on Respondent on or about July 24, 1980. A complaint and notice of hearing in Case 7-CA-18030 and an order consolidating cases were issued on August 7, 1980. Complaints in the consolidated cases allege that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein referred to as the Act.

Respondent filed timely answers denying that it had engaged in or was engaging in the unfair labor practices alleged.

The consolidated cases came on for hearing in Marshall, Michigan, on September 9, 10, and 11, 1980, and Battle Creek, Michigan, on November 18, 19, and 20, 1980. Each party was afforded a full opportunity to be heard, to call, examine, and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally on the record, to submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions, and to file briefs. All briefs have been carefully considered.

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, a corporation duly organized under, and existing by virtue of, the laws of the State of Michigan.

At all times material herein, Respondent has maintained its principal office and place of business at 200 Elm Street, in the city of Battle Creek, and State of Michigan, herein called the Elm Street plant. Respondent maintains an additional facility at 4950 W. Dickman Road, in the city of Battle Creek, and State of Michigan, herein called the Dickman Road plant. Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of reproductions of antique automobiles and related products. The Elm Street and Dickman Road plants located at Battle Creek, Michigan, are the only facilities involved in this proceeding.

Since about July 1979, at which time Respondent commenced its operations, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, manufactured, sold, and distributed, at its Elm Street and Dickman Road plants, products valued in excess of $500,000, of which products valued in excess of $50,000 were shipped from said plants directly to points located outside the State of Michigan.

Respondent is now and has been at all times material herein an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC, and International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), are now and have been at all times material herein labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The 8(a)(1) Violations and the Discharge of Union Button Wearers

In October 1979, Jeffrey Smith, an employee of Model A and Model T Motor Car Reproduction Corporation, contacted United Steelworkers of America and arranged for a meeting between a Steelworkers representative and employees of Respondent. In addition to Smith, employees Richard Burton, Randy Chilton, Steve Cica, Ivan Head, Walter Kilborn, and David Woods attended the first meeting held at the Ironworkers Hall in Battle Creek, Michigan, between the Union and the employees on October 19, 1979. Cards were distributed at this meeting and a few were signed. A time was set for a second meeting to be held on October 30, 1979.

Prior to the second Steelworkers meeting, on the morning of October 28, 1979, Danny Sanders, a supervisor at Respondent's Elm Street plant, distributed copies of a letter received by Respondent from the American Federation of Grain Millers. This letter, dated October 19, 1979, addressed to Harry Shay, president of Respondent, listed Smith, Chilton, Burton, Head, Kilborn, and Cica as among the employees constituting the organizing committee.[1]

At lunchtime on the same day, October 28, Danny Sanders addressed a group of workers, among whom were some of the employees mentioned in the Grain Millers' letter. Sanders said that "he wanted to know [the employees'] reasons for wanting a union," because "they wanted to know upstairs." In addition, "[he] told [employees] what the Company was planning to do for [them]"; the Company was "going to start a bonus program and vacations." He said that his uncle, Harry Shay (president of Respondent), was not a greedy man but felt that because Model A was a startup company a union was not needed at that time and that a "union would not give . . . job security." Sanders indicated that the employees would be better off without the Union and that the Company would give the employees more.

On October 30, 1979, employees Smith, Denise Warfield, Chilton, Burton, Head, Kilborn, Cica, Woods, Peter Dixon, and a woman named Mary Lou attended the second Steelworkers meeting. Jim Golden, the union representative, distributed buttons which read "Volunteer Organizer, United Steelworkers of America." Employees Burton, Cica, Chilton, Smith, Woods, Bill Wilson, and Michael Smead wore the Steelworkers buttons in the plant on October 31 and November 1 and 2, 1979.

On November 2, 1979, Smith, Burton, Chilton, Cica, Woods, Wilson, and Smead were discharged for insisting on wearing the union buttons while at work. Sanders told Wilson that he "couldn't wear [his union button] on company time." Sanders also ordered Smith to take his button off. Joe Shay, vice president of Respondent, told Smith on November 2 that he was "terminated" for wearing the button. Skip Turner, supervisor at Respondent's Elm Street plant, tapped Cica's button and said that "this is going to get you in trouble and anybody else wearing one will get in trouble also." Sanders told Cica that he "would have to take off the badge or leave." Joe Shay told Chilton and Woods that they "couldn't wear . . . union buttons on company time . . . and to take that button off or punch out." After Burton had punched out, he phoned Shay to ascertain if he were actually fired. Shay responded, "Yes, Richard . . . you are fired for wearing a badge. This is harassment to other workers."

[1] Although organizing on behalf of the Grain Millers continued, Cica, Burton, Smith, Woods, Chilton, and Wilson organized actively only on behalf of the Steelworkers after the Steelworkers meeting October 30, 1979. The Grain Millers is not a party to this case.

Thereafter Smith, Burton, Wilson, Woods, Cica, and Chilton, all discharged for wearing union buttons, were told by Maurice Halstead, a Steelworkers representative, to report back to work on November 8 or 9. All of the aforementioned returned to work as instructed and attempted to punch in at their regular starting time, 7 a.m. All were wearing buttons and some wore Steelworkers pocket holders. When they attempted to punch in, Skip Turner, a supervisor, told them not to punch in but rather to go upstairs to the cafeteria and wait. He also said "that the union did not hold up their agreement" and demanded that Chilton, Smith, and Burton take their buttons off. "[H]e said you are just asking for trouble again," and "do you want to go out the door again." Subsequently, all went up to the cafeteria but refused to remove their buttons as demanded by Turner. Smith, Burton, Chilton, and Cica waited in the cafeteria and were told by Turner that they "couldn't start work today that the union didn't hold up to their agreement." Turner did not explain the nature of this agreement and the above employees and Wilson and Woods (who did not wait in the cafeteria) were told to leave or to take off their buttons. All left. Approximately 7 weeks later, those employees received letters from the Company telling them that they could return to work immediately and to report to their normal stations. All the employees returned to work immediately upon receipt of the letter in December 1979.

"Unless special circumstances are present which justify the maintenance of production and discipline, an employer may not require an employee to remove union insignia while on the job in a plant. Such a restriction collides with the employees' rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act." The Loray Corporation, 184 NLRB 557, 577 (1970). Respondent offered no valid evidence which would sustain its right to restrict the wearing of union badges in its plants. Hence, by Respondent's threat to discharge employees for wearing union insignia and by its discharges of employees wearing union insignia, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.[2] See also Pay'n Save Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 641 F.2d 697 (9th Cir. 1981).

George Dunlap, an employee at the Elm Street plant and a volunteer organizer for the Steelworkers through April 1980, testified without contradiction that Skip Turner asked him on three occasions during the period October through January whether he was going to attend a union meeting. These inquiries usually occurred on Tuesday in the evening of which union meetings were held. Although it is not apparent whether Dunlap had begun wearing his button at this time, it is apparent that he had been attending Steelworkers meetings since October and that other employees had begun wearing their buttons.

The General Counsel claims that the interrogations by Sanders and Turner detailed above were in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. "Any interrogation by the employer relating to union matters presents an ever present danger of coercing employees in violation of their [Section] 7 rights." Texas Industries, Inc., et al. v. N.L.R.B., 336 F.2d 128, 133 (5th Cir. 1964). Such interrogation has the "natural tendency to instill in the minds of employees fear of discrimination on the basis of the information the employer has obtained." N.L.R.B. v. West Coast Casket Company, Inc., 205 F.2d 904 (9th Cir. 1953). In the instant case Respondent has shown no legitimate purpose in seeking the information requested nor did it assure the employees involved that they would be free from reprisals. Indeed, in the case of Sanders, the interrogations were accompanied with promises of benefits (a bonus program and vacations and that Respondent would give more without a union) and a threat that the Union would give no job security. The interrogations of employees by Sanders and Turner were in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

In respect to Sanders, the General Counsel additionally claims Sanders unlawfully solicited grievances citing Federal Yeast Corporation, 226 NLRB 1046, 1054 (1976). In support of the claim, Sanders' testimony reveals that he "asked them what their problems were . . . we knew we had problems, that we were a start up company and that [he] wanted to try to remedy as many as [he] could." Sanders added that he "didn't think the Union would be able to solve these problems." The General Counsel's point is well taken. The General Counsel concedes that the complaint contains no allegation regarding the solicitation of grievances; nevertheless, relying on Crown Zellerbach Corporation, 225 NLRB 911, 912 (1976), the General Counsel seeks an 8(a)(1) finding "inasmuch as the evidence supports such a finding, the matter is inextricably tied to a conversation that was specifically alleged, and the issue of the conversation was fully litigated." Since the General Counsel's assertion is supported by the record and the authority cited, an 8(a)(1) finding is hereby entered.

[2] On November 20, 1980, Respondent, Steelworkers, Autoworkers, and the General Counsel entered into a settlement stipulation constituting a partial agreement of the outstanding complaint allegations, which was approved by the Administrative Law Judge and by the Board on February 5, 1981. Provided for in the settlement stipulation was the reinstatement of Richard Burton, Jr., Randy Chilton, Steven Cica, Jeffrey Smith, David Woods, and Wilson, discharged on November 2, 1979, for protected concerted activity in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act and reinstated in late December 1979. Also included in the settlement was an amount due David Latta for Respondent's alleged refusal to grant a pay raise in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. A part of the stipulation further provided that the "General Counsel may present evidence in respect to the issues settled herein and said evidence may be considered by the Administrative Law Judge to the extent that it bears upon the unsettled issues in the aforementioned case."

The General Counsel further maintains that the following provision of the Employer's personnel manual constituted an unlawful no-solicitation rule:

> Employees will be subject to disciplinary action for any of the following offenses: . . . 16. Vending, soliciting, or collecting contributions for any purpose, unless authorized by Management.

The General Counsel argues that the rule is "impermissibly invasive for failing to distinguish between working and non-working time." The General Counsel relies on Lyman Steel Company, 249 NLRB 296, 303 (1980). Since the above rule on its face prohibits solicitation during working hours by employees on their own time or in work areas on their own time, which they may do absent unusual circumstances not here shown without permission of management, the rule is in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. T.B.C. Graphics, Inc., 214 NLRB 1003, 1004 (1974). Accordingly, Respondent, by maintaining in effect the invalid no-solicitation rule, was in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

B. Distribution of Union Leaflets by Smith and Burton

Jeffrey Smith distributed leaflets on behalf of the union organizing campaign once a week after he was reinstated in December 1979. On February 14, 1980, at 6:30 a.m. he and Richard Burton passed out leaflets inside the employee entrance. They stood three steps inside the entrance, adjacent to the loading dock area and as close to the wall as physically possible. At this time there was no work activity in the loading dock area for it was common practice for such activity not to begin until 8 a.m. In fact, the door to the loading dock was padlocked and the woman who kept the keys did not begin work until 8 a.m. Thus it was impossible to unlock the door until 1 hour after the 7 a.m. shift began. During preshift hours the area was used solely as an employee entrance. It was in fact the only entrance to the plant to be used by employees.

Employees Iris Swartz and Mildred Jackson entered the plant on February 14, 1980, through the employee entrance where Smith and Burton stood and distributed leaflets. Here, an incident occurred which they reported to Nicolai and which is described below in the statements submitted to Nicolai by Swartz and Jackson. Swartz' statement is as follows:

> Walked into building this morning and they were handing out pamphlets. She first said she didn't want one but finally took one. She was [sic] didn't know what they were. She turned around and tore it up and said she was not interested and proceeded to the time clock. The person then said "Why don't you take this to your Harry Shay" and used language she didn't catch. She then said "I'll do just that" and tried to take another pamphlet and he looked at her and used "F ASS." This upset her very much. She felt as if she was abused and intimidated.
> She clocked in and broke down in tears and went upstairs and by then was pretty upset. She went to Skip Turner's office and no one was there and tried one of the others and then Bob Shirk came along and asked her what was the matter. She asked if Mr. Harry Shay was in and Mr. Shirk said come on and sit down and she told him what happened.
> Iris identified the one of the persons as Jeff Smith.

Jackson's statement is as follows:

> She came in the building and they were standing at the door and she said she didn't want any and that they were not supposed to be standing at the door handing out papers. She went over to talk with the guard. They said take this up to your GD Harry Shay. She was pretty sure it was Jeff Smith. She then walked over to the guard. She turned around and Iris was crying.
> Mildred does not know what Union it is.
> Mildred was not around Iris when they were talking to her.

After these statements were composed, Nicolai called Smith and Burton to his office on February 15, 1980, and read to them the following rule, published in Respondent's personnel policy manual, distributed February 13, 1980:

> The following will constitute violations of Company rules:
> * * * * *
> 16. Threatening, intimidating, coercing, or interfering with fellow employees

Nicolai also read the following:

> PLANT SOLICITATIONS
> Our Company is interested in fund raising drives and requests for contributions within our community. However, in order to maintain efficiency and prevent littering we must have certain rules.
> Employees are not allowed to engage in any oral solicitation during working time in any work areas. Employees are not allowed to distribute any printed material in work areas during either working or non working time.
>
> Persons who are not employees are not to be allowed on the Company premises at any time to engage in either oral solicitation or the distribution of printed material.[3] [Emphasis supplied.]

---

[3] Prior to February 13, 1980, the personnel policy manual of October 26, 1979, contained the following which governed the same areas of concern:

Continued

Nicolai asked Burton and Smith if they were "aware of the no-solicitation rule" and asked Smith if he "was aware of Rule 16" and if they understood its meaning. Both Smith and Burton answered affirmatively but "they stated it was not a work area." Smith also denied that he had "threatened, intimidated, or coerced a fellow employee." Nicolai then "executed a correction notice for Burton to the extent that he [Burton] received a written warning and was suspended for three days for violation of company policy in the distribution of printed material in a work area during working or nonworking time," and "prepared a similar one for Mr. Smith with the exception that he also received a warning and said warning also included and said for violating company rule 16, threatening, intimidating or coercing a fellow employee." Both Smith and Burton were suspended for 3 days commencing on February 18, 1980, and ending February 21, 1980. Smith refused to sign his warning slip acknowledging his receipt of a copy. Burton signed his slip and both were informed by Nicolai, that, as suspended employees they were not to enter "company premises during the length of their suspension," and that if they had "need to contact anyone in the company or any fellow employee, that they [were] to call [Nicolai] personally" so that he could "review the request and either grant it or relay a message." They were also told "not to pass out pamphlets anywhere on the premises again." Nicolai said to Burton, "if [he] was to even hand out any more printed literature that [he] would be terminated."[4] Smith and Burton returned to work on February 21, 1980, after their suspension. Respondent's no-distribution rule set out above apparently did not bar employees from distributing union leaflets in nonwork areas. Since the credible proof does not establish that the area in which Burton and Smith distributed union leaflets was a working area or that their distribution of union leaflets interfered with production or discipline or that there was any business justification for banning distribution of union leaflets in the area, the restriction which was placed upon Burton and Smith interfered with employees' Section 7 rights and was in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Thus it follows that their suspensions for distributing union pamphlets were in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. See The Times Publishing Company, 231 NLRB 207 (1977); Fluid Packaging Company, Inc., 247 NLRB 1469 (1980); and J. P. Stevens & Co., 244 NLRB 407, ALJD, sec. III,B,1,a.

Since the suspensions were invalid the above-noted restrictions placed by Respondent upon Smith and Burton interfered with their Section 7 rights and were in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

During February 1980, Harry Shay, president of Respondent, gave two luncheon meetings at the Elm Street plant which employees were free to attend and at which lunches were provided and paid for by Respondent. The first meeting was held on February 5 and "[t]he whole plant" or "at least 150" employees attended. Harry Shay gave a speech to the employees where he said, inter alia:[5]

> I'm Harry Shay and I'm President of this Company. . . . you have that Suggestion Box here that your [sic] free and we hope you will drop any comments you have at any time and to show you that we use that box, we type up every suggestion that goes into it and put our answers to it and we post it.

> . . . [T]here's been a lot of organizing activity from various Unions. . . . [U]sually when a company is approached with Unions, there is a grievance there is something wrong somewhere and we can't find out, I can't, what is wrong if the people really want a union here. Now, some of the comments I've heard that it have been said that among union organizers we know are totally wrong, which I'll point those out in a minute, and if anybody is being persuaded to join a union because of those things then they are absolutely being misled. Now, if there is any other reason or grievances you people have, then that is what we have the Suggestion Box for. Because at this point in time, we've said this over and over, this is a new Company, it is a start-up Company, these things are distractions.
> . . . [W]e were also told that the unions here understand that a start-up company needs time to get started and there's no efforts to distract the union right in the midst of organizing a company, that was told to us in writing. An absolute lie. It is pretty damn obvious around here that it is going on. So now what that does it disrupts the operation we've got and the effort were making just to get the Company going. The result of that is in order to organize apparently, they come up either because the organizers themselves don't know that's going on in the Company or their [sic] being misled since they are outsiders,

15. Threatening, intimidating, coercing or interfering with fellow employees.[First violation to result in written warning; second, week layoff; and third, discharge.] In addition to Smith, Burton, and Nicolai, Carl Searer, the plant manager, and Jim Krider, the general manager, were present. Both Smith and Burton had received the manual on February 13, 1980.

16. Vending, soliciting, or collecting contributions for any purpose, unless authorized by management. [First violation to result in written warning; second, day layoff; and third, discharge.]

17. Distributing written or printed matter of any description during working time.[First violation to result in written warning; second, day layoff; and third, discharge.]

[4] Testimony of Smith and Burton is credited here as Nicolai does not deny that he verbally instituted a broad no-solicitation, no-distribution rule. In fact on direct examination, Nicolai stated, "I do not allow anyone to distribute anything in the Company. If I find out that it is going on, I order it stopped to the extent that it is going on, I order it stopped to the extent that I will not even allow people to distribute the sale of Girl Scout cookies, Little League tickets, anything of that nature. There is no solicitation that goes on—there is none that has been authorized without my knowledge. If there is anything that does go on that I do discover, I stop it."

[5] This speech was taped by Mark Nicolai, corporate personnel director, and transcribed under his direction. It is credited as an accurate transcription. The General Counsel listened to the tapes provided by Respondent's counsel and agreed that the transcription could be submitted as an accurate reflection of Harry Shay's speech on February 5, 1980. In addition, the content of testimony concerning Shay's speech by three employees present at the meeting, Jeffrey Smith, Richard Burton, and Charles Pelfrey, virtually is identical to the content of the transcription.

> maybe they don't know what's going on. So your [sic] being misled by people within the Company, who themselves don't know whats going on. But, for example, I've seen a union thing out in writing saying we are now established for two years, we've had our start-up time and are ready to organize. Totally wrong. [Emphasis supplied.]

> Now we say we have incentives and some misunderstanding has come up here is that when we say we're working on something and we're looking to do something, some incentive program, bonuses and things like that . . . . So we are looking at various plans, one is a share project that is used by Coachman, we've talked to other companies that have these incentive programs, which one makes the people the happiest. . . . We hope we are going to have that plan worked out in two to four weeks. . . . Now, it was said that we made some promises in the past by some managers that are not here and we are not aware of them, so if anybody feels that's a hardship on them, some promises made, we would like you to just write it up and drop it in the Suggestion Box. I presume these are individual promises that we are talking about. We would like to know what they are and we will look into it. The only way I know how to bring those up is to drop your comment in there and we'll see what was promised.
> We mentioned previously they were trying to work toward a four day work week. We are still trying to work for it but that will be some weeks ahead. . . . So, the kind of news we get from all this disruption when we say talking about a union and at time when we are trying to organize our own company is disruptive, is the word we got from Ford yesterday. . . . Their [sic] telling us they've heard possible disruption company become uneasy. . . . These are the kind of problems that come up when you say this is not the time to be organizing a union. . . . We must convince Ford there is no disruption so these are the problems that we say don't belong to a new company. And that's why we say we need a little peace here and we were told we would have peace here in order to keep on our goal, which is producing cars, getting our creditability, showing our creditors we do what we say, paying the bills we are supposed to be paying and that sort of thing.
> . . . Unions don't guarantee more money or more benefits. They negotiate. Now, right now if anybody around here has anything to us we are always open to this listen to it, suggestion box. Most half of you know who the top is, if you want to get personal about it. Now what's happen the union, your dues would then hire a negotiator to speak for you and he would come in to meet and say what you want. You wouldn't say it he would say it. Typically we would engage in a negotiator, more of the company's money to go to that man to sit down with the union representative and two paid people, neither one having anything to do with the company, other than their [sic] paid to talk which then starts the negotiation. So I don't see, at this point in time, where you expect to find much from that and that's again why I say this is not the time to be organizing a union.
> . . . We have benefits here I understand that major medical insurance and things like that, that some 50 year old companies in this city do not give their employees yet. So we want to point that out. There is no union that requires deals. We look at everybody and we do the best we can do. . . .
> . . . We are not compelling anyone to stay we are just saying that you came into this Company, knowing what we are trying to do and let us do it. If you wanted to come in for an interview and say that when I get in here I'm going to reorganize your Company for you, you could have said it then and we would have said out the door. We didn't hire you to tell us how to reorganize this Company. So we would like you to bear that in mind. Nobody is a prisoner. They don't like working here they can leave. [Emphasis supplied.]
> . . . I recall that one day on Burnham Street, when we were over there, a person said he hadn't ate that day and didn't have a job and didn't have nothing to eat and wanted a job. We didn't need him there, we didn't need him for two months, but we hired him any way and then we brought him back here and he's one of them organizing the union now. It's too bad we didn't have a union then because he probably wouldn't have been hired but this is the kind of thing that we happen, we lean over, we try to consider everybody as individuals and they got a problem, what can we do to help. Then if their [sic] going to forget us as an individuals and start acting as a group, we have no choice than to turn around and act as a group. So I think that covers what I was trying to and hope that the next lunch we have will be one with some better news. Maybe the bonuses will be made or something like that. And, if you do have any questions, we can't answer them all here unless someone had a real vital question, we ask you to throw them in the box and we'll try to answer them for you, every one of them.

In his brief the General Counsel cites sections of the speech emphasized above and asserts that such passages state, "in essence, that Respondent would not knowingly have hired union organizers" and that "Shay's repeated encouragement in the speech of employees use of the 'suggestion box' also illegally solicits grievances in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act." In consideration of Shay's antiunion stance and in the context used, Shay's remarks clearly contained threats of reprisal[6] and the illegal solicitation of grievances in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The General Counsel further claims that Respondent committed an unfair labor practice by Danny Sanders' remark to employee William Wilson that if he "didn't like the way it was, that [he] could hit the door." Sanders' remark followed Wilson's observations: "I mentioned the fact that if Model A and Model T would put something down in writing in front of the lawyer, that there would be no need for a union, if they would stand behind what they say." Wilson was wearing a union button at the time.

In the case of Rolligon Corporation, 254 NLRB 22 (1981), the Board has said:

> We have found that an employer's remarks which imply that a union activist is unhappy on the job and therefore should seek work elsewhere violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In the instant case, Respondent told an assembled group of employees that employees who are unhappy and would rather work in a union shop would do Respondent a great service by finding a job elsewhere. We find that such a statement is coercive and threatening and violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act because it conveys the clear message that support for the Union and continued employment by Respondent are incompatible.

Thus the remarks of Sanders directed to employee Wilson constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1).[7]

C. The Discharge of Michael Smead

Smead, an employee of the Elm Street plant, punched out during the day on November 2, 1979, for the same reason that employees previously mentioned herein punched out. He had been asked to punch out as a button wearer. Unlike the other button wearers, Smead returned to the plant about "a quarter of four after the shift had ended." Joe Shay and Danny Sanders were locking the plant when Smead returned. "Mr. Smead appeared to be intoxicated" as evidenced by "the heavy smell of liquor on his breath, slurred speech, his obnoxious attitude." He demanded his payroll check from Joe Shay and when Shay explained that it was impossible to issue his check immediately, Smead said, "[I]f I ever see you at a bar or out on the street, I will get you." Danny Sanders intervened and told Smead "that he had better leave the building right now." Smead "cursed and turned and started to walk toward the exit." He opened the employees' door, "stopped approximately two steps away from the door out into the parking lot and said if you [Sanders and Shay] came out here now, I'll whip your ass out here." Shay then closed the door and he and Sanders continued locking up the plant.

Smead's discharge notice read: "Reportedly left work station and disrupted work by others. Also, threatened safety and well being of a member of the management team." The latter phrase evolved after the incident described above. Smead was not reinstated with the other button wearers or included in the stipulation above mentioned.

Since the incident of alleged drunkenness occurred after Smead was unlawfully discharged for wearing a union button, Respondent's representation that the discharge was also for the above incident will be viewed as Respondent's claim that it may decline to employ Smead because his subsequent conduct rendered him unfit for future employment. A resolution of this matter is best left to the compliance stage of these proceedings. Smead's discharge being in violation of Section 8(a)(3), reinstatement for Smead will be recommended.

D. The Discharge of Ray Rine[8]

On or about February 5, 1980, President Harry Shay, in his address to Respondent's employees, alluded to Roy Rine in these words: "I recall that one day on Burnham Street, when we were over there, a person said he hadn't ate that day and didn't have a job and didn't have anything to eat and wanted a job. We didn't need him there, we didn't need him for two months, but we hired him any way and then we brought him back here and he's one of them organizing the union now. It's too bad we didn't have a union then because he probably wouldn't have been hired."[9]

One week later on February 11, 1980, Rine was fired for "too many absenteem [sic]." As noted by President Shay, Rine was a volunteer union organizer.

Rine had been employed since August 8, 1979, at the Wixom facility and had been transferred with other employees to the Fort Custer plant in the latter part of September. In January, Rine began wearing a UAW button and pocket saver in the assembly department where he worked.[10] He also distributed union literature and cards for a 2-week period at the timeclock or in the parking lot. Dennis Konecny, plant manager, Dan Weymouth, foreman, and Danny Sanders, supervisor, observed Rine engaged in this activity on several occasions when they came into the vicinity of the timeclock to use the food vending machine.

Sometime after organizing on behalf of the UAW had begun, Rine and his foreman, Dan Weymouth, had a discussion in which Weymouth told Rine that he was being removed as team leader and replaced with an employee with less seniority because Dennis Konecny, plant manager, had seen him standing around not doing his job. Rine complained about the way the Company handled seniority: "[T]he company doesn't want a union in here . . . this the way you treat your workers. What do you expect . . . ." Weymouth responded, "We don't have to worry about that because Harry Shay will relocate this plant before he'll allow a union to come in."[11] On another occasion Rine complained to Weymouth about how "they would paint right on the line where everybody had to work . . . they built a paint booth and they would still bring the paint sprayer over to the line. The painter had a mask to wear and the other workers didn't. They had a dust particle mask, but that isn't any good for keeping the fumes out. It just picks up dust in the air." After Rine objected to these conditions to Dan Weymouth, he was assigned to paint on the line for 1 or 2 weeks. He had never been assigned to paint on the line prior to voicing his objection.

[6] Shay's statement that he would not have knowingly hired union partisans is linked logically to employees' reasonable fear that they would be discharged if they engaged in union activities.

[7] While not urged as an unfair labor practice, Shay in his February 5, 1980, speech used similar language: "They don't like working here they can leave." (Resp. Exh. 10.)

[8] The teachings of Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), has been followed in connection with the consideration of all discharges.

[9] Charles Pelfrey, an employee of Respondent at the time of the hearing, attended this luncheon meeting and was called on behalf of the General Counsel. He testified that he and other employees were able to determine clearly from this paragraph in Harry Shay's speech that Roy Rine, an alleged discriminatee, was the employee being referred to by Shay. The witness' testimony is credited.

[10] In the assembly department other employees also had begun wearing some kind of UAW insignia. Roy Rine, Jerry Nichols, Jim Hunt, Tom (last name unknown), Joe Hadley, and Dave Latta. All were on the UAW organizing committee. (Rine, Hunt, Hadley, and Latta are alleged discriminatees.)

Approximately 2 weeks before Rine was discharged, on February 1, 1980, Dennis Konecny initiated a conversation with Rine in which Rine was told that he was going to be transferred to Fisher's line because it was apparent that he and Weymouth did not "get along very well." Konecny assured Rine that he "would still be drawing leader's pay and so forth." At this time Konecny told Rine "that [he] thought very highly of him but . . . was most concerned about this attitude and his absentee record[12] because [Rine] was in a group leader slot and . . . wasn't showing a good example to the new employees that were being hired at the time."

Rine reported to Kermit Fisher's line on Monday, February 4, and was absent Thursday, February 7, and Friday, February 8. Rine's girlfriend, Bonnie Lind, called in for Rine on February 7 and 8 as outlined in the personnel policy manual in effect at the time of Rine's discharge. Rine had fallen on the ice and suffered a disabling back injury.

On Monday, February 11, Dennis Konecny "instructed Mr. Kermit Fisher who was [Rine's] immediate foreman that if Mr. Roy Rine could not supply . . . a doctor's excuse for Thursday and Friday, that [Rine] was to be terminated for excessive absenteeism."[13] "[Rine] reported to work on Monday and worked all day. At the end of the shift . . . Mr. Fisher asked [Rine] if [he] had a doctor's slip for the two previous days [February 7 and 8] that [he] had missed and [he] told him no, and [Fisher] said well, I'm going to have to let you go."

Respondent hired Rine when he was hard pressed for a job and Rine apparently performed well on the job in return. He was a team leader in the assembly department at least by December 1979 and was thought highly of by Konecny. In fact, he was thought so highly of that Respondent chose to ignore his absence record until it was evident that he was a union partisan.[14] He had 8 of the 11 absences before he began organizing on behalf of the UAW on January 22, 1980, and no action was taken by Respondent. After January 22 and after Respondent became aware of Rine's prounion stance through its employees Weymouth, Konecny, and Sanders, Rine was put under the supervision of an employee with less seniority, and was assigned to less responsible work on the line by Weymouth, his foreman, who also told him that Harry Shay would relocate the plant before a union was permitted by Respondent. On February 5, Harry Shay, in his luncheon speech, referred to Rine as a disloyal employee because of his union organizing activities. On February 11 he was asked to produce a doctor's slip which he had no reason to assume would be required.

The credited evidence indicates that Rine was actually discharged because he failed to furnish a doctor's statement although the assigned reason for his discharge was "too many absenteem [sic]." Thus it would appear that the reason for his discharge was shifted in that it would be difficult to convince a reasonable person that Respondent actually would have discharged Rine for failing to furnish a doctor's statement without giving him an opportunity to produce one. The precipitous nature of his discharge coupled with Respondent's union animus and inclination to commit unfair labor practices to discourage union activities belies a legitimate motive. Thus it seems clear that "too many absenteem [sic]" was seized upon to shroud the real reason and the true motive of Respondent. Moreover, the credited evidence does not reveal that either Rine in the past or other employees had been subjected to the same arbitrary demand as was Rine.[15]

Rine's alleged absenteeism as a reason for discharge was an afterthought utilized to shore up a weak and untenable reason for discharge, one which had discrimination written all over it. Thus, it is found that Rine's discharge was pretextual and for the purpose of discouraging union activity. Rine's discharge accommodated Shay's expressed antipathy against Rine pronounced in his speech of February 5, 1980.

In The Radio Officers' Union of the Commercial Telegraphers Union, AFL [A. H. Bull Steamship Company] v.

[11] This record is unclear as to when this conversation actually occurred. Both Rine and Weymouth testified it was in January and Rine testified it was after he began organizing for the UAW. Weymouth also testified, however, that during the conversation Danny Sanders intervened and Sanders and Rine cursed at one another. A correction slip was written up and offered at the hearing, but is dated December 13, 1979. There is no testimony offered in an attempt to reconcile this discrepancy so the testimony that it occurred in January after organizing began is credited.

[12] Rine had 11 absence and lateness reports between October 26, 1979, and February 11, 1980. Nicolai, personnel director, testified that 7 out of the 11 were unexcused and that only those marked were excused. None of the 11, however, are marked excused. It is therefore impossible from the record to determine whether the absences, in fact, are unexcused.

[13] Rine's testimony is credited. Fisher did not testify and was not employed by Respondent at the time of the hearing.

[14] Resp. Exh. R-6 is a summary of plant employees terminated for absenteeism and tardiness between August 1979 and April 5, 1980. Twelve employees with fewer absences than Rine were terminated. This chart illustrates clearly Respondent's lack of consistent treatment of employees who have been absent or tardy, e.g., one employee was terminated without a verbal or written warning and without suspension with only two tardies and one absence while a second employee was terminated only after being given a written warning and 1-day suspension with seven tardies, two "left earlies," and nine absences.

[15] A Respondent rule read, "Five absenteecisms or tardiness within a three month period, that are not supported by request for leave of absence, or signed medical statement, will be grounds for discharge." (Emphasis supplied.) The credible record does not reveal that the medical statement requirement had ever been enforced or that any employee had been discharged for its violation.

N.L.R.B., 347 U.S. 17, 45 (1954), the Supreme Court opined, "[A]n employer's protestation that he did not intend to encourage or discourage must be unavailing where a natural consequence of his action was such encouragement or discouragement. Concluding that encouragement or discouragement will result, it is presumed that he intended such consequence. In such circumstances intent to encourage or discourage is sufficiently established."

The natural consequences of Respondent's discharge of Rine, a union partisan, following on the heels of Shay's remarks at the February 5 luncheon, was to discourage membership in a labor organization. Any other conclusion would be at odds with the realities of the industrial world and in opposition to sound reason. Thus it must be deemed that Respondent intended such result, that Respondent's conduct was "'inherently destructive' of important employee rights," and that an unfair labor practice may be found "even if the employer introduces evidence that the conduct was motivated by business considerations." See N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26 (1967). Had Respondent not intended the consequences of its act, i.e., discouragement of union activity, Rine obviously would not have been discharged. Rine was the victim of Shay's antiunion stance, for no reasonable employer, except for an ulterior purpose, would have fired a man because he was unable to meet an impossible condition set by his employer, in this case a demand for a doctor's report which Rine was not given a fair opportunity to obtain before he was discharged.[16]

E. The Discharge of James Hunt

The UAW had its first organizing meeting for employees of Respondent on January 22, 1980. Employees James Hunt, Joe Hadley, and Roy Rine, alleged discriminatees, became part of the UAW organizing effort at this meeting.

James Hunt signed a card and a "UAW organizing committee form" and received a packet of authorization cards to distribute at the Fort Custer plant. Before work on January 23, Hunt discussed the Union with other employees, distributed authorization cards, and received signed cards in return. All of his activity was observed by Plant Manager Dennis Konecny and Foreman Danny Weymouth. At this time Konecny warned Hunt that "any organizing for any union" was to be "done on . . . personal time and not on company time." Weymouth also asked "what his [Hunt's] reasons were for wanting a union." Nevertheless, Hunt continued to distribute cards every day for a week after the first day of distribution on January 23 and to wear his UAW button openly on his shirt pocket every day until his discharge on March 17, 1980.

Transferred in the last part of January or the first part of February to work outside, Hunt "was in charge of moving the vehicles from inside the plant to the outside . . . of taking care of the shipping, handling of the trucks coming in to pick up the vehicles for shipment." On March 4, while Hunt and his partner, Bob Hancock, were working outside, a cleanup was begun in the plant,[17] which generated much refuse.[18]

Hunt removed two heater fans and Bob Hancock removed miscellaneous scrap from the dumpsters which they put in a cardboard box and placed in a Dodge van used on company premises "in the work procedures outside." Later in the day when Hunt went to remove the fans from the van, the driver of the van Franklin Rood, asked him "if [he] had any permission or if [he] had ever had any permission to remove what he was removing . . . referring to the two heater fans." Hunt responded that he and Bob had gotten the material out of the dumpster and that they "had permission to remove things that had been in the dumpster." Rood then watched Hunt put the fans into his automobile and return to work. On his way to his automobile, Hunt passed the security guard and waved.

Rood reported the incident to Nicolai and the following statement was prepared for Rood:

> On Tuesday, March 4, 1980, I was driving the company van, when Jim Hunt came over to the van and told me that he had asked and received permission to take two heater motors that had come from the trash. I sat in the van while he took the two motors and walked out to his car, put them in his car and came back. I thought nothing further of the things. The next morning Bob Hancock came and asked me what had happened to the two heater motors and I told him that [Jim] took them, telling me that he had permission to do so.

Nicolai called Hunt into his office on March 17, 1980. Hunt had been absent from March 4 to 17 because of illness. Nicolai showed Hunt the statement[19] allegedly given by Franklin Rood, the employee who witnessed the removal, and read him rule 33 on theft.[20] When asked if he were familiar with the rule, Hunt replied that he was, but that he did not consider this theft since he had gotten blanket permission from Connie, the previous plant supervisor, to take scrap from the dumpsters. He offered to return the fans to the Company, but Nicolai did not respond and asked him to leave the room. When he returned, Nicolai told him he was discharged.

[16] Even if Fisher, Rine's foreman, were justified in requesting a doctor's slip from Rine, he was not justified in demanding and expecting its immediate production. Fisher's demand for immediate production of a doctor's slip created a no-win situation with which Rine was expected to comply. Even if Rine had had a good-faith desire to comply with Fisher's demand, it was impossible for him to do so without being permitted time between the demand for the doctor's slip and its expected production.

[17] James Hunt was wearing his UAW button on March 4. His partner, Bob Hancock, was not wearing a union button and there is no evidence indicating he was a union partisan.

[18] In general, refuse from the plant either found its way as scrap into the dumpsters which were ultimately carried away by trash pickup trucks and returned empty to Respondent; or, as in the case of vendor parts such as the heater motors, it was "sent back to the vendor for new parts." Vendor parts were not normally put into the trash system.

[19] The statement was admitted for the purposes of proving that it was the document Nicolai showed to Hunt and the document upon which Nicolai relied in discharging Hunt. It was not admitted to prove the truth of the matters asserted therein, as Rood did not testify and, therefore, did not verify the signature as his own and the statement as true.

[20] Rule 33 reads as follows:

> 33. Theft of any Company, Government or Employee Property
> Violation of any work rule will result in disciplinary action, which will range from verbal reprimand to discharge depending on the seriousness of the violation and whether it is a first violation or a recurrence. A combination of work rule violations will be dealt with according to the circumstances of each case.

The reason for Hunt's discharge was described as "Theft of company property to heater motors, 3/4/80 Co. Rule 33."

Apparently, Respondent had not written or published anything for employees specifically concerning the removal of scrap from the dumpsters.[21] Rather it was communicated orally through the employees' immediate foremen. Dennis Konecny, plant manager at the Fort Custer plant, received a memorandum from Jim Krider, general manager, directing the foremen upon requests from employees to remove scrap for personal use, to orally inform them, "that they did not have the authority and that neither did [Konecny] and the only way [to] get authority was through Jim Krider." This directive was to be shared only upon an employee's request to remove scrap and was never publicized generally in the plant.

Understandably, it is difficult to discern what specific policy was to be followed by employees to gain valid permission to remove scrap: Whether written permission from Krider was necessary; whether oral permission from Konecny was sufficient; or whether permission could be obtained at all from anyone. It is reasonable, therefore, to infer from Respondent's varying policies that employees must have been confused as to what process was to be followed to gain permission and whose permission was valid. It is, therefore, a rational inference that Hunt had a good-faith belief that he did not need to seek permission every time he wished to remove scrap and that his belief was reasonable under the circumstances.

It is clear that the General Counsel has met his burden of establishing a prima facie case by producing sufficient evidence to support the inference that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in Respondent's decision to discharge Hunt in conformity with the teachings of Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). These factors are controlling in this respect: (1) Hunt was an aggressive union partisan, (2) Respondent harbored union animus of sufficient intensity as to cause it to commit unfair labor practices, (3) there was no proof that other employees had been discharged for removing scrap from dumpsters although such removal had been apparently commonplace, (4) the rules in respect to employee removal of dumpster scrap were not well defined, (5) no evidence was offered that Hunt was an unsatisfactory employee, (6) the heater fans were of such insignificant value that when Hunt offered to return them his offer was not accepted, and (7) whereas Hunt was discharged for theft, an intentional crime, the credited evidence indicates that he harbored no intent to steal, openly took the fans without stealth, and honestly believed that he was permitted to take the fans, all of which must have been apparent to Nicolai when he discharged Hunt.

To meet its burden Respondent asserts that "the Respondent had a rule that was generally known to the employees." If such assertion refers to a rule governing the removal of scrap from the dumpsters, the credited evidence does not support this assertion. Respondent further maintains that "Respondent constantly enforced the theft rules in the situations in which it was aware of the theft." However, the examples offered by Respondent were for theft of tools or materials, items of value to Respondent used in production by Respondent. Hunt's discharge was the only one for removing scrap from the dumpster. Hunt was discharged as a thief, which he was not. He was deprived of any benefit of the doubt although the penalty for his alleged offense could have been in a range from a verbal reprimand to a discharge. Moreover, Hunt's offense was innocuous since the scrap fans were of such slight value that Respondent did not want them returned. Hunt's offense as it may have affected Respondent's business operation was minimal. Accordingly, it appears that Respondent has not carried its burden and it is found that the motivation for Hunt's discharge was to discourage union activity. By Hunt's discharge, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. The credible evidence reveals no legitimate business justification for Hunt's discharge nor has Respondent demonstrated by credible evidence that Hunt, a satisfactory employee, would have been discharged even in the absence of his protected conduct. Indeed, no action was taken against Hancock although he likewise removed items from the dumpster on the same day Hunt retrieved the heater fans.

F. Discharge of David Hall

David Hall was hired by Respondent on June 26, 1979, at the Burnham Street plant, and after 3 months transferred to the Elm Street plant. He was discharged from the Elm Street plant on September 18, 1979, for his poor attendance record. On January 11, 1980, David Hall returned to Respondent and talked with Vonda Shay, the president's wife, about whether the Company would rehire him. He was rehired and reported to work on January 14, 1980. Subsequently, he was discharged on February 29, 1980, because of a company policy not to rehire employees who had been discharged for cause.

Mark Nicolai, Respondent's personnel director, was hired on January 21, 1980, 7 days after Hall had been rehired by Mrs. Shay with the approval of the previous personnel director. When Nicolai became personnel director, he instituted a policy of not rehiring persons who had been discharged for cause, but because he was hired after Hall was rehired did not know who David Hall was, nor did he know of David Hall's employment history. Consequently, when Nicolai was asked by Harry Shay, Respondent's president, what David Hall was doing in the plant, he was unable to respond without asking who David Hall was. Shay explained that Hall had been discharged for cause and had "created quite a scene and it was a rather violent discharge" and, therefore, Hall should not have been rehired. Nicolai was unable to find a second application in Hall's file, so he called Hall into his office and asked Hall if a second application had been filled out. His reason for calling Hall into the office was in actuality to determine how he got rehired. Unable to determine how Hall got rehired, Nicolai prepared Hall's last check, and, under Harry Shay's instruction, discharged Hall on February 29, 1980.

[21] A written memorandum allowing removal of scrap from dumpsters with a supervisor's approval was posted on the plant bulletin board prior to March 17, but there is no credible evidence that it was posted before March 4, the day Hunt allegedly removed the heater fans for his personal use without permission from Respondent.

The General Counsel alleges that Hall was discharged for union activity protected by Section 7 of the Act. This allegation is based on a conversation that supposedly took place between Hall and Jim Lauren, a representative with West Coast Industrial Relations, during an employee luncheon at the Elm Street plant on February 22, 1980. During this luncheon Lauren allegedly questioned Hall about whether the employees needed a union and Hall answered affirmatively.

Counsel for the General Counsel failed to adduce any evidence that Hall's response to Lauren's query was communicated to any representative of Respondent. Hall wore a union insignia.

The General Counsel has failed to establish a prima facie case sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to discharge Hall after he was rehired. Furthermore, Respondent has adduced sufficient evidence to support an inference that Respondent would have discharged Hall in the absence of protected conduct on the basis of Respondent's policy not to rehire employees discharged for cause. The 8(a)(3) allegation in connection with Hall's discharge is dismissed.

G. The Discharge of Joe Hadley

Joe Hadley was hired by Respondent on August 31, 1979, and was terminated April 11, 1980, after a slowdown in production necessary to produce higher quality cars was instituted.[22] This slowdown resulted in the termination of 28 employees who had the worst absentee and productivity records in the weeks ending April 11, 18, and 25. Hadley was one of three terminated on April 11 and the other 25 followed in the next 2 weeks. The three terminated on April 11 were discharged by Nicolai, the personnel director. His decision to terminate Hadley was based on Hadley's excessive absenteeism. The remaining 25 were terminated by a management group.

The General Counsel has shown that Hadley was a union partisan. Hadley distributed union authorization cards and literature and wore a UAW button daily. He was known to supervisors at the air cargo facility as a union activist.

However, it appears that Respondent has successfully demonstrated that it would have taken the same action against Hadley in the absence of his engaging in union activities. Hadley and many other employees were on layoff when Respondent found it necessary to terminate 28 employees. Although a good worker when present, Hadley was frequently absent or late. He was terminated for his absenteeism only when Respondent decided to terminate 28 people even though Respondent knew of Hadley's union activities as early as the first or second week of February. Given these circumstances, Respondent's actions do not "suggest a predetermined plan to discover a reason to discharge" Hadley "and thus rid the facility of a union activist."[23]

Accordingly, for the reasons noted above, it is found Respondent's discharge of Joe Hadley did not violate Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

H. Letter to Kathy Lauderdale

Kathy Lauderdale started June 25, 1979, at Respondent's Burnham Street facility where she remained until August. In August she moved to the Fort Custer plant, and in September transferred to the Elm Street plant in personnel. She began working as the secretary to the director of personnel, Mark Nicolai, at the end of January 1980 after serving as the secretary to the previous director of personnel from the time of her transfer to the Elm Street plant.

She was employed until April 8, 1980, as Nicolai's secretary and she left voluntarily. After she left Respondent's employ, she testified for the Department of Labor, CETA program, and spoke about "safety conditions at the plant at the time of Tom Mell's death, rehiring of individuals, about Dave Hall." She also spoke to Pete Cassidy from the Steelworkers about "[t]he conditions of how Dave Hall got rehired. The conditions of [her] termination and why it involved David Hall." She also discussed the above issues with Linda Rabin of the National Labor Relations Board and gave testimony on the seven men who were discharged on November 2, 1979, for wearing union buttons and on Rine, Hadley, Hunt, and Hall, all employees discharged by Respondent.

On May 8, 1980, Respondent, through counsel Jonathan Miller, sent a letter (G.C. Exh. 16) to Katherine Lauderdale suggesting legal action if she were to continue her testimony before "various organizations and/or governmental entities." In this letter Respondent states that "[a] person should always furnish such information which dictated by her conscience [sic]," but that "[i]f the Company is damaged by any furnishing of any information which is incorrect, or about which a person has so little knowledge as to make the matter misleading then the Company will pursue their legal remedy." The General Counsel claims that the May 8, 1980, letter constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

As asserted by Respondent "there is no violation of the law either on the basis of the content of the letter nor as to Kathy Lauderdale inasmuch as she was not an employee at the time of the receipt of the letter." Moreover, the General Counsel has cited no authority for his claim that the fact that "Lauderdale was not an employee of Respondent at either the time of the testimony or the time she received the letter is immaterial." That part of the complaint referring to the May 8, 1980, letter is dismissed.

[22] Hadley worked for Respondent from August 31 to December 28, 1979, when he voluntarily quit. He was rehired January 17, 1980, laid off for lack of work on March 3, to March 13, 1980, and again from April 3 until April 17, 1980. He was finally terminated the last time he was on layoff.

[23] Wright Line, supra.

I. Foreman Wagner's Alleged Threat of Closure and Relocation

The General Counsel plants his claim that Foreman William Wagner's remarks were in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on the following incident described by employee Charles Pelfrey in the record as follows:

> Well, I asked Mr. Wagner if there was any truth to the Company moving to Indiana because there had been rumors going around that the Company was going to move. Frequently rumors travel through the Company, and he told me that he wasn't sure whether or not the Company was going to move, but if it was, that he had planned on moving with the Company. I asked him if the employees would have the opportunity to move with the Company or whether they would just be left behind, and if the Company would hire all new employees, and he told me that the Company would probably give the employees a chance to relocate except for the union organizers. He said that the Company would not be taking them with them, because if they moved, that is what they would be trying to get away from in the first place.

Since Wagner's remarks were highly speculative and lacked positiveness, it is not found that they, as claimed by the General Counsel, constituted threat of closure and relocation.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and it will effectuate the purposes of the Act for jurisdiction to be exercised herein.

2. The Unions are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By interfering with, restraining, and coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By unlawfully discharging Michael Smead on November 2, 1980, Roy Rine on February 11, 1980, and James Hunt on March 17, 1980, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

5. By unlawfully suspending Jeffrey Smith and Richard Burton for 3 days commencing February 18, 1980, and ending February 21, 1980, for lawfully distributing union literature at Respondent's plant on February 14, 1980, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

It having been found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it is recommended that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. It also having been found that Respondent unlawfully discharged Michael Smead on November 2, 1980, Roy Rine on February 11, 1980, and James Hunt on March 17, 1980, respectively, and has since failed and refused to reinstate them, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, it is recommended that Respondent remedy such unlawful conduct. In accordance with Board policy, it is recommended that Respondent offer the foregoing employees immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, dismissing if necessary any employees hired on or since the dates of their discharges to fill any of said positions, and make them whole for any loss of earnings that they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's acts herein detailed, by payment to them of a sum of money equal to the amount they would have earned from the date of their unlawful discharge to the date of an offer of reinstatement, less net earnings during such period, with interest thereon, to be computed on a quarterly basis in the manner established by the Board in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[24]

It is further recommended that Jeffrey Smith and Richard Burton be reimbursed for any lost pay by reason of their aforesaid unlawful suspensions, with interest, in accordance with the Board's usual policy and that their suspensions be expunged from their personnel records.

Upon the basis of the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record in this proceeding, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[25]

The Respondent, Model A and Model T Motor Car Reproduction Corporation, Battle Creek, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discouraging union or concerted activities of its employees or their membership in United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC, or International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), or any other labor organization by unlawfully discriminatorily discharging its employees or discriminating in any other manner with respect to their hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

(b) Unlawfully interrogating employees in respect to their union activities or sympathies.

[24] See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[25] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Unlawfully soliciting grievances from employees in order to influence their union affection.

(d) Continuing in effect an invalid no-solicitation rule.

(e) Unlawfully threatening reprisals because of employees' union sympathies.

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer Michael Smead, Roy Rine, and James Hunt immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging if necessary any employees hired to replace them, and make them whole for any loss of pay that they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's unlawful discharge of them in accordance with the recommendations set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Make whole Jeffrey Smith and Richard Burton, with interest, for any lost pay they may have suffered by reason of their unlawful suspensions from February 18 to 21, 1980.

(c) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this recommended Order.

(d) Post at its facilities at Battle Creek, Michigan, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[26] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 7, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act other than those found in this Decision.

---

[26] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

December 7, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On July 17, 1981, Administrative Law Judge William J. Pannier III issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs, and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Wayne Construction, Inc., Seattle, Washington, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

---

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

In sec. III,B, par. 2 of his Decision, the Administrative Law Judge found that Respondent's failure to call its co-owner, Arntzen, to corroborate the testimony of Jeffords concerning a promise of a job to Charland, purportedly made by Arntzen, supported a fair inference that, had Arntzen been called as a witness, his testimony concerning that matter would not have supported that of Jeffords. However, we find that, since there is no basis for inferring that Arntzen was not equally available to be called as a witness by both Respondent and the General Counsel, no adverse inference can be drawn against Respondent with respect to its failure to call him to corroborate Jeffords' testimony. Plumbers and Steamfitters Local No. 40, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of Plumbers and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO (Mechanical Contractor Associations of Washington), 242 NLRB 1157, 1160, fn. 10 (1979). This finding, however, does not affect our decision to affirm the Administrative Law Judge's discrediting of Jeffords' testimony, as the other factors cited by the Administrative Law Judge, including Jeffords' demeanor and the contradiction of his testimony by neutral witnesses, are sufficient grounds to support his credibility resolutions.

[2] In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT interrogate our employees regarding the union sympathies and activities of their coworkers.

WE WILL NOT threaten to close down our construction projects before allowing our employees to become unionized.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against our employees because they attempted to become unionized.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of their rights as set forth above, which are guaranteed by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL make whole Edward Lewis Charland for any loss of pay he may have suffered as a result of our unlawful termination of him on June 24, 1980, with interest on the amount owing.

WAYNE CONSTRUCTION, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM J. PANNIER III, Administrative Law Judge: This matter was heard by me in Juneau, Alaska, on May 5, 1981. On September 4, 1980,[1] the Acting Regional Director for Region 19 of the National Labor Relations Board issued an order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint and notice of hearing, based on unfair labor practice charges, the one in Case 19-CA-12610 having been filed on July 18,[2] alleging violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. §151, et seq., herein called the Act. All parties have been afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. Based on the entire record and the briefs filed on behalf of the parties and upon my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following:

---

[1] Unless otherwise stated, all dates occurred in 1980.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material herein, Wayne Construction, Inc., herein called Respondent, has been a State of Washington corporation, with an office and place of business in Seattle, Washington, engaged in the business of construction contracting in the States of Alaska and Washington. During the 12-month period prior to issuance of the complaint, a representative period, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, derived gross revenue in excess of $500,000 and, during that same period, sold and shipped goods or provided services valued in excess of $50,000 from its facilities within the State of Washington directly to customers outside of that State and, also, to customers within the State of Washington who were themselves engaged in interstate commerce by other than indirect means. Therefore, I find, as admitted by Respondent, that at all times material herein it has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

At all times material herein, Teamsters Local 959, State of Alaska, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America; International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 302, AFL-CIO; and Laborers' International Union of North America, Local 942, AFL-CIO, have each been labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

The facts giving rise to the complaint in this matter occurred on Metlakatla Island, herein called the Island, which is owned and controlled by native Alaskans. In order for a non-native to reside or work there, a permit must be obtained from the 12-person council, which establishes policy for the Island. From early summer 1979 until late October 1980, Respondent was working on the Island, constructing a breakwater. To do this, Respondent employed truckdrivers who hauled rock to the water from a quarry located 5 or 6 miles away from the breakwater location. Edward Lewis Charland was one of those truckdrivers whom Respondent employed. He worked from March 3 until June 24, when the General Counsel alleges that he had been terminated unlawfully and, conversely, when Respondent contends that he had quit by walking off the job. The only other dispute in this case centers on whether Donald R. Jeffords, the superintendent for the project,[3] had made certain statements on June 24 that constituted an unlawful interrogation and a threat to shut down the jobsite.

In late April or early May, oiler Jeff Staples had been given authorization cards. While he did not distribute them, Staples testified that after he had obtained them Jeffords had said, "[W]ell, I see your friend from the Union was here," and had warned, "[W]ell, if I hear anybody talking union around here, they're fired."[4] In mid-June, Charland obtained the cards from Staples and began distributing them himself.

On June 24, Charland reported for work at 7 a.m. and began hauling rock from the quarry to the site where the breakwater was being constructed. At approximately 9 a.m., as he drove by Respondent's office, Jeffords flagged him down. After parking the truck, Charland entered the office. Only he and Jeffords were present during this conversation. Charland testified that Jeffords began cursing at him and accusing him of being sneaky and of "going behind [Jeffords'] back with these cards." According to Charland, Jeffords had said that the council's registrar, Rosabel Nelson, was going to pull Charland's permit because he had received too many tickets, adding that going behind his back had been the wrong thing to do and that he would close down the job before going union. Then, testified Charland, Jeffords had said that Charland was "through for good, we've got ways of taking care of things like this."

Jeffords agreed that this conversation had occurred and that, during it, the subject of the organizing campaign had been discussed. However, he denied that this had been his purpose for summoning Charland to the office that day. Rather, he testified that he had done so to discuss certain problems involving Charland's "work habits, his driving habits, and some living conditions that we previously discussed."[5] According to Jeffords, imme-

[2] Three other cases, Cases 19-CA-12678, 12679, and 12701, also were originally consolidated in this matter. At the hearing, I granted the General Counsel's motion to sever those three cases, dismiss the complaints, and remand the charges to the Regional Director for final disposition.

[3] It is admitted that at all times material herein Jeffords had been a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act and an agent of Respondent.

[4] Jeffords admitted having discussed the matter of organizing Respondent's employees with Staples, testifying he had said that the proper way to do this would be to get all the employees together and to discuss it as a group, rather than cause rumors by doing so on an individual basis. However, he did not deny having threatened that employees who talked about unions would be fired. Counsel for the General Counsel represented that the purpose for introducing this evidence was solely "to show the union animus by respondent [sic], just for background only," and disavowed any intention or desire to seek a remedial order based on Jeffords' comments during this conversation.

[5] Jeffords testified that, during the time that Charland had been driving Respondent's blue Peterbilt truck, Charland had been "responsible for breaking a drive line, a transmission, a rear-end, and some U-joints, either directly or indirectly." Jeffords also testified that he "had had some complaints through the chief of police pertaining to rock being scattered on the road" and that lead truckdriver Blaine Gormley had reported that Charland had been "powering into the corner" by the council chambers, thereby causing his truck to tip sufficiently to scatter some of the rock being transported. Finally, testified Jeffords, there had been an earlier occasion when, as a result of some bad checks that the mayor had reported diately upon entering the office Charland had said "I know immediately what you're going to do . . . you're jumping me over this union thing." Jeffords testified that he had denied that this had been his purpose for summoning Charland to his office, but had said that since Charland wanted to discuss it, "[L]let's get that out of the way first before we go any further." Then, testified Jeffords, he had told Charland essentially the same thing as he assertedly had told Staples earlier: that all of the employees should be involved in the decision concerning unionization and that the proper method for arriving at a decision regarding the matter was to convene a meeting of all employees to consider it, instead of creating problems by approaching only certain selected employees during working hours.

Jeffords testified that following these remarks he had attempted to discuss other subjects with Charland. Thus, according to Jeffords, he had said that there were rumors that Charland's work permit was going to be revoked, that the continuing damage to the Peterbilt truck would have to cease, that Charland would have to stop scattering rocks, and that Charland had made a misrepresentation about having been promised a job by Donald Arntzen, Jeffords' immediate superior, when he had applied for employment to Jeffords.[6] However, testified Jeffords, Charland had kept interrupting, returning to the subject of the organizing campaign and accusing Jeffords of "trying to railroad him." Jeffords testified that ultimately he had told Charland that "if he didn't get down there and square it away they was [sic] going to pull his permit," and that Charland had "just busted out the door and that's the last I saw of him."

Staples testified that before he had arrived for work on June 24, at his normal starting time of 11:30 a.m., he had been told by Charland and another truckdriver that Charland was no longer working for Respondent. He further testified that when he arrived for work that day he had been summoned to the office where Jeffords had said, "First of all, I want to tell you Ed wasn't fired because of the union, the town had pulled his work permit because of too many speeding tickets." According to Staples, Jeffords then asked who was involved in the unionizing campaign, but, notwithstanding Jeffords' efforts to persuade him to do so, Staples had declined to identify them.

Jeffords agreed that this conversation had taken place. He testified that he had said that he had been hearing rumors that he had fired Charland but that "I didn't fire Ed Charland for union activities. And I didn't even tell him he was fired, I told him to go down to the city and square his permit away. And I want you to understand, Jeff, that your job is not in jeopardy, nobody's job is in jeopardy here because of union activities."[7]

Finally, Acting Police Chief Doug Askren testified, without contradiction by Jeffords, that in June he had been told by Jeffords that "due to [Charland's] driving record and his involvement in driving habit complaints that he had, that he was letting him go on that pretense. Then the statement was made to me that he was also involved in some union activity."

B. Analysis

The threshold question here is whether, as the General Counsel contends, Charland had been discharged or whether, as Respondent contends, he had quit. As set forth above, Charland testified that, during the June 24 conversation, he had been told by Jeffords that he was "through for good . . . ." Such words, if spoken, "would logically lead a prudent person to believe his tenure had been terminated . . . ." Fred I. Putnam v. Harry C. Lower, 236 F.2d 561, 566 (9th Cir. 1956); accord: N.L.R.B. v. Trumbull Asphalt Company of Delaware, 327 F.2d 841, 843 (8th Cir. 1964), and cases cited therein.

While Jeffords claimed, as also set forth above, that Charland simply had walked out of the office on June 24 and had never returned, thereby effectively having quit employment with Respondent, a number of factors warrant the conclusion that Jeffords should not be credited. When he testified, Jeffords did not appear to be doing so in a candid fashion. He did not deny having told Askren that Respondent was "letting [Charland] go," which is, of course, an admission of the very fact that he had denied when he testified in this proceeding. In another area, Jeffords claimed that he had discussed the matter of pulling Charland's work permit with both the chief of police and with Mayor Stanley R. Patterson. Each of them, however, denied categorically ever having told Jeffords that Charland's work permit was going to be revoked. Jeffords claimed that on Monday, June 23, while outside the mayor's office, Chief of Police Askren had complained about Charland scattering rocks on the road. Askren denied having discussed Charland with Jeffords after a mid-May meeting between Askren and all of Respondent's drivers. In another area, while Jeffords claimed that Arntzen, Jeffords' superior, had reported a misrepresentation by Charland, regarding a promise of a job to Charland purportedly made by Arntzen, Arntzen was never called to confirm either that he had made such a report to Jeffords or that he had not made such a promise to Charland. Nor did Respondent claim that Arntzen was unavailable to it as a witness. Accordingly, it is a fair inference that had Arntzen been called as a witness, his testimony concerning these matters would not have supported that of Jeffords. Colorflo Decorator Products, Inc., 228 NLRB 408, 410 (1977), enfd. by memorandum opinion 582 F.2d 1289 (9th Cir. 1978); Martin Luther King, Sr., Nursing Center, 231 NLRB 15, fn. 1 (1977). Jeffords' complaints regarding Charland's that Charland had written to pay his rent, Jeffords had agreed to permit Charland to move his motor home to Respondent's camp facilities, but when Jeffords had heard that the motor home had no bathroom, he had decided to notify Charland that he had changed his mind.

[6] Jeffords claimed that he had learned that Arntzen had made no such promise a few days prior to the June 24 confrontation. However, Jeffords conceded that "when I originally called him in there I wasn't even thinking of [that] misrepresentation, I was thinking basically of the rock on the road and the housing situation."

[7] Jeffords also testified that he had told Staples, with regard to Charland's departure, "I want to squelch any rumors that started right now."

purported abuse of the Peterbilt truck were not corroborated. Indeed, they were refuted, for the most part by Staples who had been one of the two individuals responsible for maintaining and repairing Respondent's vehicles. If, as Jeffords claimed, he had been concerned with "squelching" rumors before they got started, it does not seem likely that he would have spoken only to Staples concerning his June 24 confrontation with Charland. In sum, I do not credit Jeffords and, accordingly, I conclude that Charland had been discharged by Respondent on June 24.

This, then, leads to consideration of the motivation for Charland's discharge. It is undisputed that Charland had begun distributing authorization cards on approximately June 16. Moreover, Staples testified, credibly and without contradiction, that earlier he had been warned by Jeffords that "anybody talking union around here" would be fired. Jeffords admitted that he had been aware of Charland's union activity when they met on June 24. Charland testified credibly that, during that meeting, Jeffords had begun cursing at him for having initiated organizing activity behind Jeffords' back; that Jeffords had threatened to close the job before allowing employees to become unionized; and that Jeffords had stated that Charland was "through for good [since] we've got ways of taking care of things like this." These facts establish, at least, a prima facie case that Charland had been terminated because of his distribution of union authorization cards.

As found above, there is no objective support for the various assertions made by Jeffords regarding Charland's performance as a truckdriver, and I do not credit Jeffords's testimony with regard to those matters. Indeed, Jeffords did not deny having told Askren that Charland's driving habits were being used as a "pretense" to discharge him. That admission, coupled with Jeffords' admission to Charland, during their June 24 conversation, that the latter was "through" because he had been campaigning to obtain representation for the employees, constitutes "an outright confession of unlawful discrimination. It eliminated any further question concerning the intrinsic merits . . . of [Charland's discharge] . . . ." N.L.R.B. v. L. C. Ferguson and E. F. Von Seggern d/b/a Shovel Supply Company, 257 F.2d 88, 92 (5th Cir. 1958). Respondent argues that its failure to take action against Staples negates any finding of unlawful motivation concerning Charland's termination. "However, it is well established that a discriminatory motive, otherwise established, is not disproved by an employer's proof that it did not weed out all union adherents." Nachman Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 337 F.2d 421, 424 (7th Cir. 1964).

Therefore, I find that Respondent discharged Charland because he had been attempting to organize its employees, thereby violating Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Moreover, I credit Charland and Staples and, accordingly, find that Jeffords did interrogate Staples concerning the identities of the employees who were involved in the organizing campaign and did threaten, during his conversation with Charland, to close the job down before allowing the employees to become unionized, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Wayne Construction, Inc., is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Teamsters Local 959, State of Alaska, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America; International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 302, AFL-CIO; and Laborers' International Union of North America, Local 942, AFL-CIO, are each labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By interrogating its employees concerning the union activities and sympathies of their coworkers and by threatening to close down the Metlakatla Island breakwater construction job before allowing employees to become unionized, Wayne Construction, Inc., violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By discharging Edward Lewis Charland on June 24, 1980, because he was attempting to organize employees, Wayne Construction, Inc., violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Wayne Construction, Inc., engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Inasmuch as the Metlakatla Island breakwater construction project has been completed, the General Counsel has not sought an order reinstating Charland. However, Wayne Construction, Inc., will be required to make Charland whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered by reason of his unlawful discharge, with backpay to be computed on a quarterly basis, making deductions for interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), enforcement denied on different grounds 322 F.2d 913 (9th Cir. 1963), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and upon the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[8]

The Respondent Wayne Construction, Inc., Seattle, Washington, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

---

[8] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Interrogating its employees concerning the union sympathies and activities of their coworkers.

(b) Threatening to close down projects before allowing its employees to become unionized.

(c) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against its employees with regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment for engaging in activities on behalf of labor organizations, or for engaging in activities protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights protected by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Make Edward Lewis Charland whole for any loss of pay he may have suffered as a result of his discriminatory discharge on June 24, 1980, in the manner set forth above in "The Remedy" section of this Decision.

(b) Preserve and make available to the Board and its agents all payroll and other records necessary to compute the backpay rights set forth in "The Remedy" section of this Decision.

(c) Post at its Seattle, Washington, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being duly signed by its authorized representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Wayne Construction, Inc., to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material. In addition, Wayne Construction, Inc., shall mail one copy of the attached notice to each employee who was employed by it on the Metlakatla Island, Alaska, breakwater construction site from June 24, 1980, until completion of that project, upon receipt thereof from the Regional Director for Region 19.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 19, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

---

[9] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On May 19, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Walter H. Maloney, Jr., issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in response to Respondent's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] of the Administrative Law Judge.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Twin County Trucking, Inc., Neptune and Tinton Falls, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Coercively interrogating employees concerning their union activities and the union activities of other employees.

(b) Threatening to castrate employees because they have engaged in union activities.

(c) Offering promotions, wage increases, and other benefits to employees in order to defeat a union organizing drive.

(d) Telling employees that their union activities are acts of futility.

(e) Telling striking employees that they would never be hired again.

(f) Urging employees to select as their bargaining agent a labor organization other than the one they have selected and telling them that the only union which the Company would recognize is one which met company approval.

(g) Threatening to discharge employees, close the plant, or merge the business with another company if employees selected a union as their bargaining agent.

[1] In its post-hearing brief, Respondent alleges that the Administrative Law Judge exhibited bias and prejudice against it, and on this ground moved for a rehearing of this case before a different administrative law judge. Respondent contests the Administrative Law Judge's credibility resolutions, contending that he uniformly credited the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses and discredited the testimony of its witnesses. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings. Nor do we find merit in Respondent's contention that, because the Administrative Law Judge generally discredited Respondent's witnesses and credited the General Counsel's witnesses, his credibility resolutions are erroneous or attended by bias or prejudice. N.L.R.B. v. Pittsburgh Steamship Company, 337 U.S. 656 (1949). Respondent further alleges that the Administrative Law Judge demonstrated bias when in an off-the-record discussion at the hearing, prior to Respondent's presentation of its evidence, the Administrative Law Judge expressed his opinion as to the ultimate merits of the case. However, Respondent did not object on the record to the alleged discussion, and did not comply with our procedures for requesting disqualification of an administrative law judge. Sec. 102.37, Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, Series 8, as amended. See Sanford Home for Adults, 253 NLRB 1132, fn. 1 (1981). Respondent's motion is denied accordingly.

Respondent further moves to reopen the hearing to admit additional exhibits. Respondent seeks to introduce an affidavit of Respondent's owner, Joseph Lee, and letters written by Respondent's attorney, which Respondent claims demonstrate that Respondent agreed to reinstate the unfair labor practice strikers. However, these proposed exhibits all postdate the hearing and are relevant only as to the amount of backpay due the discriminatees. Since this issue is to be decided at the compliance stage of these proceedings, we hereby deny this motion.

Additionally, Respondent moves to strike the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. Respondent contends that the General Counsel has withdrawn these charges and therefore the Administrative Law Judge lacked jurisdiction to make these findings. However, the record indicates that the 8(a)(3) violations found by the Administrative Law Judge were charged in Case 22-CA-10185, and these charges were never withdrawn. Only certain charges in Case 22-CA-9984 have been withdrawn by the General Counsel. Therefore, this motion is also denied.

[2] In the second paragraph of the portion of his Decision entitled "The Unfair Labor Practices Alleged," the Administrative Law Judge stated that, by April 1, 1980, union adherents had collected 21 signed authorization cards. In fact, as noted in fn. 7 of his Decision, the Union had collected 22 signed cards by this time. We hereby correct this inadvertent error.

[3] The Administrative Law Judge dated the bargaining order April 1, 1980, based on his finding that Respondent's unlawful conduct began on or about that date and the Union had attained signed authorization cards from a majority of Respondent's employees by then. The record indicates, however, that Respondent had collected 21 authorization cards, a majority of the 40-employee unit, by March 31, and had previously demanded recognition. Accordingly, we find that Respondent's obligation to bargain with the Union dates from March 31, 1980. See Hasbro Industries, Inc., 254 NLRB 587 (1981); Cas Walker's Cash Stores, Inc., 249 NLRB 316, fn. 3 (1980), and cases cited therein; Frederick's Foodland, Inc., d/b/a Bucyrus Foodland North and Bucyrus Foodland South, 247 NLRB 284 (1980).

The Administrative Law Judge found that Joseph Lee's April 8, 1980, agreement with Union Business Agent John Senick to schedule a negotiation session for the next week constituted de facto recognition of the Union. This finding is unnecessary in light of the fact that Respondent's bargaining obligation commenced on March 31, 1980.

We have substituted the Order below in lieu of the Order provided by the Administrative Law Judge in order to correct certain inadvertent errors and to conform to the remedy recommended by the Administrative Law Judge. Member Zimmerman finds no practical difference in this case between a bargaining order dated March 31 and one dated April 1.

259 NLRB No. 78

(h) Granting employees wage increases in order to defeat a union organizing drive and unilaterally establishing wage increases and changes in working conditions without first bargaining in good faith with the unit bargaining agent concerning such changes; provided that nothing herein shall be construed to require the Respondent to rescind any increase in wages or benefits which it has heretofore granted.

(i) Refusing to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers upon their unconditional request for reinstatement.

(j) Discouraging membership in or activities on behalf of Local 478, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, or any labor organization, by discharging employees, either before or after they have gone on strike, or otherwise discriminating against them in their hire or tenure.

(k) Refusing to recognize and bargain collectively with the aforementioned labor organization as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all of Respondent's full-time and regular part-time truck drivers, platform workers and mechanics employed at the Respondent's Neptune and Tinton Falls, New Jersey, terminals, exclusive of office clerical employees, managerial employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(l) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain with Local 478, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All full-time and regular part-time truck drivers, platform workers, and mechanics employed at Respondent's Neptune and Tinton Falls, New Jersey, facilities, exclusive of all office clerical employees, managerial employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Offer Darren Brown, Kevin Brown, Anthony Coffero, Steven Cole, Daniel Florio, Joseph Fontana, Frank Harrington, Thomas Henville, John Hewlitt, Joseph Hildebrandt, Stafford Hoffman, James La Pointe, Ray La Pointe, and Brian O'Connor full and immediate reinstatement to their former positions of employment, or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges they previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of pay or benefits which they have suffered by reason of the discrimination found herein, with interest, in the manner described in the section of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision entitled "Remedy."[4]

(c) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at Respondent's places of business at Neptune and Tinton Falls, New Jersey, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 22, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Case 22-RC-8201 be, and it hereby is, severed from Cases 22-CA-10185 and 22-CA-9984; that the election conducted therein be, and it hereby is, set aside; and that the petition therein be, and it hereby is, dismissed.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

---

[4] Member Jenkins would compute interest on backpay in the manner set forth in his partial dissenting opinion in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

[5] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate employees concerning their union activities and the union activities of other employees.

WE WILL NOT threaten to castrate employees because they have engaged in union activities.

WE WILL NOT offer our employees promotions, wage increases, or other benefits in order to defeat a union organizing drive.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that their union activities are acts of futility.

WE WILL NOT threaten to discharge employees, to close the plant, or to merge the business with another company if employees select a union as their bargaining agent.

WE WILL NOT tell striking employees that they will never be hired again.

WE WILL NOT urge employees to select as their bargaining agent a labor organization other than the one they have selected and tell them that only a union having company approval will be recognized.

WE WILL NOT grant employees a wage increase in order to defeat a union organizing drive.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees, whether or not they are on strike, or otherwise discriminate against them in their hire or tenure, in order to discourage their support of and activities on behalf of Local 478, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally grant wage increases or make changes in working conditions without first bargaining in good faith with Local 478, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed to them by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL recognize and, upon request, bargain collectively in good faith with Local 478, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All full-time and regular part-time truckdrivers, platform workers, and mechanics employed at our Neptune and Tinton Falls, New Jersey, facilities, exclusive of office clerical employees, managerial employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL offer full and immediate reinstatement to Darren Brown, Kevin Brown, Anthony Coffero, Steven Cole, Daniel Florio, Joseph Fontana, Frank Harrington, Thomas Henville, John Hewlitt, Joseph Hildebrandt, Stafford Hoffman, James La Pointe, Ray La Pointe, and Brian O'Connor, and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination practiced against them, with interest.

Region 22 of the National Labor Relations Board and amended at the hearing, which alleges that Respondent Twin County Trucking, Inc.,[2] violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein called the Act. More specifically, the amended complaint alleges that Respondent offered wage increases to employees to dissuade them from supporting the Union, told employees that their selection of the Teamsters as a bargaining agent was an act of futility, threatened to discharge employees and to close the plant if the Teamsters became the bargaining agent, coercively interrogated employees concerning their union sympathies and activities, discharged Daniel Florio because of his union activities, and failed and refused to reinstate 14 named strikers upon their unconditional application. The General Counsel seeks a so-called Gissel[3] bargaining order and a bargaining order restraining Respondent from refusing to bargain by unilaterally changing the wages and other terms and conditions of employment of its dock workers without first bargaining about these issues with the Teamsters. Respondent denies these allegations. It asserts that the Teamsters is not the majority representative of their employees and it has no obligation to recognize and bargain with the Teamsters. The Charging Party contends that the Board should sustain the objections it filed to the election conducted at Respondent's terminal on May 8, 1980, because of the unfair labor practices noted in those objections and other unfair labor practices alleged in the amended complaint. Upon these contentions, the issues herein were joined.[4]

I. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ALLEGED

Respondent is a trucking company which is owned and operated by Joe Lee.[5] It maintained a terminal at Neptune, New Jersey, and now operates principally at Tinton Falls, New Jersey. Respondent makes what are essentially local deliveries although its trucks regularly operate in States other than New Jersey. In the spring of 1980, when the events in this case took place, Respondent employed 40 drivers, mechanics, dockworkers, and helpers, all of whom were unrepresented by any labor organization. Most of its warehousemen (referred to in the record as dock workers or platform workers) worked between the hours of 5 p.m. and midnight (or later). It was within the ranks of this group that the Teamsters organizing effort had its inception.

In early March 1980, in response to various complaints that had been discussed among the platform crew, dockworker Anthony Coffero contacted Teamsters Local 584 in Union, New Jersey, and told the Union that Respondent's employees were interested in joining. Coffero spoke by phone with Business Agent John Senick, obtained designation cards[6] from Senick by mail, and began passing them out to other employees at the terminal. By April 1, 1980, Coffero and his associates had collected signed cards from 21 dockworkers, mechanics, and drivers.[7] The parties agree that, on that date, Respondent employed some 40 individuals in this unit.[8] Accordingly, as of April 1, the Charging Party represented a majority of unit employees.[9]

On March 28, Senick sent a letter to Respondent in which he stated that Teamsters Local 478 had been designated as the bargaining agent for its drivers and platform men and that he would like to set up a meeting with company representatives for the purpose of negotiating a contract. On Monday, March 31, Senick received a phone call from Fred Grill, Respondent's terminal manager, who informed Senick that he would like to have a meeting the following week. Senick said he would be available, so Grill told him he would call again to establish a firm date. Later that day, Grill phoned the Union's office and left word that he would not meet with Senick upon advice of his lawyer.

On April 1, Senick spoke by phone with Thomas F. X. Foley, Respondent's attorney. There is a dispute as to dispatchers, and helpers, with the usual exclusions, filed by Local 1964, International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO (herein called ILA), on April 14, 1980; Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election agreement approved by the Regional Director for Region 22, on April 24, 1980; election held on May 8, 1980; objections to the conduct of the election filed by Teamsters on May 15, 1980; Report on Objections and Challenges issued on July 23, 1980.

[2] Respondent admits, and I find, that it is a New Jersey corporation which operates a warehouse and interstate trucking business in Tinton Falls and Neptune, New Jersey. During the preceding year, it performed trucking services from points and places inside the State of New Jersey to points and places outside the State of New Jersey valued in excess of $50,000. Accordingly, it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Both the Teamsters and ILA are labor organizations within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[4] Certain errors in the transcript have been hereby noted and corrected.

[5] While his name figured prominently in these proceedings, Joe Lee neither testified nor appeared during the course of the 3-day hearing in this case. His absence was unexplained. In accordance with well-settled rules of evidence, I will assume that, had Joe Lee testified, his testimony would support the General Counsel's case.

[6] The union cards used in this campaign were conventional authorization cards which stated on their face:

> I, the undersigned, hereby apply for admission to membership in the above Local Union and voluntarily choose and designate it as my representative for purposes of collective bargaining, hereby revoking any contrary designation. . . .

The cards also contained other undertakings and provided spaces for the insertion of the date, the name, and other information pertaining to the applicant, and the applicant's signature.

[7] Respondent acknowledged the validity of cards signed by employees Kevin Brown, Fred Brown, Anthony Coffero, Daniel Florio, Joseph Fontana, Frank Harrington, Thomas Henville, John Hewlett, Joseph Hildebrandt, James LaPointe, Raymond LaPointe, Bryan O'Connor, and Donald Randall, and agreed that their cards should be admitted into evidence by stipulation. The General Counsel established through eyewitness testimony that signed cards had been presented to Coffero on or before April 1, 1980, by Eugene Bennett, Darren, Brown, Stephen Cole, Stafford Hoffman, Walter Hughes, Roger Neil, David Summers, Gerald Wardell, and Dennis Winslow. A 23d card, signed by William Dunnkosky, was admitted into evidence. However, Dunnkosky did not begin to work for Respondent until after the strike began and signed his card on April 9.

[8] In addition to the 22 employees whose names are recited in fn. 7 as having signed cards on or before April 1, Respondent also employed the following 18 bargaining unit employees on that date: Douglas Bass, Richard Boucher, George Conklin, John Dangler, Gary Daniel, Robert Harris, Julius Helmlinger, Donald Huey, James Jenkins, John Kelly, John Lowe, John La Belle, Thomas La Belle, Thomas Przybylinski, Donald Sullivan, Daniel Thorpe, Dennis Vitello, and Richard Warth.

[9] Respondent contends that a claim of majority status should be measured against a unit which had six additional employees—Bruce Burns, Gordon Dreher, Brian Gioia, Raymond Meyers, William Maximo, and Alex Mamusis. However, none of these employees was hired until at least April 7, and some were hired after that date.

some of the contents of this conversation and particularly concerning whether or not Senick offered to exhibit the cards then in his possession to a neutral third party for purposes of a card check. There is no doubt that, in the course of this phone conversation, Senick again demanded recognition. At Foley's request, Senick wrote Respondent a second letter, dated April 2, in which he stated that he had in his possession authorization cards signed by a majority of Respondent's drivers and platform men. He again asked that Respondent contact him immediately for the purpose of commencing negotiations.

Shortly thereafter, a sign was posted on the dock notifying dockworkers and drivers that a meeting with Joe Lee would be held on the following Friday morning, April 4. Friday was a holiday and attendance at the meeting necessitated a special trip to the terminal by employees who attended. During the week preceding the meeting, several supervisors had occasion to speak with dockworkers concerning the Teamsters organizing drive. In a conversation at the dock with employee Tony Coffero and several others, Grill stated that there could be trouble at the Company because of the Union drive. He went on to say that, knowing Joe Lee as he did, if the Teamsters came in, Lee would just lock the doors. He also informed employees that, to be eligible to vote in a representation election, an employee had to be at least 18 years of age with 1,000 hours of company service. On another occasion during the same week, dock worker John Kelly asked Grill if Grill knew who brought the Union into the terminal. Grill replied that he was going to get some of his buddies to find out and then "cut his — off."

Night Foreman David Russell informed several of the dockworkers that they did not have to attend the Friday morning meeting. He said that Joe Lee was going to discuss the pros and cons of Local 478 but only those eligible to vote in a representational election could attend. He repeated Grill's statement that only those over 18 years of age with 1,000 hours of company service could vote. Coffero told Russell that he would like to see those eligibility requirements in writing and asked him what was going to happen at the meeting. Russell replied that it was going to come down to the fact that, if the Teamsters got in, Joe Lee would lock the doors and all the employees would be out of work. When asked how Lee could carry this off, Russell replied that Lee could close down and reopen 30 days later under another name. He also suggested that Lee had the option of merging his Company with another company named Castways.

A few days before the meeting, Grill and Russell had occasion to speak privately at the warehouse with dockworker Joseph Hildebrandt. On that occasion, they told Hildebrandt that they were going to restructure the warehouse, keeping five full-time employees and 2 part-time employees in addition to Hildebrandt. At that time, there were two part-time employees and 12–15 others who worked about 35 or more hours a week in the warehouse. They offered Hildebrandt a job as foreman, at an increase of $6.25 (as compared with his current rate of $4 per hour), and told him that he would get an extra 75 cents per hour across the board on Labor Day. They mentioned the names of the dockworkers who would be retained on the payroll as full-time employees. They also asserted that they did not know who had started the unionization effort but whoever did it would be fired and not rehired.

During the conversation, Grill told Hildebrandt that he suspected that Danny Florio had started the union drive. Hildebrandt refused to comment. He told Grill and Russell that he appreciated the confidence that was implied in their offer of a promotion and a raise but informed them that, if the purpose of the meeting were simply to pump him about who started the union drive or to inquire into the specifics of the drive, the conversation was at an end because he would not divulge any such information. Grill told Hildebrandt that he did not care who signed union cards and then reversed his position by asking Hildebrandt if in fact he had signed a card. Hildebrandt replied that he had signed a card and that everyone else had also signed cards.

Throughout the week of March 31–April 4, Russell told employees that unionization was useless, that Joe Lee would never stand for the Teamsters, and that he would go to any length to stop them. On one occasion, just after the dockworkers had punched out for the night, he told them that Lee would simply close the doors, that Lee would not pay the Teamsters wage scale, and that the employees would be out of a job.

During this same period of time, Russell asked dockworker Frank Harrington who started the union effort. Harrington refused to say. He also asked Harrington if he would attend the Friday meeting. Harrington replied that he was committed to Local 478 and that he would not attend. Russell told Harrington that the Company was going to implement a plan for the warehouse which provided for six full-time employees, including a foreman, and two part-timers. He indicated that Harrington was among those who would be retained, that the new wage rate would be $6 per hour, and that Hildebrandt would receive $6.75. Russell also said that Joe Lee was going to have a medical and health plan, paid holidays, and a regular evening lunch period. He then named the other employees who would be retained. When Harrington asked if Coffero would be one of them, Russell said, "No." Russell said again that only those who had 1,000 hours of company time and were over the age of 18 would be eligible to vote on the question of unionization. Harrington responded that this rule would eliminate everyone who joined except Dallas Hoffman and Steve Colley. Russell's only comment was, "That's the law."

As advertised, Lee held a meeting of certain employees on the morning of April 4 in his office at the warehouse. Most truckdrivers attended but Hildebrandt was the only dock worker who showed up. Lee gave the assembled employees an account of what he paid out, stating that his books were open for inspection if anyone desired to see them. He went on to say that, if the Teamsters came in, he would have to pay specified benefits and there was no way he could do so. Lee told his employees that he had other business ventures and could survive without the trucking company. I credit testimony to the effect that Lee threatened on this occasion to close the terminal if the Teamsters came in. He said he had other alternatives, such as merging with Castways, but affirmed that neither Teamster Local 478 nor Local 701 would represent employees in his Company.

Turning to Hildebrandt, Lee said that he was appalled at the treatment that the dockworkers had been getting. He admitted that he had overlooked them but asserted that he was going to make it up to them. He said he had been checking around, and specifically with Hoffman Trucking Company, and had learned that ILA-represented dockworkers at Hoffman's were making $5.25 per hour. He said he was going to make certain dock workers full-time employees and increased their pay to $6 an hour in order to make up for the neglect which they had suffered.[10]

Coffero had a meeting with Senick later on in the day and told Senick what he had heard about the meeting in Lee's office. Coffero had not attended that meeting. He made particular reference to Lee's plan to reduce the number of dockworkers. Senick told Coffero that, if the Company did not put all the men to work on Monday, Coffero should call a strike.

Dockworkers were next scheduled to report for work at 5 p.m. on Monday, April 7. One dockworker, Daniel Florio, had been absent from work the preceding Wednesday and Thursday. When he arrived at the terminal on April 7, Grill asked him why he had been off work. He explained that he had been absent in order to take a government examination as a third-class marine radio operator. Grill also asked him if he had heard anything about the Union. Florio said that he had heard something. Grill replied that he did not care who started the Union as long as the men did not go through with it, because Joe Lee would shut the plant down before letting a union come in. He then told Florio to go and speak with Russell in the office.

When Florio spoke to Russell, Russell told him that he would have to let him go because he had been absent. Florio objected, stating that he had received permission to be off on Wednesday and on Thursday if necessary. Russell retorted that Florio had only asked him for 1 day's leave. Florio explained that he had needed 2 days off—one to study for the examination and the other to take the test, but his explanation was to no avail.

Florio reported his discharge to other dockworkers as they were arriving for work. Another employee, Fred Brown, had also been terminated. When the dockworkers arrived, Grill and Russell held a brief meeting for the purpose of filling them in on changes which the Company was going to make at the terminal. Grill told these workers what had occurred at the Friday meeting which Joe Lee held. The employees were also told that Lee had stated his feeling that dockworkers had been neglected and that he had apologized for the neglect. Grill reported that Lee had been checking other terminals and hoped that the men could sit down and come to a compromise concerning a possible pay increase at the Twin City warehouse. Grill reported that Lee had said at the Friday meeting that he could not absorb the scale in the Teamsters General Freight Agreement and added his own comment to the effect that, the way the men were going then, everyone would be out of work. Grill did say that Lee would be comfortable with the union at Hoffman Trucking Company.

Hildebrandt, Harrington, and Coffero replied. They said that the choice of a union belonged to the employees, not to the Company. Grill and Russell were then asked why Florio and Fred Brown had been fired. Grill stated that Brown had been fired at the request of their insurance company because he did not have a driver's license and was involved in an accident while jockeying trucks around in the terminal yard. He said that Florio had been fired for missing work too often and for being absent without calling in.

Grill announced the Company's plan to employ only five full-time dock workers and two part-timers. He told the employees that, if they did not follow the plan, Joe Lee would turn the key in the door and either sell the Company or merge with Castways. In any event, he would not let Local 478 come in. Various employees objected, saying that this would leave 10 or 12 men out of work. At this point in the meeting, Hildebrandt gave Grill an argument. He said that the new arrangement was fine with him personally since it meant he was getting a raise but questioned Grill as to its effect on other employees who would be out of work. Grill suggested that the men sit down and talk with Joe Lee, asserting that Joe Lee wanted either a company union or a union from the outside that he could live with. Hildebrandt replied that the men wanted the Teamsters but that they would be amenable to negotiating with Lee, stating "We don't want to shoot the works right off. We want to reason with Lee and don't want to kill him with a wage rate he can't pay." Grill replied, "That's not going to happen. There will be five full time [men and] two part-time."

Coffero and others told Grill that the men could not handle that proposal because it would mean being without a job until an opening occurred. Grill's response was, "You do what you have to do and we will do what we have to do." The dockworkers held a brief meeting among themselves and decided to walk out.

On the same evening, they established a picket line in front of the terminal, using homemade signs which read, "Twin County Trucking Company on Strike, Local 478." I credit corroborated testimony in the record that, in the course of that evening, Grill came out to the picket line, told the pickets that he had checked with Joe Lee, and informed them that they were all fired.

Early Tuesday morning, Lee had occasion to speak with Coffero and striking employee Joseph Fontana in the Company's parking lot. Lee asked Coffero why he had not attended the meeting on Friday. Coffero replied that he did not want to hear about any union that Lee might propose. Lee apologized to Coffero and Fontana for the treatment which had been accorded to dockworkers in the past. He made reference to their wage rate and working conditions,[11] including the fact that dockworkers received no regular break during the course of the evening to eat dinner. He said that he was going to make it up to the men, adding that, if Coffero had come to the meeting, he would have seen for himself that Lee was trying to be fair. He said that he had checked around and found that dockworkers in the area were being paid between $5.25 and $5.75 per hour. He stated that, if he could afford $6.25 an hour, he would pay it, and asked Coffero and Fontana to think about going back to work for $6 an hour.[12] Lee told them that the Teamsters were a bunch of gangsters and hardnoses and that he could not deal with them or live with them. He mentioned the ILA and said there was a possibility of having just a warehouse unit apart from the drivers. Coffero replied that this plan would provide no security, arguing that, if the men got rid of Local 478, they had no job security and Lee could then get rid of the them.

[10] At that time, dock workers were earning between $3.50 and $4 per hour.

[11] One of the major complaints which dockworkers had previously brought to Grill's attention was harsh treatment given them by Night Supervisor Russell. Russell is no longer with the Company

Lee then asked Coffero to call off the strike. Coffero said that he could not do so and told Lee he would have to speak with Senick. Lee then asked Coffero to arrange a meeting with Senick and Coffero did so. A meeting took place at 11 that morning in Lee's office. The upshot of the meeting was that Lee agreed to reinstate Florio and Brown and to pay the men for Monday night. The dockworkers then returned to work Tuesday evening. Senick and Lee also discussed, in general, the terms of the Teamsters standard area agreement. Lee told Senick that he was just starting in business and could not afford the Teamsters wage scale or the Teamsters health and welfare contributions.

I credit testimony in the record to the effect that, in the course of this discussion, Senick told Lee he held authorization cards signed by a majority of the employees in the unit. When Lee questioned this statement, Senick offered to exhibit them to a clergyman for purposes of a card check. He told Lee he did not want to let Lee see the cards personally for fear of company reprisal against card signers. He also asked Lee to bargain with him and Lee agreed to sit down and negotiate. However, Lee told Senick that he wanted to contact his attorney first because he felt that he was personally a poor negotiator. He informed Senick that he would set up an appointment the following week. Senick reported the results of this meeting to the picketing employees. They ceased picketing and returned to work at or before their regular starting time of 5 p.m.

On Tuesday evening, four or five employees were sent home about 8 p.m. One of these was Bryan O'Connor, who carpooled with Coffero and who had to walk home, a distance of about 5 or 6 miles, because Coffero continued working. Coffero objected to Russell about sending men home, claiming it was a breach of the agreement which had been concluded in Lee's office earlier in the day. Russell just laughed. Coffero also brought to Russell's attention the fact that O'Connor would have to walk 6 miles in order to get home. Russell was equally indifferent to this complaint.

On the following morning, April 9, Coffero called Senick and told him what had happened the previous evening. Senick instructed Coffero to call another strike if all of the men did not work on Wednesday evening, adding that he thought the Company was trying to wear the men down gradually and break the Union. At starting time on Wednesday the platform crew began to work as usual. However, about 8 p.m. Russell came to Coffero, asked him not to get upset, but informed him that he was sending men home at that time as he had the previous evening. He told Coffero that the Company was gradually working its way into a system which required five full-time dockworkers and two part-timers. Coffero's response was, "It looks like you are trying to start more trouble." Russell's only comment was, "You do what you have to do and I'll do what I have to do." Coffero held a brief meeting with the dockworkers, after which all of them walked out and reestablished their picket line. This picket line lasted until May 8, when a representation election was conducted at Respondent's terminal. Among those going on at this time were the 14 employees whose names appear in paragraph 25 of the first amended complaint.

I credit corroborated testimony in the record that, shortly after the dockworkers went out on strike for the second time, Grill came out to the picket line and told the pickets again that they were all fired for walking off the job for no reason. A few days after the picketing began anew, Grill went through the picket line and spoke to several pickets in passing. He told them that he was sorry about what had happened and stated that it was a shame the Company and the men could not come to some kind of agreement. However, he warned the pickets that, if the Teamsters came into the plant, Joe Lee would simply close the doors and everyone, including himself, would be out of a job.

On another occasion, Grill spoke with Hildebrandt at the picket line. He said that the men were foolish for going on strike, that they were not going to get anywhere, and that the Teamsters were just a bunch of gangsters who wanted their money. He asked Hildebrandt why he had signed a card and why the dockworkers "were doing something like this." Hildebrandt replied that the men had been receiving ridiculous treatment on the dock and just could not get any relief. Grill insisted that they should have come to him and "we could have worked out something more equitable," adding that the men were just "screwing" themselves because Joe Lee could close the doors. He told Hildebrandt that he could find a job anywhere because he had been in trucking a long time, but the strikers would be out of jobs and so would a lot of employees who were still working.

On April 10, Lee spoke to Harrington near the picket line while Harrington was reading the paper in his car. Lee told Harrington that it was too bad that the trouble had started. He said he had been meaning to put into effect a plan which would pay the dockworkers more money and improve their conditions but he had been occupied in consolidating new business for the Company. He went on to say that it was also too bad that the men went for Teamsters Local 478 because they were a bunch of gangsters. Lee insisted that Local 478 would never be allowed in his Company, insisting that if a union were allowed to come in, it would be a union he approved of. He made specific reference to a "Hoffman Company union." Harrington asked Lee what he meant by a "Hoffman union." Lee replied that it was ILA Local 1964. He explained that Local 1964 was in at the Hoffman Company and that he had some familiarity with it. Harrington replied that the "president of the company doesn't pick the union; the men pick the union." Lee then told Harrington that, if Local 478 got in, he would merge the Company with Castways Freight and turn the key in the door, because Local 478 would never represent the men in his Company.

[12] At that time both men were making $3.50 an hour.

Harrington had another casual conversation with Lee at the picket line. On one occasion, Harrington told him that "we'll be back in there legally, moving freight for your company." Lee retorted, "Never. You will never work for me again." During the course of another conversation, Lee came out with a trade publication in the trucking industry and informed Harrington of a help wanted ad appearing in the paper for a truck salesman. (Harrington had previously been a truck salesman.) Harrington told Lee that he was not interested because the truck business was "shot" and because he liked the physical work involved in the freight business. He also said he needed a job and intended to stay in the freight business.

On April 14, ILA Local 1964 filed a representation petition seeking an election in the unit for which the Teamsters had made a demand. On April 23, a representation case conference was held at the Board's office in Newark, attended by representatives of Respondent, Local 1964, and Teamsters Local 478, which had intervened. A stipulation for certification upon consent agreement was signed and an election was scheduled for May 8. The Teamsters was represented at the representation case by its attorney, John A. Craner. In the course of the discussions which took place at the conference, Craner told Lee and his attorney, Thomas F. X. Foley, that he was offering to return all strikers to work immediately and unconditionally. Either Lee or Foley replied that they could return only when and if there were openings and informed Craner that there were no current openings.

Several striking employees attended the conference. Upon their return to the terminal at Neptune, they spoke with Grill. Hildebrandt told Grill about the conversation between Craner and Lee at the conference concerning the reinstatement of strikers. Grill said that he would have to see if any openings developed. Although vacancies have occurred from time to time at the terminal since that date, none of the individuals named in the first amended complaint have been reinstated.

At a representation election held on May 8, the tally of ballots revealed that ILA Local 1964 received 19 votes, Teamsters Local 478 received 17 votes, and 10 votes were challenged. The Report on Objections and Challenges recommended that three challenges be sustained, that two be overruled, and that the other five be held in abeyance, pending a determination as to whether the challenged voters were replacements for economic strikers or for unfair labor practice strikers.

II. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. Independent Violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act

(a) Grill's statement to several dockworkers during the week of March 31–April 4, to the effect that there could be trouble at the Company because of the Union's drive and that if the Teamsters came in Joe Lee would just lock the doors, is a clear and emphatic threat which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(b) During this same period of time, Grill stated to employee John Kelly that he did not know who started the Union but that he was going to get his buddies to find out who was responsible and then "cut his — off." A threat to castrate, whether taken literally or viewed merely as a figure of speech, has an unmistakably coercive impact and violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. See N.L.R.B. v. Moss Planing Mill Co., 206 F.2d 557 (4th Cir. 1953).

(c) Russell's statement to Coffero on the eve of the Company's meeting that, if the Teamsters got in, Joe Lee would lock the doors and all of the employees would be out of work is also a clear and emphatic threat which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Russell's elaboration of the way in which Lee could close the business, either by merger with another company or by closing and later reopening under another name, emphasized his remarks and compounds the gravity of his illegal statements.

(d) The statement of Grill and Russell to Hildebrandt, on the occasion when they offered him a promotion and a substantial wage increase, that the Company did not know who started the Union but the employee responsible would be discovered, discharged, and not rehired is a threat which violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(e) There is little doubt that the restructuring of the warehouse which was decided on immediately upon the receipt of the Union's demand letter, as well as the proposed wage increases which accompanied this reorganization, were part of an effort by Respondent to head off the unionization of the terminal. Accordingly, when Grill and Russell offered Hildebrandt a promotion and a wage increase on or about April 2, their action constituted a promise of benefit aimed at discouraging union activity and violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. N.L.R.B. v. Exchange Parts Company, 375 U.S. 405 (1964). The same findings apply to the actual grant of wage increases which Respondent made to several returning strikers to induce them to abandon the strike.

(f) Grill's question to Hildebrandt as to whether Hildebrandt had signed a union card constitutes illegal interrogation which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(g) Grill's statement to Hildebrandt that he suspected that Danny Florio had started the union drive constitutes the creation of the impression that union activities of employees are the subject of company surveillance and violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(h) Russell's statement to employees that unionization was useless, that Joe Lee would never stand for the Teamsters, and that he would go to any lengths to stop them amounts to a statement that their union activities were futile and thus violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

His further statement that Lee would close the doors and the employees would be out of a job is a threat which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(i) Russell's interrogation of employee Frank Harrington as to who started the union drive is coercive interrogation which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(j) Russell's statement to Harrington that, under the new plan for the warehouse, Harrington and others would receive a pay increase is a promise of benefit aimed at discouraging union activity and violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(k) The credited testimony to the effect that Joe Lee, when speaking, to employees at the Friday meeting, told them that if the Teamsters came in he would close the terminal constitutes a threat which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(l) Lee's promise, made on the same occasion, to raise wages of dockworkers and make up for the neglect they had suffered, constitutes an illegal promise of benefit which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(m) Grill's statement to Florio on April 7, that Lee would shut down the plant before letting a union come in, is a threat which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(n) Grill's statement on April 7, to assembled dockworkers, in which he repeated Lee's statement of the previous Friday that he apologized for his neglect of dockworkers in the past and hoped that the men could sit down and work out a compromise on wage increases, is a promise of benefit which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. His further statement on this occasion that, the way the men were going, everyone would be out of work is a threat which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(o) Grill's statement to dockworkers on this occasion that Lee would never accept the Teamsters as the employees' bargaining agent constitutes an unlawful interference with the protected concerted activities of employees and violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(p) Lee's statement to Coffero and Fontana at the picket line on April 8 that he was sorry about past problems among dockworkers concerning wages, lack of a fixed dinner break, and other aspects of their working conditions and that he would make it up to them constitutes a promise of benefit aimed at inducing them to abandon a strike and violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(q) Grill's statement to pickets during the strike that, if the Teamsters came into the plant, Joe Lee would close the doors and everyone including himself would be out of a job is a threat which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(r) Grill's questions to Hildebrandt on the picket line as to why he signed a card and why the dockworkers were "behaving like this" constitutes unlawful interrogation which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(s) Grill's further statements to Hildebrandt on the picket line that the dockworkers, by striking, were merely "screwing" themselves because Lee would close the doors and they would all be out of jobs is a threat which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(t) Lee's statement to Harrington at the picket line that, if a union were allowed to come in at Twin County, it would be a union which Lee approved of and that the men should select the "Hoffman Company union," namely, ILA Local 1964, is an interference with Section 7 rights of employees which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(u) Lee's statement to Harrington at the picket line on this occasion that, if the Teamsters came in, he would merge the business with Castways and turn the key in the door because Local 478 would never represent the Company is a threat which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(v) Lee's statement to Harrington at the picket line on another occasion that Harrington would never work for Lee again constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

B. The Discharge of Daniel Florio

Daniel Florio was a dockworker who had signed a union card and who had attended a meeting of dockworkers with Union Business Agent Senick which was held on March 18, at Gepps' Bar. While Florio was by no means the most active union supporter, Grill suspected that he was and voiced this suspicion to Hildebrandt on or about April 1. Grill was also heard to say that he would find out who brought the Union into the terminal and would "cut — off."

Florio was fired on April 7, by Russell, ostensibly because he asked for a day off to take a marine radio operator's examination and instead took 2 days off. When Russell was called to the stand, he did not corroborate Respondent's defense. Instead, Russell testified in a rambling manner concerning another and remote occasion on which Florio had been given time off to take another examination. He gave no support to the Company's position that Florio was entitled to be off only on the Wednesday before his discharge and that he was scheduled to return to work on Thursday. Florio testified credibly that he had asked Russell in advance for time off to take the radio operator's examination and had told Russell that he might need 2 days off, one on which to study for the examination and one on which to go to Philadelphia to take the examination. In fact, Florio took off the Wednesday and Thursday prior to his discharge for this excused purpose. Friday was Good Friday and a holiday at Respondent's terminal. Testimony in the record concerning an occasion on which Florio was found drunk in the parking lot related to an incident which was remote in time from the discharge and had no causal connection with it.

The discharge of a suspected leader in the organizing campaign took place against a background of strong union animus. It was effectuated for a purported reason which was not substantiated by record testimony and for a reason which was clearly pretextual, inasmuch as Florio was given permission to be away the day on which he was assertedly absent without leave. The fact that Florio was reinstated on April 8 in no way affects the original illegality of the discharge. Accordingly, by discharging Daniel Florio on April 7, because of his union membership and his union activity, Respondent herein violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

C. The Character of the Original Strike On April 7, 1980

On Friday, April 4, Senick told Coffero that, if Respondent did not put all the men to work on April 7, he should call a strike. It has already been found that Respondent's plan to cut the size of its work force at the dock and to raise the wages of the remaining dockworkers was directly prompted by the onset of the organizing campaign and by Respondent's desire to prevent the Teamsters from coming into the terminal as the bargaining agent of the employees. Accordingly, a strike to protest the implementation of this discriminatively motivated change in wages and working conditions was an unfair labor practice strike.

It is also clear that the striking employees were greatly concerned with the reasons for the discharge of Brown and Florio. They discussed these discharges with Grill and Russell at the meeting of April 7, and questioned these management representatives as to the reasons these two dockworkers had been terminated. There is little doubt that one of the causative factors which prompted this walkout was the discriminatory discharge of Florio and that one of the necessary conditions for calling off that strike was Florio's reinstatement, a condition which Lee agreed to on April 8. Accordingly, I conclude that Respondent's further unfair labor practice in discharging Florio caused or prolonged the April 7 walkout.

I have also credited corroborated testimony that, on the evening of April 7, Grill came to the picket line, told the pickets that he had spoken with Lee, and informed them that Lee had discharged them. Discharging employees because they have gone on strike violates rights protected by Section 7 and 13 of the Act, and no citation of authority is necessary to establish this proposition. Discharging economic strikers before they are permanently replaced is a violation of the Act. N.L.R.B. v. International Van Lines, 409 U.S. 48 (1972). When Respondent discharged its striking employees on the evening of April 7, it violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. This unfair labor practice also served to prolong the strike which was in progress and to constitute the striking employees as unfair labor practice strikers, if they were not already such from the inception of the walkout.

D. The Character of the Strike of April 9, 1980

There is no factual question that the employees who walked out on April 9 did so because Respondent persisted in implementing its plan for revising the operations of the warehouse. This plan, which called for fewer employees and a substantial increase in the wage rates of the dockworkers who remained, was devised and put into effect as a means of counteracting the Teamsters organizing campaign. As indicated above, this action constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Hence, a strike to protest the further implementation of this plan constitutes an unfair labor practice strike.

On the first night of the second strike, Grill visited the picket line and told the picketing employees[13] that they were all fired for going on strike without a legitimate reason. As noted above, discharging employees because they have gone on strike is a patent and flagrant violation of the law and discharging economic strikers prior to replacement is equally illegal. When Respondent took this action on the night of April 9, it again violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act and its action served to prolong the strike already in progress. Inasmuch as the 14 unfair labor practice strikers thereby became discriminatees, it was not necessary for them to offer reinstatement in order to be entitled to return to their jobs or to receive backpay. Abilities & Goodwill, Inc., 241 NLRB 27 (1979).

On April 23, at the representation case conference in Newark, the unfair labor practice strikers, through their attorney, offered fully and unconditionally to return to work. The offer was refused. The refusal to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers upon their unconditional offer to return to work is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. National Tape Corporation, 187 NLRB 321 (1970); Abingdon Nursing Center, 197 NLRB 781 (1972); ABCO Engineering Corp., 201 NLRB 686 (1973). The refusal by Respondent to reinstate the 14 strikers on April 23 is an unfair labor practice. As it occurred within the period established by the Board in Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, 138 NLRB 453 (1962), for considering objections to the conduct of the election,[14] this unfair labor practice also constitutes grounds for setting aside the election which took place on May 8.

E. The Refusal To Bargain

1. The majority status of the Teamsters

In Trading Port, Inc., 219 NLRB 298 at 301 (1975), the Board determined that "an employer's obligation under a bargaining order remedy should commence as of the time the employer has embarked on a clear course of unlawful conduct or has engaged in sufficient unfair labor practices to undermine the Union's majority." While this holding does not require that a union's majority status be determined as of the same date that the bargaining order commences, it is logical to predicate a finding of majority status based upon the employee complement which existed as of that date.[15] As found above, Respondent embarked upon its campaign of unfair labor practices on or about April 1. The record herein contains a stipulation that some 40 individuals were employed in the bargaining unit on that date.

---

[13] This action was directed at all 14 employees named in par. 25 of the first amended complaint.

[14] The representation petition in Case 22-RC-8201 was filed on April 14, 1980.

[15] Par. 16 of the first amended complaint alleges that all full-time and regular part-time truckdrivers, platform workers, and mechanics employed at Respondent's Neptune, New Jersey, terminal, with the usual exceptions, constitutes a unit appropriate for collective bargaining. Respondent states that such a unit could constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining but denies that such a unit ever existed. It is clear from the record that the unit did exist, is appropriate for collective bargaining, and was the unit in which Respondent agreed to an election which was conducted on May 8. The facility in question was largely relocated some 4 miles away to a new terminal in Tinton Falls, New Jersey, but this relocation in no way affected the appropriateness of the unit.

I have already found that 22 employees, or a majority of the unit employees, had signed Teamsters designation cards on or before April 1. At the hearing, Respondent leveled individual challenges at only two of these cards, namely, those signed by Walter Hughes and Eugene Bennett.[16] Bennett gave no testimony whatsoever which could impinge upon the validity of the authorization card which he signed on March 18, 1980. In Hughes' testimony, he admitted signing a card on March 28. He testified that Coffero told him on that occasion that everyone was going to join, so he signed the card which Coffero handed to him. Later, when the first strike began, Coffero asked Hughes to go on strike, noting that he had signed a card and asking him if he were going to stick with the other employees. Hughes reportedly protested at that point to Coffero, telling Coffero that he had said that everyone was going to sign when in fact they had not. It was at this point that Hughes told Coffero that he wanted no part of the Union.

Even if Hughes' testimony is credited, it does not depict a misrepresentation of fact by Coffero which prompted Hughes to sign an authorization card. Indeed, Coffero's reported statement to Hughes does not constitute a representation of any current or past fact but was merely an expression of hope for the future of the organizing drive. ("Everyone is going to sign.") As such, it forms no basis for challenging the validity of the card on which Hughes showed an allegiance he was quick enough to pledge until the Union's strike action brought home to him the fact that the Union might call upon him to back up his signature with action. Accordingly, I conclude that since April 1, 1980, the Teamsters was the majority representative of Respondent's employees in a unit appropriate for collective bargaining.

2. The Union's demand for recognition

Since a Gissel order is essentially a remedy for a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, such an order need not be predicated upon subsidiary findings that a union has made a demand for recognition or that an employer has rejected that demand. However, since the General Counsel has alleged that Respondent herein violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act as well as Section 8(a)(1) and (3), such findings are appropriate in this case and are amply supported by the record. In its letters of both March 28 and April 2, the Teamsters requested recognition. Senick also requested recognition over the phone in talking with Grill and with Foley and in person while talking with Lee on April 8 at an emergency meeting which took place in Lee's office at the terminal. On this latter occasion, Lee negotiated with Senick concerning the return of the striking employees and the reinstatement of Florio and Freddie Brown. As the meeting concluded, Lee agreed to set up a meeting the following week among himself, his attorney, and Senick for the purpose of further negotiating a collective-bargaining agreement. This action constituted a de facto recognition accorded to the Teamsters by Respondent as the collective-bargaining representative of its drivers, dockworkers, and mechanics. Later, Respondent withdrew this recognition but without any justification or excuse. (The advent of ILA Local 1964 was in no small part prompted by Respondent's own illegal action and Lee's widely expressed preference for the Union which represented employees at the Hoffman Trucking Company.) Accordingly, I conclude that Respondent herein violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

3. The appropriateness of a Gissel order

In 1969, the Supreme Court declared in Gissel Packing Co., supra, that the Board may issue a bargaining order in lieu of directing a representation election in cases where an employer's unfair labor practices are so serious that a fair and free election cannot be held. In the period of time which has elapsed since Gissel, this approach to remedying serious unfair labor practices has been repeatedly applied both by the Board and the courts. See, for example, N.L.R.B. v. Broad Street Hospital and Medical Center, 452 F.2d 302 (3d Cir. 1971); N.L.R.B. v. Easton Packing Company, 437 F.2d 811 (3d Cir. 1971); N.L.R.B. v. Colonial Knitting Corp., 464 F.2d 949 (3d Cir. 1972); Toltec Metals, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 490 F.2d 1122 (3d Cir. 1974); Frito-Lay Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 585 F.2d 62 (3d Cir. 1978); N.L.R.B. v. Kenworth Trucks of Philadelphia, Inc., 580 F.2d 55 (3d Cir. 1978); N.L.R.B. v. Daybreak Lodge Nursing and Convalescent Home, Inc., 585 F.2d 79 (3d Cir. 1978); N.L.R.B. v. Eagle Material Handling, Inc., 558 F.2d 160 (3d Cir. 1977); Electrical Products Division of Midland-Ross Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 617 F.2d 977 (3d Cir. 1980).

Recently, this doctrine has come under fire in some quarters. In his dissent in N.L.R.B. v. K & K Gourmet Meats, Inc., 640 F.2d 460 at 470–471 (3d Cir. 1981), Circuit Judge Gibbons observed:

> It is no secret that at least a significant minority of the members of this court believe that the Supreme Court in N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969), 895 S. Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed. 2d 547 (1969), erred in interpreting the National Labor Relations Act to permit the National Labor Relations Board to enter a bargaining order as a remedy for unfair labor practices committed in the course of an organizing campaign. Nor is it any secret that those judges who are uncomfortable with the Gissel construction of the statute have been signalling the Board vigorously that bargaining orders are unwelcome in this circuit. . . . At the same time the Board is receiving from a different group of judges on this court quite a different signal. . . . These different signals are that we acknowledge the primacy of the Supreme Court in interpreting the Act, at least until Congress speaks, that we acknowledge the primacy of the Board as fact finder, and that if the Board decides to enter a Gissel order we will be satisfied with a statement of reasons reasonably identifying for us the basis, among several permissible bases, for choosing that remedy.

[16] Respondent introduced evidence of misrepresentation relating to assertions made to certain employees who were not card signers but such statements, even if made, could have no possible bearing on the Union's majority status or on the cards which establish that status.

> Until this case, the guerilla warfare against Gissel orders has been carried out by insisting that the Board's opinion writing is so opaque that we cannot understand it and remanding. . . . With the present majority a new weapon is resorted to. The majority simply substitutes its fact finding for that of the Board. Perhaps the new tactic reflects a conclusion that finally the Board has devised a formula for stating its reasons satisfactorily. . . .

While a court may be empowered to ignore Board precedent and Board findings or give an "ungenerous reading"[17] to its own precedents, it may not properly ignore what the Supreme Court has done. Accordingly, I set forth the basis upon which the Supreme Court concluded, in Gissel, that a bargaining order was warranted in that case because a fair and free election could not be held therein. A comparison of the facts in Gissel with the facts in this case amply demonstrates that a Gissel order should be ordered herein. Gissel involved a series of unfair labor practices committed in a bargaining unit of 47 members during the course of an organizing campaign. Those violations included the discriminatory discharge of two employees, an announcement by the company vice president that union meetings would be placed under surveillance and that reports to the company would be made, concerning the presence of a member of the owner's family in the vicinity of a union meeting, several instances of coercive interrogation, a statement by the company vice president to an individual employee that "I can give you more than they [the Union] can," and another statement by the same individual that he did not want to hear more about "this union stuff." The basis upon which I have concluded that a free and fair election could not be run in this case because of the repeated anf flagrant unfair labor practices of this Respondent is set forth above in sections C, 1, 2, 3, and 4 of this Decision, and I reiterate the conduct found therein in support of a recommendation for Gissel order as fully as if I repeated it in haec verba at this point in the Decision. I stress also that the illegal discharge of 14 out of 40 members of a bargaining unit, as found in this case, cannot by any stretch of the imagination be regarded as isolated conduct having no bearing on the expression of employee sentiment at the ballot box.

4. The offering and granting of wage increases to bargaining unit employees

In the amended complaint the General Counsel has alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by offering and then granting wage increases to bargaining unit employees without negotiating those increases with their bargaining agent. According to the Board doctrine enunciated in Trading Port, supra, an 8(a)(5) violation can be predicated upon such conduct if it occurs at or after the point in time when an erring employer has embarked upon a clear course of unlawful conduct or has engaged in sufficient unfair labor practices to undermine the Union's majority status. Such conduct on the part of this Respondent began on or about April 1, 1980, so any unilateral changes in wages or working conditions which were implemented on or after this date without negotiation with the employee bargaining agent amounts to an unlawful refusal to bargain within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

Prior to the Good Friday meeting which Respondent held with some of its work force, several members of the platform crew, including Hildebrandt and Harrington, were told by company supervisors that their wage rate would be substantially increased and that the size of the dock crew would be substantially reduced. This same message was given to all dockworkers by Grill and Russell on Monday evening, April 7. Most of the dockworkers went on strike on April 9, and some drifted back to Respondent's payroll as the strike wore on. Several returning strikers testified at the hearing that, upon their return or shortly thereafter, they began to be paid at rates considerably in excess of what they had been receiving when they walked out. At the emergency meeting between Lee and Senick which was held on the morning of April 8, agreement was reached to hold another meeting the following week for the purpose of negotiating a contract covering the unit here in question. That meeting was called off. At no time did Respondent negotiate any changes in the wages or manning requirements for its dockworkers with the Teamsters nor, with the exception of an agreement to set up an aborted negotiating session, did it even offer to do so. Both wages and manning requirements are mandatory subjects of bargaining. Accordingly, I conclude that, when Respondent unilaterally implemented the above-recited changes without bargaining, it violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, and upon the entire record herein considered as a whole, I make the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Twin County Trucking, Inc., is now and at all times material herein has been engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.
2. Both Local 478, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, and Local 1964, International Longshoreman's Association, AFL-CIO, are, respectively, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. All full-time and regular part-time truck drivers, platform workers, and mechanics employed at the Respondent's Neptune and Tinton Falls, New Jersey, facility, but excluding all office clerical employees, managerial employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.
4. Since on or about April 1, 1980, Local 478, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all of the employees in the unit found appropriate in Conclusion of Law 3 for purposes of collective bargaining, within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

---

5. By refusing to recognize and bargain collectively with, and by withdrawing recognition from, Local 478, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the bargaining unit found appropriate in Conclusion of Law 3 herein; and by unilaterally granting wage increases and making changes in the complement of platform crews without first bargaining in good faith with said Union concerning said changes, Respondent herein violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By discharging Daniel Florio on April 7, 1980; by discharging the employees who went on strike on April 7, 1980; and by discharging Darren Brown, Anthony Coffero, Steven Cole, Daniel Florio, Joseph Fontana, Frank Harrington, Thomas Henville, John Hewlitt, Joseph Hildebrandt, Stafford Hoffman, James La Pointe, Ray La Pointe, and Bryan O'Connor because they engaged in a strike or because of their membership in and sympathy with Local 478, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

7. By refusing on April 23, 1980, to reinstate 14 unfair labor practice strikers upon their unconditional request to return to work, Respondent herein violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Such action also constitutes objectionable conduct warranting the setting aside of an election which was conducted on May 8, 1980, in Case 22-RC-8201.

8. By the acts and conduct set forth above in Conclusions of Law 5, 6, and 7; by threatening to discharge employees, lock the doors, or merge the Company with another company if the Union came in; by threatening to castrate employees because of their union activities; by offering employees promotions, wage increases, and other unnamed benefits in order to defeat the unionization of the Company; by coercively interrogating employees concerning their union activities and the union activities of other employees; by telling employees that their union activities were acts of futility; by urging employees to select as their bargaining agent a labor organization other than the one they had selected and telling them that the only union which the Company would recognize would be one which met company approval; and by telling striking employees that they would never be hired again, Respondent herein violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

9. The strikes which occurred at Respondent's terminal on April 7 and 9, 1980, respectively, were both caused and prolonged by Respondent's unfair labor practices.

10. The aforesaid unfair labor practices have a close, intimate, and adverse effect on the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent herein has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I will recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative actions which are designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act. Since the independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act found herein are repeated and pervasive, I will recommend to the Board a so-called broad 8(a)(1) remedy designed to suppress any and all violations of that section of the Act. Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). As discussed more fully above, the recommended Order will provide for a Gissel remedy and will provide that Respondent be required to offer full and immediate reinstatement to all of the disciminatees named in paragraph 25 of the first amended complaint and to make them whole for any loss of earnings which they may have sustained by reason of the discrimination practiced against them, in accordance with the Woolworth formula,[16] with interest thereon at the adjusted prime rate used by the Internal Revenue Service for the computation of tax payments. Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980); Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). I will also recommend that Respondent be required to post the usual notice, advising its employees of their rights and of the results in this case.

Mount Desert Island Hospital and Malachy Grange. Cases 1–CA–16082 and 1–CA–17599

December 8, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On June 29, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Wallace H. Nations issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.[2]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Mount Desert Island Hospital, Bar Harbor, Maine, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a):

"(a) Offer Malachy Grange immediate employment in any nursing position for which he is qualified without prejudice to whatever seniority and other rights and privileges he would have enjoyed had it not discriminated against him, dismissing, if necessary to make a position available for him, any employee hired to a position he would have held but for such discrimination. In the event no such vacancy presently exists and no one has been hired for such a position since such discrimination, establish a preferential hiring list headed by Grange. If such a preferential hiring list is established, offer Grange employment immediately upon the development of a vacancy for which Grange qualifies."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to rehire or otherwise discriminate against our employees in regard to hiring or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment because they engage in concerted activities protected by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT blacklist our employees or in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights to engage in or refrain from engaging in any or all of the activities specified in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Malachy Grange immediate employment in any nursing position for which he is qualified without prejudice to whatever seniority and other rights and privileges he would have enjoyed had we not discriminated against him, dismissing, if necessary to make a position available for him, any employee hired to a position he would have held but for such discrimination. In the event no such vacancy presently exists and no one has been hired for such a position since such discrimination, WE WILL establish a preferential hiring list headed by Grange. If such a preferential hiring list is established, WE WILL offer Grange employment immediately upon the development of a vacancy for which Grange qualifies.

WE WILL make Malachy Grange whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of our refusal to reemploy him, with interest.

MOUNT DESERT ISLAND HOSPITAL

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALLACE H. NATIONS, Administrative Law Judge: Upon a charge brought in Case 1–CA–16082 on May 16,

[1] In affirming the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Malachy Grange's letter to the Bar Harbor Times constituted concerted activity, we note that prior to sending the letter, which included complaints about employee wage levels and working conditions, Grange engaged in discussions with fellow employees regarding alleged deficiencies in pay, benefits, and working conditions at Respondent's facility.

[2] The Administrative Law Judge recommended that Respondent be ordered to employ Grange in any nursing position for which he qualifies, or the first available position. We find, however, that the appropriate remedy is to require Respondent to offer immediate employment to Grange and, if necessary, to dismiss any employee hired since the discrimination against him into a position for which Grange qualifies. We have therefore, in accordance with this finding, modified the recommended Order and substituted a new notice.

Member Jenkins would compute the interest due on backpay in accordance with his partial dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

259 NLRB No. 80

1979, and a charge brought in Case 1–CA–17599 on June 30, 1980, complaints were issued on June 21, 1979, and August 18, 1980. The order and complaint of August 18, 1980, consolidated the two cases and alleges that on three occasions in 1979 and 1980, Mount Desert Island Hospital (Respondent) refused to rehire Malachy Grange, and on one occasion in 1979, attempted to cause another employer to refuse to hire Grange, for the reason that Grange had engaged in protected concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection and for the reason that he filed charges under the Act, and by its actions, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act. Respondent's answer and motion to dismiss denies these allegations. A hearing was held on March 17 and 18, 1981, at Bar Harbor, Maine. Briefs were received from both General Counsel and Respondent on or about April 29, 1981.[1]

Upon the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent is a hospital providing medical services to the general public at its facilities in Bar Harbor, Maine. Respondent has annual gross revenues in excess of $250,000 and annually purchases goods and supplies valued in excess of $50,000 per year from points outside the State of Maine. I find that Respondent is an employer within the meaning of the Act and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction in this case.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Alleged Refusal To Rehire Grange During 1979 and 1980

1. Background and facts

Respondent is a health care institution located in Bar Harbor, Maine, and is licensed for 66 acute patient care beds. In September 1977, Grange was hired by Respondent as a licensed practical nurse (LPN). Commencing around May 1978, Grange engaged in discussions with other staff members pertaining to low pay, poor benefits, job security, and no seniority system, as part of the working conditions at Respondent's hospital. Grange, thereafter, complained about Respondent's working conditions such as staff shortages, by bringing it to the attention of Director of Nursing Louise Dunne, and Assistant Director of Nursing Margaret Sprott. Grange also submitted signed written complaints about working conditions and placed them in the hospital's suggestion box.

Upon receiving no response to these complaints from the hospital's administration, Grange sent a letter to the editor of the Bar Harbor Times on or about July 3, 1978, and it was printed in the newspaper on July 6, 1978. In general, the letter complained about working conditions at the hospital, employee wage levels, and the level of patient care given by the hospital. The exact text of this letter is appended to this decision as "Appendix B [omitted from publication]."

On July 6, 1978, Grange invited Don Snyder, the editor of the Bar Harbor Times, to attend a staff meeting at Respondent's hospital, for the purpose of verifying from the staff employees the working conditions that were referred to in Grange's published letter. At the staff meeting, which was attended by approximately 30 staff employees, the employees stated their complaints for the benefit of the newspaper. The complaints related to low pay and benefits, lack of security, inadequate staffing, and patient care. On July 6, 1978, at Respondent's parking lot, Grange met Respondent's administrator, Charles Lotreck, and introduced himself to Lotreck by stating, "Mr. Lotreck, I am Mal Grange. Did you read my letter and what did you think about it?" Lotreck did not reply.

On July 13, 1978, letters in response to Grange's letter, that appeared in the prior edition of the newspaper, were published in the Bar Harbor Times, and generally supported Grange's criticism of the working conditions at the hospital. On July 20, 1978, additional followup letters in support of Grange's criticism of Respondent's working conditions were published in the local newspaper. On or about July 20, 1978, Grange was responsible for circulating a petition among his coworkers requesting the community and board of trustees of the hospital to investigate the working conditions at the hospital and bring about needed changes. Approximately 105 staff employees signed the petition, including Supervisors Len Sweet, Norma Spurling, and Paula Knutsen. Grange gave a copy of the petition to the Bar Harbor Times and another copy was placed in Assistant Administrator Paul O'Neill's box at Respondent's hospital with an attached note from Grange requesting him to pass the copy of the petition to Respondent's board of trustees. The petition, with an editorial, and additional followup letters were printed in the Bar Harbor Times on July 28, 1978.

During August 1978, at Grange's request, a staff meeting was held at Respondent's hospital, which was attended by the Bar Harbor Times' editor and by Christopher Spruce of the Bangor Daily News. Director of Nursing Dunne, upon being informed that two newspaper reporters wanted to attend the staff meeting, immediately checked for approval from Lotreck. Lotreck denied approval. Dunne stated that her concern was that no one from management should stay at the staff meeting. Lotreck agreed and stated, "You know a lot of people on the board question why Mal Grange has been seen in your office prior to this meeting."

In December 1978, Grange voluntarily left the employ of Respondent to prepare for his state board examinations to become a registered nurse. Grange took the examinations in February 1977 and was notified that he was successful in passing the examinations as of March 1979. During February 1979, Grange phoned Respondent's Director of Nursing Dunne and inquired about summer employment as a registered nurse at Respondent's hospital. Dunne responded that she had a nursing shortage on the night shift and offered Grange a position immediately as a graduate nurse on the night shift beginning in February 1979. Grange declined the offer of immediate appointment because his plans were indefinite.

[1] Certain errors in the transcript are hereby noted and corrected.

In a letter dated March 13, 1979, from Grange to Dunne, Grange requested an application and consideration for employment. On or about March 27, 1979, Dunne received a phone call from Grange inquiring about prospective summer employment with Respondent. The discussion related to possible nursing positions available and Dunne informed Grange that there were nursing positions available and specifically mentioned the emergency room position on the 3 to 11 p.m. shift. Dunne indicated that she would consider Grange hired pending submission by him of an application. Dunne complied with Grange's request by sending him an application on the following Monday, April 2, 1979. Prior to Dunne leaving on vacation from March 31, 1979, through April 15, 1979, she informed her assistant, Margaret Sprott, that she had a telephone conversation with Grange and discussed the opening position in the emergency room and that as far as she was concerned, Sprott could hire Grange.

On or about April 3, 1979, Grange phoned Respondent's hospital and spoke to Sprott. Grange mentioned that he had spoken to Dunne the previous week and knew that she was now on vacation, but that he had filled out an application and would like to apply for the emergency room, 3 to 11 p.m. shift for the summer of 1979. Sprott replied that she considered Grange hired and inquired as to when he could report. Grange responded that he was not sure of the exact date but that it would be sometime in June. Sprott requested that he notify them of the exact date he would report. Following this telephone conversation, Sprott discussed with staffing secreatry Eileen Holmes putting Grange on the schedule for the 3 to 11 p.m. shift in the emergency room and decided to wait until Grange let them know the exact date he would start. On April 4, 1979, Grange gave his completed application form to Mary Rewa, a nurse at Respondent's hospital, who delivered it to the nursing office.

On or about April 17, 1979, Sprott informed Dunne that she had hired Grange and that he would be informing them of when he could report to work. On April 17, 1979, Dunne informed Lotreck that Sprott had hired Grange while she was on vacation. Lotreck became upset and replied that he did not see how Sprott could have ever done such a thing with all the trouble Grange had caused the hospital the previous summer.[2] Lotreck then instructed Dunne to get in touch with Grange immediately to tell him there would be no position available for him at Respondent's hospital. Dunne phoned Grange on April 17, 1979, and disclosed the contents of her conversation with Lotreck. Dunne mentioned that it was Lotreck's position that Respondent had more than enough applicants for nursing positions and did not anticipate needing Grange. Grange inquired whether anything could be done about it and Dunne replied in the negative.

The final approval of all hiring at Respondent's hospital must be by the hospital's administrator, Lotreck. As noted in the Hospital's Personnel Policy Manual:

> Applicants will be given a preliminary interview by their prospective department head to ascertain their ability to meet the job requirements. Final approval of the administrator is required prior to hiring new personnel.

This policy was in effect at all times relevant to these proceedings.

On April 18, 1979, Dunne informed Lotreck that she had contacted Grange and carried out Lotreck's instructions, but that Grange was upset over Lotreck's decision not to hire him and that Grange might take legal action. On April 18, 1979, a directive was issued by Lotreck to the department heads at the hospital requiring that all applicants for employment go through the personnel department before any final decision is made to hire such applicant. On or about May 2, 1979, Lotreck instructed Respondent's assistant administrator, Paul O'Neill, to contact the administrator of Sonagee Estates and inform him that it would be in the best interest of Sonagee if he did not hire Grange. This action is discussed at a later point in this decision.

In September 1979, Grange went back to Portland, Oregon, which he considered his second home. On March 4, 1980, Grange applied by mail as a registered nurse at Respondent's hospital in emergency room or med./surg., and indicated a willingness as to flexibility in work and hours for summer employment. Respondent's new director of nursing, Dorothy Osborne, responded in a letter dated April 6, 1980, informing that Respondent did not need any summer nurses, nor did it anticipate the need for any nurses, but that it would keep Grange's application on file. Immediately prior to sending this response to Grange's inquiry, Osborne had spoken to Lotreck. Although Lotreck never told Osborne not to hire Grange at this point, Osborne concluded on her own that Lotreck would probably not give final approval to the hiring of Grange while other qualified candidates were available. Because of a prior commitment made at the end of the prior summer's employment, the hospital did hire one LPN, Elizabeth Muckel, as a summer employee. The hospital prefers to hire non-RN's to assist in the summer. Statistics introduced by Respondent indicated that a greater percentage of Respondent's nursing care is delivered by registered nurses in institutions of similar size. The percentage of nursing care delivered by LPN's is lower than at other institutions. With the RN staff at a comparatively high level, and an increase in patient census in the summer, the hospital's position is that it is reasonable to respond to the increased demand by hiring less costly aides and LPN's. There was no evidence presented to show that the hospital hired additional, nonspeciality RN's for regularly scheduled shifts during the summer.

The hospital used the services of The Traveling Nurse Corps (TNC), in the winter of 1979-80. TNC is similar to "Manpower, Inc." in that it can provide experienced registered nurses with speciality skills on a temporary basis. TNC nurses were used to fill vacancies for which the hospital was attempting to hire permanent RN's with speciality skills. No general duty (alternately referred to as med./surg.) nurses were hired from TNC. Only those who had experience in specific speciality skills were requested by Respondent. Specifically, nurses were provided by TNC who had experience in intensive care and obstetrical services as well as those who had experience in supervising a shift on a floor (charge nurse). Both nursing Directors Dunne and Osborne agreed that those RN's with "specialities" are not always able to exclusively practice within these "specialities." Hence, when there are no patients in need of coronary or obstetrical care, RN's with specialities may be assigned to assist in med./surg., or other areas of the hospital.

[2] Grange's letter, attached as "Appendix B [omitted from publication]," and the public reaction to the letter noted above led to the hospital's decision to terminate its Capital Fund Drive, evidently causing the hospital serious financial harm.

On June 14, 1980, Grange visited the Bar Harbor area and spoke to Respondent's staff doctor, William Horner. Dr. Horner informed Grange that as far as he knew there was an opening at Respondent's hospital for a RN on the 3 to 11 p.m. shift in the emergency room. Dr. Horner further stated that the emergency room was busy enough, that it was Respondent's policy to have a full-time nurse in the emergency room on the 7 a.m. to 3 p.m. day shift and 3 to 11 p.m. shift, and that he was concerned that no one had been hired as yet.

On June 17, 1980, Grange approached Respondent's director of personnel, David Matlack, and inquired about the possibility of being hired by Respondent. Matlack replied that Respondent was not hiring any nurses for summer employment, but were seeking to hire nurses who would stay over the winter, particularly speciality nurses. Following his conversation with Matlack, Grange went to speak with Director of Nursing Osborne. Osborne indicated that the hospital was not looking for summer applications and that her most pressing need was night-shift nurses, particularly speciality nurses for full-time employment. Grange countered that he knew that Elizabeth Muckel was being employed for the summer only and was basically a med./surg. nurse. Osborne noted a prior commitment to Muckel.

On or about June 23, 1980, Grange visited Respondent's hospital and met with Osborne again. At this meeting, Grange changed his application from one seeking summer employment to one seeking full-time employment. Osborne responded that she would get in touch with Grange. On June 25, 1980, Grange phoned Osborne to inquire about whether a decision had been made about his job application. Osborne replied that the only kind of nurses Respondent wanted were speciality nurses and that it did not need med./surg. nurses at all. The hospital did not hire any med./surg. registered nurses during the summer of 1980. However, Osborne did provide Grange's name to Maine Coast Memorial Hospital, a hospital of similar size in Elsworth, Maine, located 20 miles from Mount Desert Island Hospital. Grange rejected employment at Maine Coast Memorial and after spending the summer in Bar Harbor, returned to Oregon.

2. Contentions and conclusions

Respondent's initial defense in this proceeding is that Grange's actions were on an individual basis only, and not on behalf of other hospital employees. The record shows this to be clearly wrong. Grange's letter to the Bar Harbor Times clearly makes reference to working conditions of all of the nursing staff. Moreover, his ability to organize a staff meeting attended by a large number of the hospital nurses and subsequent ability to successfully circulate a petition complaining of working conditions reflects the support Grange had from his coworkers. Thus, I find that Grange's actions did constitute concerted activities on behalf of the hospital's employees generally.

The next and most serious question raised is whether Grange's concerted activities are protected under the Act.

An analysis of the discharge or failure to rehire an employee for activities which are protected under Section 7 begins with the Supreme Court's decision in N.L.R.B. v. Local Union No. 1229, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (Jefferson Standard Broadcasting Company), 346 U.S. 464, 481 (1953). In that case, the employer discharged striking employees who distributed handbills disparaging the quality of the employer's product and its business policies in a manner reasonably calculated to harm the company's reputation. The Supreme Court held that while Section 7 did safeguard the rights of employees to engage in concerted activities for mutual aid or protection, Section 7 was not intended to "weaken the underlying contractual bonds and loyalties of employer and employee." However, as noted in the dissent by Justices Frankfurter, Black, and Douglas:

> The Board and the courts of appeals will hardly find guidance for future cases from this Court's reversal of the Court of Appeals, beyond that which the specific facts of this case May afford.

As predicted in the dissent in Jefferson Standard, the cases following it determining whether a particular activity was protected turn significantly on the facts. Respondent relies on the Board's decisions in Coca Cola Bottling Works, Inc., 186 NLRB 1050 (1980), and Firehouse Restaurant, 220 NLRB 818 (1975), two cases in which an employee or employees publicly alleged that their employers' product was harmful to their customers' health. In both cases, the activities were found to be unprotected. It also cites American Arbitration Association, Inc., 233 NLRB 71 (1977), and an advice memoranda issued by the Division of Advice, University of Southern California Security Department, 99 LRRM 1728 (1978), wherein it was concluded that remarks made during television interviews by campus security officers which were critical of security conditions on the university campus were not protected. Associate General Counsel Datz concluded that the remarks made "would tend to embarass the university's reputation, community relations, and security."

General Counsel relies on a line of cases including United Parcel Service, Inc., 234 NLRB 223 (1978), Spring- field Library and Museum Association, 238 NLRB 1673 (1979), and The Reading Hospital and Medical Center, 226 NLRB 611 (1976). In Springfield, an employee of the Association published an article in the union newsletter which stated, inter alia, that Respondent's chief administrator was:

> . . . a man who never "lost contact" with working professionals because he never had it to begin with. He is simply a man who, when he lost his job at Forbes & Wallace, was put on a form of welfare-for-the-rich courtesy of his friends on the Board of Trustees.

In that case, Respondent argued that the employee went too far, that her statements were libelous, per se, that she insulted a management official, and that such statements by an employee were neither acceptable nor permissable. In reversing the Administrative Law Judge who agreed with Respondent, the Board stated at 1673–74 that:

> Clearly the Administrative Law Judge erred. Specificity and/or articulation are not the touchstone of union or protected concerted activity. Rather, the issue to be addressed is the question of whether or not the comments are related to concerted or union interests. Once the concerted nature of the words is established (as formed by the Administrative Law Judge), Respondent had the burden to show that the words were published with knowledge of their falsity or with reckless disregard of whether they were true or false. In Letter Carriers, 418 U.S. at 283, the Supreme Court stated: [footnote omitted]
> > But Linn recognized that federal law gives a union license to use intemperate, abusive, or insulting language without fear of restraint or penalty if it believes such rhetoric to be an effective means to make its point. [Emphasis supplied.]
>
> In short, Glendon's message to her fellow employees is that they have work-related problems and suggests that one of the reasons for these problems is the manner in which Respondent's administrators are chosen. Respondent's management may very well have been offended by Glendon's "rhetorical hyperbole," but, as the Court said in Linn, supra at 63:
> > . . . the most repulsive speech enjoys immunity provided it falls short of a deliberate or reckless untruth.
> Since Glendon's article clearly is protected concerted union activity, immune from restraint or interference under state libel laws, a fortiori this same conduct is immune from restraint or interference by an employer's disciplinary actions. [Footnote omitted].

Two other cases were cited by Respondent which would support a finding that the letter and subsequent activity of Grange were protected. In Richboro Community Mental Health Council, 242 NLRB 1267 (1979), an employee was denied a promotion because of statements made in a letter which was distributed to an assortment of agencies which funded and/or reviewed the employer. The Administrative Law Judge found that portions of the employee's letter criticizing the employer's administration and chairman of the board were unprotected. The Board disagreed, finding that the purpose of the letter was to complain about the discharge of a fellow employee and that the criticism of the employer's operation were merely cited in support of his major contention that the charging party's fellow employee had been wrongfully discharged.

Another case in which the activity of health care employees was found to be protected was Community Hospital of Roanoke Valley, Incorporated v. N.L.R.B., 538 F.2d 607 (4th Cir. 1976), enfd. 220 NLRB 217 (1975). The dispute arose in the context of an organizational attempt by the Virginia Nurses Association of registered nurses at Roanoke Hospital. The charging parties were identified as leaders of the organizational effort who had made statements on television to the effect that there was no RN coverage during certain shifts, which charging parties attributed to an ongoing dispute over salaries and benefits. The Administrative Law Judge found, with Board and court approval, that the public outburst was caused by the employer's coercive conduct and that the statements made concerning patient care created no cause for alarm by the employer and, therefore, the statements were protected.

With the teaching of the foregoing cases in mind, I have carefully reviewed the letter of Grange which is at the heart of this controversy. I find that the writing of this letter as well as Grange's subsequent activity, constitutes protected activity. Although the letter does attack the hospital's safety levels and administration, the basis for those attacks is closely tied to the working conditions of the nurses at the hospital. Grange's allegations that "only very minimal patient care is given and safety standards are stretched to the limit and beyond" are immediately tied to working conditions, i.e., poor staffing, overwork, and poor pay. The letter also notes that earlier, nonpublic suggestions and complaints had evidently fallen on deaf ears with the hospital's administration and board of trustees. I believe that it is clear from the tenor of the article that its intention was not to harass, disparage, or harm Respondent, but simply to force the administration to take heed of its employees complaints about wages and working conditions at the hospital.

Respondent, acting through its spokesman, Administrator Lotreck, admitted that the reason Grange was not employed by Respondent in June 1979 was because of the newspaper articles that appeared in the Bar Harbor Times during July 1978, all of which emanated from Grange's initially published letter of July 6, 1978. The rejection of Grange's employment for the summer of 1979 by Lotreck created controversy among the administration's personnel as manifested by the pharmacy, therapeutic, and patient care committee meeting held on April 18, 1979; joint conference committee meeting held on May 8, 1979; executive committee meeting on May 9, 1979; and medical staffing meeting on May 10, 1979. At the joint conference meeting held on May 8, and attended by Lotreck, among others, Lotreck was quoted in Dr. Robert Beekman's (an observer) testimony to have stated relative to the subject of Grange, that it was an act of incompetence to hire someone who had been a troublemaker, who had stirred up the nurses, who had taken our problems to the newspapers and the public. Lotreck further stated at the meeting that if he had known that Dunne had hired Grange, Lotreck would not have ordered her to tell him that there was no position; but, Dunne had told Lotreck that Grange had only inquired and no position had been offered to Grange. Dunne, who was present at the meeting, accused Lotreck of not telling the truth in a heated discussion that followed, resulting in Dunne nearly offering her resignation.

Respondent urges that the primary reason for Grange not being hired was based on Grange's exit interview which was critical of Respondent's administration. Review of the exit interview reveals on its face that Grange generally liked the hospital, his coworkers, and supervisors, and the nature of his work. It also reveals that he was critical of the hospital's top administration because of working conditions, pay, and the other matters complained about in the letter to the newspaper and the petition subsequently circulated among the nursing staff. I find that from the record as a whole that Respondent refused to rehire Grange for the summer of 1979 and thereafter primarily because of Grange's published letter in the Bar Harbor Times of July 6, 1978, and the concerted activity that resulted therefrom. As noted earlier, the hospital blames Grange and the publicity surrounding the hospital that emanated from his July 6, 1978, article as causing the hospital to prematurely end its capital fund drive. I find that it is unfair to lay the death of the drive solely at the feet of Grange. Had his accusations about working and other conditions at the hospital been unfounded or patently false, the continuing criticism of the hospital that resulted from the article would not have occurred.

Are there any legitimate business reasons for not hiring Grange unrelated to his protected concerted activity which would justify Respondent's refusal to rehire him? Under the recently formulated test in Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), where there is a possibility of dual or "mixed" motives in the action taken by an employer, one such being proper under the law, and the other being improper, the burden is upon the:

> . . . the General Counsel [to] make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that the protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct.

I have heretofore found that Grange's protected activity is a primary reason for the employer not rehiring him. Grange's exit interview urged by Respondent as the reason for not rehiring him does not reflect an employee so unhappy with his position that one would not rehire him for that reason alone. Respondent offered a significant amount of testimony regarding the availability of positions at the hospital for which Grange was not qualified and conversely the lack of positions for which he was qualified. Respondent's Director of Nursing, Osborne, testified that Grange, on or about June 26, 1980, was not hired as a permanent full-time registered nurse because his qualifications did not meet Osborne's standards. This position is weakened significantly because subsequent to Grange's denial for permanent full-time employment by Respondent on or about June 26, 1980, Osborne offered other applicants registered nurses' positions that Grange was qualified to fill. According to the testimony of Osborne's predecessor, Louise Dunne, Grange was qualified during the summers of 1979 and 1980 to fill the nurse position of med./surg. charge nurse and/or general nurse. He was also qualified to be trained as an OB or ICU nurse. Respondent hired an applicant, Stratton, who started on July 7, 1980, as a charge nurse. She had never previously been employed by Respondent. Whatever may be the actual case with regard to the hospital's desire to hire only nurses with specialized training, I find the true state of affairs with respect to Grange to be that the hospital would not voluntarily rehire him regardless of his qualifications. Accordingly, for all the reasons set forth above, I conclude that Respondent's refusal to rehire Grange constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The General Counsel has also alleged that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(4) of the Act in that the first charge filed in this proceeding by Grange was also reason for the hospital's refusal to rehire him subsequently. I cannot find any substantial evidence in this record to support this charge. As I have noted above, it is my finding that the hospital made a virtually irrevocable decision not to rehire Grange as a result of his protected concerted activities. Certainly the filing of a charge with the Board by Grange in 1979 did nothing to change the hospital's position; however, there is no evidence to establish that it modified or strengthened this position. Accordingly, I cannot find that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(4) of the Act.

B. Blacklisting of Grange

Respondent's administrator, Lotreck, on or about May 2, 1979, instructed his assistant administrator, Paul O'Neill, to contact the administrator of Sonagee Estates Nursing Home and to inform him that it would be in the best interest of Sonagee if he did not hire Grange. In view of the fact that nursing positions in the small community of Bar Harbor, Maine, are limited, Respondent could naturally assume that Sonagee would be one of the few prospective places of employment in the immediate area that Grange could possibly apply. According to the uncontroverted testimony of Richird Collier, administrator at Sonagee, he received a telephone call from O'Neill on or about May 4, 1979, and was informed by O'Neill that Grange was not going to be hired at Respondent's hospital as he was a troublemaker who has caused the hospital a lot of grief. He suggested that Collier not hire Grange. Collier immediately informed his director of nursing, Donna Cameron, about O'Neill's telephone conversation. The sum and substance of this conversation was also communicated by Collier to Grange on May 7, 1979. On May 9, 1979, Collier then communicated the content of his telephone conversation with O'Neill to Dr. Robert Beekman. The testimony clearly reflects an attempt by Respondent to blacklist Malachy Grange from employment with an prospective employer in the Bar Harbor, Maine, area. As I have found that Respondent has refused to rehire Grange because of his protected concerted activity, I likewise find that the attempt to blacklist Grange in Bar Harbor was motivated by this same concerted activity. Respondent's action in this regard further violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Harold Jackson, a sole proprietor, d/b/a Truck and Trailer Service, 239 NLRB 1070 (1978), and Professional Ambulance Service, Inc., 232 NLRB 1141 (1977). The fact that, subsequently, Respondent referred Grange to another hospital for employment does not change my finding. It is entirely consistent with Respondent's desire to get Grange out of Bar Harbor that it find him a job in some other community.

III. THE REMEDY

As I have found that Respondent did engage in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by refusing to rehire and attempting to blacklist Malachy Grange, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I have found that by attempting to blacklist Malachy Grange with a prospective employer in the Bar Harbor, Maine, area, Respondent restrained and coerced its employee in the rights given to him in Section 7 of the Act and in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I recommend that it cease and desist from attempting to blacklist Malachy Grange.

I have found that Respondent unlawfully refused to rehire Malachy Grange because he engaged in protected concerted activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I recommend that Respondent be ordered to reemployee Grange at its Bar Harbor, Maine, hospital facility in any nursing position for which Grange is medically qualified. If no such position exists at this time, I recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer Grange employment for the first available nursing position for which he is qualified. I shall further recommend that Respondent be ordered to make Grange whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of Respondent's unlawful refusal to hire him since June 1979, less net earnings to which shall be added interest to be computed in the manner described in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

On the basis of the above findings of fact and the entire record in this case, I make the following.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Mount Desert Island Hospital is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. By refusing to rehire its former employee, Malachy Grange, since June 1979 because of his protected concerted activities, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(1) and 2(6) of the Act.

3. By attempting to blacklist its former employee, Malachy Grange, with a prospective employer in the Bar Harbor, Maine, area, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. Respondent did not engage in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(4) of the Act as a separate violation of the Act by refusing to rehire its employee Malachy Grange.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I issue the following recommended:

ORDER[3]

The Respondent, Mount Desert Island Hospital, Bar Harbor, Maine, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to rehire or otherwise discriminating against employees in regard to hiring or tenure of employment or any other term or condition of employment because they engage in concerted activities protected by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

(b) Attempting to blacklist its employees or in any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights to engage in or refrain from engaging in any or all of the activities specified in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Employ Maiachy Grange at its Bar Harbor, Maine, hospital facility in any nursing position for which Grange is medically qualified. If no such position exists at this time, employ Grange for the first available nursing position for which Grange is qualified.

(b) Make Malachy Grange whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of Respondent's refusal to reemploy him in the manner set forth in this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this remedial Order.

[3] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(d) Post at its hospital facility, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of said notice on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notice is not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 1, in writing, within 20 days of the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

---

[4] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On June 2, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Richard D. Taplitz issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Charging Party and Operating Engineers Pension Trust, Operating Engineers Health and Welfare Fund, Operating Engineers Vacation-Holiday Savings Trust and Operating Engineers Training Trust, hereinafter the Intervenor,[1] each filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondents B. C. Malcolm and Malcolm Boring Co., Inc., filed a brief in answer thereto.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Re-

---

[1] On September 4, 1980, the Regional Director for Region 31 granted the motion to intervene filed by Operating Engineers Pension Trust, Operating Engineers Health and Welfare Fund, Operating Engineers Vacation-Holiday Savings Trust and Operating Engineers Training Trust.

[2] The Charging Party and the Intervenor have excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

In finding Respondents Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm a single employer, the Administrative Law Judge found, and the record reflects, a substantial degree of functional integration between the operations of the two Companies, including a high degree of employee interchange. Thus, B. C. Malcolm is the name of the sole proprietorship under which Billy C. Malcolm does business, and he, along with his wife, owns all of the stock of Malcolm Boring. The record further reflects in this regard that Respondents maintain a common pool of employees who are each day assigned by Billy C. Malcolm to either field or shop work; and that when a particular employee is sent to the field to perform construction work, he is placed on the payroll of Malcolm Boring, but if assigned to the yard to perform maintenance, repair, and fabrication work, he appears on the payroll of B. C. Malcolm. Such assignments are made as the need arises and are based upon the relative skill level of any particular employee. The record is thus indicative of Respondents' common ownership and management and central control of labor relations. Despite the finding of single-employer status, the Administrative Law Judge correctly concluded that the employees of Malcolm Boring and the employees of B. C. Malcolm each constitute a separate unit, and also correctly relied upon the ambiguity of the relevant contract language as well as upon the practice of 3 years' duration of not applying the collective-bargaining agreement with Malcolm Boring to employees working on the B. C. Malcolm payroll. In so finding, and apparently seeking to further buttress his conclusion that separate units are appropriate herein, the Administrative Law Judge inaccurately characterized the nature of Respondents' businesses and the manner in which they interact. Thus, in the context of his analysis with respect to unit scope, the Administrative Law Judge described the B. C. Malcolm business as being "substantially different" from the Malcolm Boring business, and appeared to indicate that this difference required each Company to recruit and hire individuals with certain skills of use only to one Company or the other. A perusal of the facts in support of the Administrative Law Judge's single-employer finding clearly shows his later characterizations of Respondents' businesses to be erroneous. Thus, B. C. Malcolm not only supplies the machinery with which Malcolm Boring performs construction work, but also keeps such equipment operational with an object of minimizing "down time" in the field. In addition, and equally important, is Respondents' utilization of a common pool of employees to meet their staffing requirements, as well as the fact that these employees are often used interchangeably as field or yard personnel, likewise indicative of the commonality of Respondents' purposes. Finally, it should be noted that Malcolm Boring leases almost all of its equipment from B. C. Malcolm, and that the greatest percentage of B. C. Malcolm's leasing, repair, and fabrication business is with Malcolm Boring. To the extent that the Administrative Law Judge's analysis with respect to unit scope detracts from his single-employer finding, we do not rely thereon. However, as indicated above, this error does not affect the result herein. For, we agree with the Administrative Law Judge's ultimate conclusion that, in light of the evidence as to the intent of the parties, the employees of B. C. Malcolm are in a separate bargaining unit from the employees of Malcolm Boring.

Finally, since the record reflects that Billy C. Malcolm and his wife own all the stock of Malcolm Boring, we need not reach the issue of whether a "substantial" stock interest by them would likewise exclude any of their children from the appropriate unit herein. See, generally, Cerni Motor Sales, Inc., 201 NLRB 918 (1973).

In dismissing the complaint herein, Member Fanning finds it unnecessary to rely on A-1 Fire Protection, Inc., and Corcoran Automatic Sprinklers, Inc., 250 NLRB 217 (1980).

[3] In the absence of exceptions, we adopt, pro forma, the dismissal of certain allegations that Respondents violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act.

259 NLRB No. 81

lations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD D. TAPLITZ, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard at Los Angeles, California, on September 9, 10, 15, 16, 17, 18, 23, and 24 and November 12 and 14, 1980. On February 6, 1981, I granted the motion of the National Maritime Union and reopened the hearing. By order dated February 24, I approved a stipulation relating to the receipt in evidence of NMU's Exhibit 1 and closed the hearing.

The charges in Cases 31-CA-9751 and 31-CB-3586 were filed on January 31, 1980, by Local 12, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL-CIO, herein called Local 12. An order consolidating those cases and a complaint issued on March 28, 1980. The complaint alleges that Malcolm Boring Co., Inc. (herein called Malcolm Boring), B. C. Malcolm and Bruce C. Malcolm,[1] all of whom are alleged to be single employers, violated Section 8(a)(1), (2), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. The complaint also alleges that Off-Shore Drilling and Allied Workers Division of the National Maritime Union of America, AFL-CIO (herein called NMU), violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. On September 4, 1980, the Regional Director for Region 31 of the Boand granted the motion to intervene of Operating Engineers Pension Trust, Operating Engineers Health and Welfare Fund, Operating Engineers Vacation-Holidays Savings Trust and Operating Engineers Training Trust (herein called the Operating Engineers Trusts).

ISSUES

The primary issues are:

1. Whether Malcolm Boring, B. C. Malcolm and Bruce Malcolm, Inc., constitute a single employer.
2. Whether the bargaining unit in a collective-bargaining contract between Local 12 and Malcolm Boring is broad enough to cover the employees of B. C. Malcolm and Bruce Malcolm, Inc.
3. Whether that contract was an enforceable pre-hire construction industry contract and whether the named employers violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to honor said contract with regard to employees of B. C. Malcolm and Bruce Malcolm, Inc.
4. Whether those employers violated Section 8(a)(1), (2), (3), and (5) and NMU violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act when Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and NMU entered into a collective-bargaining agreement.
5. Whether those employers interrogated and threatened employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs that have been carefully considered were filed on behalf of the General Counsel, Malcolm Boring, B. C. Malcolm, Bruce Malcolm, Inc., NMU, Local 12, and Operating Engineers Trusts.

Upon the entire record of the case, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYERS

Malcolm Boring, a California corporation, with an office and principal place of business in Chino, California, is engaged as a contractor and subcontractor in horizontal boring in the construction industry.[2] The parties stipulated and I find that Malcolm Boring annually purchases and receives goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside California. Malcolm Boring is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

B. C. Malcolm is a sole proprietorship with an office and place of business in Chino, California, where it manufactures, maintains, and repairs equipment that it rents and occasionally sells to various employers in the horizontal boring business including Malcolm Boring. The parties stipulated and I find that B. C. Malcolm does more than $50,000 a year business with Malcolm Boring, which Company is engaged in interstate commerce on other than an indirect basis. B. C. Malcolm is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Bruce Malcolm, Inc., was a sole proprietorship and now is a corporation with an office and place of business in Chino, California. It is engaged in the business of horizontal boring and pipe jacking.[3] Its business records estsblish that, during the year immediately preceding issuance of complaint, Bruce Malcolm, Inc., had sales in excess of $50,000 to Malcolm Boring. Bruce Malcolm, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

Local 12 and NMU are and each is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Introduction

Billy Carlisle Malcolm, referred to herein as Billy C. Malcolm, is a principal in two businesses. He is president and, together with his wife, is owner of Malcolm Boring. Malcolm Boring is engaged in the horizontal boring business as a subcontractor for piping contractors and as a contractor for utilities. The horizontal boring work is done at the site of the construction and constitutes construction industry work. Since 1962, Malcolm Boring has had a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 12. That contract began as a pre-hire agreement and contained an 8-day union-security clause that is lawful in the construction industry. As is discussed in detail below, there is a substantial question as to the scope of the bargaining unit covered by the contract.

[1] On April 25, 1980, Bruce C. Malcolm incorporated as Bruce C. Malcolm, Inc. To avoid confusion with names, all references to the business will be Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and all references to the individual will be to Bruce Malcolm.

[2] Horizontal boring consists of the drilling of a hole under a highway, railway, track, or similar installation so that casings, pipes, and the like can be installed without damaging the installation.

[3] Pipe jacking is a hand mining operation, while horizontal boring involves the use of boring machinery.

Billy C. Malcolm is engaged in business as a sole proprietorship under the name B. C. Malcolm. B. C. Malcolm manufactures, maintains, and repairs equipment that it leases and sometimes sells to various employers in the horizontal boring business. B. C. Malcolm is a manufacturer and supplier of machinery for the horizontal boring business. It is not in itself engaged primarily in the building and construction industry.

Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm maintain separate payrolls. Some employees are on both payrolls. When they work in the field on construction work, they are considered employees of Malcolm Boring and are paid and given fringe benefits in accordance with contract terms. When the same employees works on the fabrication, repair, or maintenance of machinery in B. C. Malcolm's shop, they are placed on the B. C. Malcolm payroll and are paid 80 percent of the contract rate without any fringe benefits.[4]

The General Counsel contends that Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm are part of a single employer, that the employees of both are part of a single bargaining unit encompassed by the contract between Malcolm Boring and Local 12, and that the Employers who constitute the single employer have violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by failing to honor the contract with regard to employees of B. C. Malcolm. The Employers, on the other hand, contend that they are not part of a single employer, that the contract between Local 12 and Malcolm Boring covers only Malcolm Boring employees and that there is no refusal to honor the contract. They also argue that there is no obligation for the contract to be honored in that it is a pre-hire construction industry contract and no appropriate showing of majority status has been made.

In addition to having two companies Billy Malcolm has three sons. Two of those sons have chosen to go into the horizontal boring business. One son, William C. Malcolm, does business under the name William Malcolm Construction, Inc. There is no contention that that company is part of the single employer. Another son, Bruce Malcolm, does business under the name Bruce Malcolm, Inc. The General Counsel contends that Bruce Malcolm, Inc., is part of the single employer with Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm. The General Counsel's position is that the employees of Bruce Malcolm, Inc., are covered by the collective- bargaining agreement between Malcolm Boring and Local 12. Bruce Malcolm, Inc., contends that it is not part of a single employer and that in any event it has no employees who could be covered by that bargaining unit.

Bruce Malcolm, Inc., entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with NMU. That agreement contained a union-security clause. The General Counsel contends that Bruce Malcolm, Inc., entered into that collective-bargaining agreement with NMU at a time when it had a duty to honor an outstanding agreement with Local 12 and that, by entering into the contract with NMU, Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and the remainder of the single employer violated Section 8(a)(1), (2), (3), and (5) of the Act, while NMU violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

B. The Relationship Between Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm

1. Factual findings

a. Interrelation of operations

There is a substantial degree of functional integration between the operations of B. C. Malcolm and Malcolm Boring. Malcolm Boring performs horizontal boring work on construction sites. The machinery used by Malcolm Boring is supplied by B. C. Malcolm, who manufactures, maintains, repairs, and leases out that equipment. Although B. C. Malcolm has other customers, most of its business is done with Malcolm Boring and almost all of Malcolm Boring's equipment comes from B. C. Malcolm.

There is a substantial amount of employee interchange between the two Companies.[5] Almost all of the boring machine operators and skilled helpers who worked in the field for Malcolm Boring have been assigned on various occasions to work in the shop for B. C. Malcolm. When the employee works in the field, he is carried on the books of Malcolm Boring and receives pay and fringes based on Malcolm Boring's contract with Local 12. When the same employee is assigned to the yard for maintenance, repair, or other work, he is placed on B. C. Malcolm's books and paid 80 percent of the contract rate without any fringe benefits.

B. C. Malcolm and Malcolm Boring share the same office, which is located at 5849 Shaefer Avenue, Chino, California. They also share the same yard, which is located near the office on property belonging to B. C. Malcolm. The office is adjacent to Billy C. Malcolm's home. Malcolm Boring leases office and yard space from B. C. Malcolm.

B. C. Malcolm and Malcolm Boring keep separate books and separate bank accounts. They both use the same bank. They share the services of an office secretary, Hazel Zurich. B. C. Malcolm pays Zurich's salary 1 week a month and Malcolm Boring pays the other 3 weeks. B. C. Malcolm and Malcolm Boring have telephone numbers that differ by one.

[4] The only exception to this appears to be the payment of certain fringe benefits after a contested claim on behalf of W. C. Malcolm in 1975. William C. Malcolm is a son of the owners of Malcolm Boring and as such could not be part of the bargaining unit. See fn. 17 below.

[5] This procedure was followed until January 1980. In December 1979, Local 12 Business Representative Bob Dye told Billy Malcolm that the Union would strike and close Malcolm Boring down if Local 12 personnel were not used for maintenance work. From that time on, B. C. Malcolm has not manufactured any boring equipment. B. C. Malcolm has shipped out heavy repair work to other concerns and has had minor repair work done by employees of Malcolm Boring. B. C. Malcolm has closed down its payroll.

b. Common ownership and management

B. C. Malcolm is the name of the sole proprietorship under which Billy C. Malcolm does business. Billy C. Malcolm averred that, under the California community property law, his wife owns half of the business. Billy C. Malcolm and his wife own all of the stock of Malcolm Boring.

In addition to the common ownership of the two concerns, there is to a substantial degree a common management. As sole proprietor, Billy C. Malcolm has sole control over the affairs of B. C. Malcolm. He decides to whom B. C. Malcolm will rent equipment and makes all management decisions relating to B. C. Malcolm. As president of Malcolm Boring, Billy C. Malcolm also makes management decisions with regard to that Company. In addition to being president, he is on the board of directors. Although his wife and some of his children have at times been corporate officers and on the board of directors, Billy C. Malcolm is clearly in charge. In testifying about the history of his Companies, Billy C. Malcolm averred that in 1962 his accountant advised him to split his business into two parts so that the equipment would be owned personally and he could lease it to the corporation. He averred that he kept his business in two parts because of tax and liability advantages.

c. Centralized control of labor relations

Billy C. Malcolm makes all labor relations decisions for B. C. Malcolm. He is the one who does hiring and firing for that Company. When employees report for work each day, Billy C. Malcolm is the one who decides whether to assign them to fieldwork as employees of Malcolm Boring or to shopwork as employees of B. C. Malcolm. If he assigns an employee to shopwork, he supervises the work of that employee. If he assigns the employee to fieldwork, he retains ultimate authority over that employee, but the employee is immediately supervised by a foreman or superintendent on the job. In 1979, Carl Jarnagan was general superintendent and vice president of Malcolm Boring and it was he who supervised crews in the field. At that time Jarnagan also hired employees for Malcolm Boring. In late 1979, Jarnagan resigned as vice president and superintendent and he went back to foreman status. In regard to wages and hours there is complete centralization of control over labor relations. Billy C. Malcolm acknowledged in his testimony that except as limited by contract he is the one who sets wages and hours for both B. C. Malcolm and Malcolm Boring.

2. Analysis and conclusions

In Blumenfeld Theatres Circuit, et al., 240 NLRB 206, 214 (1979), enfd. 626 F.2d 865 (9th Cir. 1980), the Board affirmed the decision of an administrative law judge in which the tests for "single employer" were set forth as follows:

> In Radio & Television Broadcast Technicians Local Union 1264, IBEW v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255, 256 (1965), the Supreme Court held that in determining whether enterprises constitute a single employer: "The controlling criteria, set out and elaborated in Board decisions, are interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations and common ownership."[16] Though the Board and the courts have not always agreed on how to apply the standards enunciated by the Supreme Court, the decision of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in Local No. 627, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL-CIO [South Prairie Construction Company and Peter Kiewit Sons' Co.] v. N.L.R.B., 518 F.2d 1040 (1967), appears to be controlling. In that case the court of appeals reversed the Decision of the Board in Peter Kiewit Sons' Co. and South Prairie Construction Co., 206 NLRB 562 (1973). Part of the circuit court's decision was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in South Prairie Construction Co. v. Local No. 627, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL-CIO, 425 U.S. 800 (1976). The Board had made two separate findings. The first was that two entities did not constitute a single employer and the second was that each entity had a separate appropriate bargaining unit for collective-bargaining purposes. The court of appeals disagreed and found both a single employer and a single unit. On appeal the Supreme Court affirmed that part of the court of appeals' decision which found that the two entities were a single employer and reversed and remanded to the court of appeals that part of the decision which related to the unit question.[17] As the Supreme Court has affirmed the circuit Court's decision with regard to the single employer, the language of the circuit court is of particular importance. That circuit court held [518 F.2d at 1045-46]:
> Guidelines for "Single Employer" Status
> In Radio Union v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255 . . . (1965), the Supreme Court, in a per curiam opinion affirming a "single employer" holding below, said:
>
>> The controlling criteria, set out and elaborated in Board decisions, are interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations and common ownership.
>
> The court cited several NLRB decisions including one affirmed in Sakrete of Northern California, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 332 F.2d 902 (9th Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 961 . . . (1965). In Sakrete, the Ninth Circuit stated, at 907:
>
>> even if the substantial evidence shows interrelationship of operations, centralized control of [16] See also Sakrete of Northern California, Inc., 140 NLRB 765 (1963), enfd. 332 F.2d 902 (9th Cir. 1964) cert. denied 379 U.S. 961 (1965).

[17] On remand the Board issued a Supplemental Decision reported at 231 NLRB 76 (1977) in which it noted that the Supreme Court had affirmed the circuit court's finding that the two entities were a single employer. The Board reconsidered the single-unit question and concluded that, even though the entities were a single employer, separate units were appropriate.

labor relations, or common management only at the executive or top level, we do not agree that this precludes application of the "single employer" concept.

It pointed out that these three criteria "deal not with power and authority, as such, but with its exercise," and that such criteria, "on any level, are considerations in addition to the factor of common ownership or financial control."[8]

Although the Supreme Court in Radio Union, supra, commented that the record in that case was more than adequate to show that all of the four "controlling criteria" were present, it does not appear that all four criteria must be present. In one of the NLRB cases cited, Canton, Carp's, Inc., 125 NLRB 483 (1959), the Board observed that it had on several occasions made a finding of a single employer status in the absence of a common labor relations policy, and even when it had been affirmatively shown that each of two corporations held to be a single employer established its own labor relations policy. In another of the NLRB cases cited, V.I.P. Radio, Inc., 128 NLRB 113 (1960), the Board found that there was little or no employee interchange; but 90 percent stock ownership of the second corporation, the same officers and directors, and centralized control of "general labor policy" and operations resulted in a "single employer" holding. In still another cited NLRB case, Overton Markets, Inc., 142 NLRB 615 (1963), the Board noted, at 619, that the circumstances were not "characteristic of the arm's length relationship found among unintegrated companies."[9] Its conclusion that there was a "single employer" for purposes of the Act rested on consideration of "all the circumstances" of the case.

From the foregoing, we conclude that "single employer" status, for purposes of the National Labor Relations Act, depends upon all the circumstances of the case, that not all of the "controlling criteria" specified by the Supreme Court need be present; that, in addition to the criterion of commom ownership or financial control, the other criteria, whether or not they are present at the top level of management, are "controlling" indicia of the actual exercise of the power of common ownership or financial control and that the standard for evaluating such exercise of power is whether, as a matter of substance, there is the "arm's length relationship found among unintegrated companies."

As set forth above, Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm have interrelated operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations, and commom ownership. They meet all of the criteria set forth by the Supreme Court for finding a single employer. Where surrounding circumstances warrant it, the finding of single employer can be made even when all of the "controlling criteria" are not present. In the instant case all of the controlling criteria are present and there are no surrounding circumstances that would interfere with the finding that Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm do constitute a single employer. I find that they are a single employer. It does not follow, however, that the employees of Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm are all part of a single bargaining unit or that they are all covered by Malcolm Boring's collective- bargaining agreement with Local 12. The unit issue is discussed in section D below.

C. The Relationship Between Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and the Single Employer

1. Factual findings

a. Interrelations of operations

Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and Malcolm Boring are both engaged in the horizontal boring business.[6] The primary interrelation between Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and Malcolm Boring relates to subcontracting. Malcolm Boring is a long established enterprise and Bruce Malcolm, Inc., went into business during the last week of September 1979. During the initial phases of Bruce Malcolm, Inc.'s operation, all of its work was subcontracted from Malcolm Boring. At that time Malcolm Boring had a substantial amount of overflow work that it could not perform, as did many other established employers in the horizontal boring business. Some of that overflow work Malcolm Boring subcontracted to Bruce Malcolm, Inc. Gradually Bruce Malcolm, Inc., began accepting subcontracts from different contractors. From September 1979 through August 1980 Malcolm Boring subcontracted approximately 5 percent of its total work to Bruce Malcolm, Inc. During the same time, those subcontracts amounted to approximately 30 percent of all the work that Bruce Malcolm, Inc., performed.

Some of Bruce Malcolm, Inc.'s employees worked for Malcolm Boring before they went to work for Bruce Malcolm, Inc. However, with two very limited exceptions none of them worked for Malcolm Boring at the same time that they did work for Bruce Malcolm, Inc. One exception applied to Larry Cochell, who was employed by Malcolm Boring. Cochell was a friend of Bruce Malcolm's and on a few occasions he helped Bruce Malcolm with repair work on off-hours and on a Saturday. The other exception applied to a part-time secretary who worked for Bruce Malcolm, Inc., 1 or 2 days a week after January 1980. She was also a part time clerical employee for Malcolm Boring. Those were isolated situations and did not amoumt to a meaningful interchange of employees.[7]

[8] In a later decision, N.L.R.B. v. Welcome-American Fertilizer Co., 443 F.2d 19, 21 (9th Cir. 1971), the Ninth Circuit, citing Sakrete, said that no one of the four criteria is controlling.

[9] The "arm's length" test makes meaningful the Board's reference in Canton, Carp's, Inc., supra at 484, to "realities of commercial organization." It was applied by this court in American Fed. of Television & Radio Artists v. N.L.R.B., 149 U.S. App. D.C. 272, 462 F.2d 887 (1972).

[6] Bruce Malcolm also does some pipe jacking work. Malcolm Boring does not engage in that type of business.

Bruce Malcolm, Inc., owns most of the equipment that it uses. Before Bruce Malcolm, Inc., went into business, Bruce Malcolm leased to Malcolm some equipment that it owned. Boring. However, that lease was canceled before the new business was started. There was some loaning and interchange of equipment among various employers in the horizontal boring business, but there is no showing that there was more of that between Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and Malcolm Boring than there was between other employers in that industry.[8] Bruce Malcolm, Inc., did come to the Malcolm Boring yard on various occasions to pick up casings. On those occasions Malcolm Boring was supplying the casing for his subcontractor, Bruce Malcolm, Inc. Other subcontractors who accepted subcontracts from Malcolm Boring used a similar procedure. On one occasion, Bruce Malcolm, Inc., performed some work on his own equipment while he was in Malcolm Boring's yard. That was an isolated incident and occurred because Malcolm Boring had the extra room needed for that type of work.

Bruce Malcolm, Inc., maintains its own office, is located about 3 miles away from the offices of Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm, and maintains its own yard, located 7 or 8 miles from the Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm yard. Bruce Malcolm, Inc., maintains its own books and has a telephone number that is different from that of Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm. Malcolm Boring, Inc., does not have its own contractor's license, but it is in the process of applying for one. It has never used the contractor's license of Malcolm Boring or B. C. Malcolm.

I find that there is no interrelation of operations between Malcolm Boring and Bruce Malcolm, Inc., except to the extent that Malcolm Boring subcontracts some of its work to Bruce Malcolm, Inc. However, the evidence does not establish that the contractor-subcontractor relationship is other than an arm's-length transaction.

b. Common management

At one time Bruce Malcolm worked for Malcolm Boring as a boring machine operator. He was also director and vice president of Malcolm Boring. However, before going into business for himself, he quit his job at Malcolm Boring and resigned as a director and vice president.[9]

Billy C. Malcolm manages the operations of Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm. Bruce Malcolm manages the operations of Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and has no control over the affairs of Malcolm Boring or B. C. Malcolm. Billy C. Malcolm has no control over the affairs of Bruce Malcolm, Inc., except to the extent that is implicit in the relationship between a contractor and a subcontractor.

In sum, I find that there is no common management between Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and Malcolm Boring or B. C. Malcolm.

c. Centralized control of labor relations

As set forth above, except as he is limited by his collective bargaining agreement with Local 12, Billy C. Malcolm has sole control over wages, hours, and labor relation matters for Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm. Bruce Malcolm neither has nor exercises any authority in that regard.

Bruce Malcolm is the only supervisor of Bruce Malcolm, Inc. He has sole power to hire and fire employees and, in general, is in sole charge of the business including labor relations. Billy C. Malcolm has no authority over labor relations policies for Bruce Malcolm, Inc.[10]

Bruce Malcolm, Inc., has a collective-bargaining agreement with NMU. The General Counsel contends that Billy C. Malcolm was responsible for the execution of that contract and to that extent controlled the labor policies of Bruce Malcolm, Inc. The evidence does not support the General Counsel's contention. Sometime in the summer of 1979, Billy C. Malcolm received a phone call from an ex-employee named Bob Seabury, who was organizing for NMU. Seabury asked whether Billy C. Malcolm could give him the names of some nonunion contractors. Seabury also said that he was not interested in organizing anyone who currently had a contract. Billy C. Malcolm gave Seabury the names of a number of contractors including Bruce Malcolm. At that time Bruce Malcolm had already resigned from Malcolm Boring and was building some equipment that he could use when he began his business. The equipment was being built in a location other than that of Malcolm Boring or B. C. Malcolm. Sometime thereafter Billy C. Malcolm had a meeting at his house in which Seabury spoke to a number of the contractors including Bruce Malcolm, Inc. Bruce Malcolm asked for suggestions from a number of people including his brother, his father, and Ralph Ayalla of A-1 Boring Company. Ayalla was a business acquaintance and competitor of Billy C. Malcolm and Billy C. Malcolm had asked him to give Bruce Malcolm suggestions. On September 21, 1979, Bruce Malcolm met with Seabury and negotiated and executed a collective-bargaining agreement. The contract was effective by its terms from September 21, 1979, to September 20, 1980.

[7] Cochell testified that he was paid in cash and that Billy C. Malcolm told Bruce not to pay him by means other than cash. Bruce Malcolm averred that it was Cochell who asked to be paid in cash and both he and Billy C. Malcolm denied that Billy C. Malcolm said anything about the means of payment for Cochell. Both Billy C. Malcolm and Bruce Malcolm impressed me as being candid witnesses with good memories. Cochell's demeanor was less impressive and a number of internal inconsistencies within his testimony and with regard to previous statements indicated that his memory was less than completely reliable. Where his testimony conflicts with that of Billy C. Malcolm and Bruce Malcolm, I credit the Malcolms.

On one occasion a crew from Malcolm Boring took over work that had been performed by a crew from Bruce Malcolm, Inc. In that situation, the prime contractor, Irish Construction Company, was put under pressure from Local 12 to remove Bruce Malcolm, Inc.'s nonunion employees from the job. Irish Construction called Malcolm Boring with the result that Malcolm Boring removed its subcontractor, Bruce Malcolm, Inc., from the job and completed the work with its own employees. That constituted a removal of a subcontractor rather than an interchange of employees.

[8] Cochell testified that, in October 1979, he used a crane belonging to Bruce Malcolm, Inc., while he was working for Malcolm Boring and that, on various occasions, he saw Malcolm Boring's markings on trucks used by Bruce Malcolm, Inc. However, I do not believe Cochell was reliable with regard to dates. Bruce Malcolm creditably testified that his lease of equipment to Malcolm Boring ended before he went into business and that after he went into business his equipment had its own markings.

[9] Bruce Malcolm terminated his employment with Malcom Boring on or about August 1, 1979. At that same time he resigned as officer and director, although that resignation was not reduced to a written document until December 1, 1979. Bruce Malcolm is still listed as an individual who is authorized to draw checks on a small cash account for Malcolm Boring. However, Bruce Malcolm credibly testified that he was left on that account as a matter of inadvertence, that he had forgotten about it, and that he did not draw checks on it. Bruce Malcolm acknowledges in his testimony that, in an affidavit he gave to the Board, he stated that his father bid jobs for him. He credibly testified that his affidavit was poorly worded, that his father did not actively bid jobs for him, and that when his father had overflow work that had been bid on, his father requested him to take the job.

[10] As found above, the testimony of Cochell to the effect that Billy C. Malcolm directed Bruce Malcolm to pay cash for Cochell's services has not been credited.

David Frederick, an employee of Malcolm Boring, testified that, in late August or early September 1979, Billy C. Malcolm told him that he (Malcolm) had negotiated a contract for Bruce Malcolm with NMU, that Bruce Malcolm was going to try that union, and that B. C. Malcolm was considering signing with NMU or having his sons or other partners trying out the NMU if it worked with Bruce. Billy C. Malcolm denied that the conversation even took place. He denied that he told Frederick that he (Malcolm) had negotiated a contract for Bruce Malcolm and he denied that he in fact negotiated such a contract. As set forth above, I believe that Billy C. Malcolm was a candid and credible witness. Frederick on the other hand, was not always candid. In a deposition he stated that in early summer of 1979, Bruce Malcolm told him that he (Bruce) intended to go into business for himself. In his testimony at the hearing, Frederick denied any recollection of the conversation. He also testified that it first came to his attention in October 1979 that he was not getting paid union scale for his work in the yard. By that time he had been working both in the field and the yard for a substantial period of time and it is difficult to believe that he was so unaware of his pay. As between Frederick and Billy C. Malcolm, I credit Billy C. Malcolm.

In sum, I find that there was no centralized control of labor relations between Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and Malcolm Boring or B. C. Malcolm.

d. Common ownership

As set forth above, Billy C. Malcolm and his wife own Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm. Bruce Malcolm has no financial interest in those concerns. Bruce Malcolm and his wife are the sole owners of Bruce Malcolm, Inc. Billy C. Malcolm and his wife have no financial interest in Bruce Malcolm, Inc. In sum, there is no common ownership, nor are there common officers, directors, or property.

2. Analysis and conclusions

The principles of law set forth above in section B,2, must be applied to the instant situation. The evidence establishes that there is interrelation of operations, common management, common centralized labor relations, and common ownership between Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm. The conclusion follows that they are a single employer. The evidence is just as clear, however, that there is no interrelation of operations, no common management, no centralization of labor relations, and no common ownership between Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and either Malcolm Boring or B. C. Malcolm. There is a family relationship and there is an arm's length contractor-subcontractor relationship, but neither of those relationships can form the basis for a finding of single employer. I find that Bruce Malcolm, Inc., is a separate employer and is not a single employer with Malcolm Boring or B. C. Malcolm.

In order to find that Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and NMU violated the Act as alleged in the complaint, it is necessary as a condition precedent to find that the Bruce Malcolm, Inc., is a single employer with Malcolm Boring. The refusal- to-bargain allegation is predicated on the proposition that Bruce Malcolm, Inc., had a bargaining obligation and a collective-bargaining contract with Local 12 because it was a single employer with Malcolm Boring who did have such an obligation and contract. There is no allegation or proof that Bruce Malcolm, Inc., as a separate employer had an obligation to bargain or honor a contract with Local 12. As the single-employer theory has not been established, the 8(a)(5) refusal-to-bargain allegation against Bruce Malcolm, Inc., must be dismissed. The allegations that Bruce Malcolm, Inc., violated Section 8(a)(1), (2), and (3) and that NMU violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act are predicated on the theory that Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and NMU entered into a collective bargaining agreement containing a union-security clause at a time when Bruce Malcolm, Inc., had an obligation to bargain and honor a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 12. As Bruce Malcolm, Inc., did not have any such obligation toward Local 12, there is no showing that its contract with NMU was unlawful.[11] It follows that the 8(a)(1), (2), and (3) violations alleged against Bruce Malcolm, Inc., and the 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) violation alleged against NMU must be dismissed.

D. The Scope of the Bargaining Unit

1. The collective-bargaining contract and the practices thereunder

Malcolm Boring was incorporated on July 31, 1961. At that time and through the mid-1970's, Malcolm Boring's work was limited to drilling bore holes and it employed only two classes of employees. One was the operator who ran the machinery and the other was a helper who assisted the operator. Also in the early days of its operation, Malcolm Boring owned only a small amount of equipment and mostly small tools. Sometime in 1962, on the advice of his accountant, Billy C. Malcolm split the business into two parts. He owned the equipment personally and leased it to the corporation.

On March 1, 1962, Malcolm Boring entered into a short-form agreement with Local 12 under which they agreed to be bound by the terms of the applicable multiemployer agreement and to any renewals and extensions thereof unless written notice was given 60 days prior to the termination of the applicable agreement. At the bottom of the short-term agreement were a number of boxes indicating what type of agreement was intended. The box next to "construction" was checked. The box next to "shop" was left blank. The master labor agreement to which the parties bound themselves was the Southern California General Contractors and Local 12 agreement which ran from June 15, 1962, to June 1, 1965. A covering letter from the Union, as well as the language of the contract, made it clear that the contract covered the Los Angeles, but not the San Diego, area. The master labor agreement was between a number of different contractor associations and Local 12. By its terms, it covered all work within the geographical area of the contract falling within the recognized jurisdiction of Local 12. The coverage clause of the contract stated that it would cover not only a great number of specified types of work, but also "work in the contractors' yards, and shops which is performed on equipment operated by employees covered by this Agreement." Although Billy C. Malcolm owned the equipment and B. C. Malcolm was in existence, B. C. Malcolm did not have any payroll. No payroll was set up for B. C. Malcolm until 1976.

[11] It is noted that Bruce Malcolm, Inc., is an employer engaged primarily in the building and construction industry and that, therefore, the prehire agreement is not in itself unlawful.

When Malcolm Boring signed the short-form agreement in 1962, none of its employees was a member of Local 12. Within a week after the signing two employees joined the Union.[12]

Over the years Malcolm Boring had considerable difficulty in obtaining skilled workmen through the Union's hiring hall. As a result Malcolm Boring hired unskilled employees and trained them. Under the practice that developed the unskilled employees were not entitled to join the Union and were not covered by the union contract. The general practice was for Malcolm Boring to train the inexperienced men for about 2 years. When an employee reached certain degree of proficiency, Billy C. Malcolm went to Local 12 and sought to have the Union accept the employee into membership.[13] When an employee became sufficiently skilled, he was brought into the Union and became eligible for the wages and benefits set forth in the contract. Billy C. Malcolm credibly testified that his experience was that, from 1962 until 1977 or 78, the Union only took skilled operators into membership and that he had to practically fight on a number of occasions in order to get the Union to take someone into membership. At the point that an employee joined the Union, he was considered a skilled helper and as such was entitled to coverage by the contract.[14]

The next master labor agreement was from July 1, 1965, to July 1, 1969. Malcolm Boring was bound by that agreement under the terms of the short-form agreement that it signed in 1962. The work covered by that contract was substantially the same as that covered in the previous contract. It specifically mentioned work in the contractors' yards and shops, which was performed on equipment operated by employees covered by the agreement. During the term of that contract, B. C. Malcolm still did not have a yard and employees on the payroll. Malcolm Boring continued to "put people in the Union" when they reached a certain degree of proficiency at which time they were paid contract rates and benefits.

The situation remained substantially unchanged until the master labor agreement of July 1, 1974, to July 1, 1977.[15]

Malcolm Boring was bound by that master labor agreement through its execution of the 1962 short-form agreement. At that time, Malcolm Boring had not yet given any notice of cancellation. The new master agreement had some changes with regard to the unit, but it continued to include work in the contractors' yards and shops.

During the terms of the new contract, Malcolm Boring's business was expanded. Before that time, Malcolm Boring restricted its work to the drilling of the bore holes. During this period the work expanded to include the digging of pits from which the bores were made, the putting of pipes in the holes, and various filling operations. Malcolm Boring began to use more unskilled labor than it previously had. While there had only been two classes of employees (operators and operators' helpers) there was added a third classification of unskilled laborers. As a result, sometime in 1977 Local 12 insisted that Malcolm Boring sign a contract with the Laborers Union. Malcolm Boring signed such a contract. Some problems were presented because many classifications overlapped in both the laborers and Local 12 contracts. Prior to the Laborers contract Malcolm Boring hired unskilled men who remained nonunion until they were qualified, at which time they would be taken into Local 12 and treated as operators under the union scale. After Malcolm Boring signed the Laborers contract, it recruited employees from the Laborers Union.[16] When those employees became sufficiently trained, they were made operators and switched to Local 12. Basically there were three classes of employees. The first was the unskilled worker, who was primarily hired for muscle power. The second was the semiskilled helper, who assisted the operator, and the third was the skilled operator. The Laborers union claimed jurisdiction over the unskilled worker, Local 12 claimed jurisdiction over the operators, and both Unions had arguable claims for jurisdiction over the helpers.

Before January 1976 the repair and maintenance work on equipment used by Malcolm Boring was performed on a more or less hit-and-miss basis. Some of it was farmed out to other employers and some of it was done by members of the Malcolm family.[17] In some cases, employees were hired and put on the payroll. Most of the work was done by Ralph Ayalla, who had his own welding shop and billed Malcolm Boring for the work. The situation changed in 1976 when B. C. Malcolm set up its own payroll. At that time, Billy C. Malcolm intended to try to sell some of his boring equipment and to take his sons in as partners. His plans did not work for a number of reasons including the fact that his sons wanted to go into business on their own. From then on, B. C. Malcolm had employees of its own, who worked at the B. C. Malcolm shop. The work those employees performed was substantially different from the work performed by the employees of Malcolm Boring. Malcolm Boring employees worked on construction work in the field. The skills required ranged from those of ditchdiggers to those of skilled boring machine operators. The work performed by employees of B. C. Malcolm was done in the shop and ranged from the tidying up of the place and the washing of equipment to skilled mechanic's work. The B. C. Malcolm business was also substantially different from the Malcolm Boring business. Malcolm Boring performed construction work. B. C. Malcolm fabricated, maintained, repaired, and leased out construction equipment. The equipment was leased to a number of contractors in addition to Malcolm Boring.

[12] The record is unclear as to how many employees Malcolm Boring had at that time. At one point in this testimony, Billy C. Malcolm averred that those were the only two employees he had. Shortly thereafter, he averred that he usually had four or five employees during the early part of his operations. Still later he averred that he did not remember exactly how many employees he had at the time he signed the Local 12 contract but, normally at that period, he had two boring machines and each machine took two employees to run it. He averred that to the best of his recollection he had four men working at that time, but he did not remember how skilled or unskilled two of them were.

[13] David Frederick credibly testified that at a certain point in his employment Billy C. Malcolm asked him whether he would like to join the Union and, when he said that he would, Billy C. Malcolm took care of it and he became a member.

[14] On one occasion Local 12 demanded that there be a certain number of operating engineers on a job and insisted that two men who were performing laborers' work at that time join Local 12. Two of the men did join Local 12.

[15] That was the next contract that was put into evidence.

[16] In addition to hiring employees from the Laborers Union, Malcolm Boring also hired some nonunion employees at particular jobsites.

It is contended that, because Malcolm Boring had signed the short-form agreement in 1962 and had not notified the Union to the contrary, it became bound by the master labor agreement of July 1, 1977, to June 15, 1980.[18] However, the new master labor agreement for Southern California substantially changed the bargaining unit from that which had appeared in prior contracts. While the prior contracts had been between employers and Local 12, the new master labor agreement was between employers and a number of different unions, only one of which was Local 12. Various Carpenter unions, Laborer unions, and Teamster unions were also lumped together in the contract. Article II,A, provided that the employers recognized the unions as "the sole and exclusive collective bargaining representatives of all employees and persons employed to perform work covered by this agreement." Article I,B,5, stated, "This agreement shall cover and apply to all work falling within the recognized jurisdiction of the Unions signatory to this agreement." There followed three subparagraphs describing the work covered. Subparagraph (a) provided:

> It shall cover work on building, heavy highway, and engineering construction, including the construction of, in whole or in part, or in improvement or modification thereof, including any structure or operations which are incidental thereto, the assembly, operation, maintenance and repair of all equipment, vehicles and other facilities . . . including without limitation the following types of classes of work:

Subparagraphs (b) and (c) set forth a large listing of different types of construction industry work.[19] Subparagraph 6 covered:

> All work performed in the contractors' warehouses, shops or yards which has been particularly provided or set up to handle work in connection with a job or project covered by the terms of this agreement.

The language of that section appears to indicate that the preceding section, insofar as it covered fabrication, maintenance, and repair, was limited to such work on the jobsite. Subparagraph 6 went beyond that and covered some shopwork. However, it would not cover the shopwork in question in this case. Here the B. C. Malcolm shop was not set up to handle work in connection with a particular job or project. However, the new contract did have an appendix that was entitled "Operating Engineers Craft, Special Working Rules and Wage Scales." That appendix contained a clause which stated that, in addition to the basic agreement coverage, the agreement would include work in the contractors' yards and shops. B. C. Malcolm and Malcolm Boring claimed that that clause did not apply to them because the original 1962 short-form agreement between Malcolm Boring and Local 12, which was the underpinning of the subsequent agreements was solely a construction contract and not a shop contract as indicated by the check in the box next to construction and blank left after the box for shop. Local 12 contends that the effect of checking the box next to the shop agreement was to allow the company to vary certain starting times and overtime rates in the shop as provided by section W of the appendix to the contract. However, it is difficult to see how the 1962 short-form agreement could have anticipated the language in the 1977 contract. It is more reasonable to assume that the short form agreement meant just what it said, that construction was covered and shop was not. At the very least, the language is ambiguous and it is necessary to examine the practices of the parties to understand what they meant by it.

[17] Some of the work was done by the sons of the owners of Malcolm Boring who, because of their relationship to the owner of the business, could not be considered employees in an appropriate bargaining unit. Children of persons holding a substantial stock interest in a closely held corporation must be excluded from bargaining units of that corporate employer. Foam Rubber City #2 of Florida, Inc. doing business as SCANDIA, 167 NLRB 623 (1967).

[18] The Southern California master agreement does not include San Diego County. On September 27, 1978, Malcolm Boring signed a short-form agreement with Local 12 covering the San Diego area. The box for "Master Construction Agreement" was checked; the box for "Master Shop Agreement" was not. It was actually signed in San Diego County, while Malcolm Boring was doing some work there. The short-form agreement specifically states on the bottom,"San Diego Horizontal Earth Boring." The full agreement to which the short-form agreement refers specifically limits the coverage of the contract to San Diego County. Therefore, it can have no application to B. C. Malcolm, who does no work in that county. However, the only contract alleged in the complaint is the one that was entered into September 27, 1978, which would be the San Diego contract. In fact, the General Counsel's contentions are keyed to the 1962 short-form agreement which covers the area where B. C. Malcolm works rather than the September 27, 1978, short-form agreement which only covers the San Diego area.

[19] The contract provided that, when the employer was making work assignments, he would assign work in accordance with existing intercraft agreements between the Unions and that, where there was no such agreement, then past practice or prevailing practice in the locality would apply.

As set forth above, the practice that developed over the years was for Malcolm Boring to apply the contract only to those employees who reached a certain level of skill as operators. Such employees joined Local 12 and became eligible for contract benefits at the same time. Until the incidents in question in this case, Local 12 does not appear to have demanded contract coverage for lesser skilled employees. Nor is there any indication that the Union insisted on enforcement of the union-security clause for those employees. Until the incidents in question in this case, there is no indication that either Local 12 or Malcolm Boring made any effort to apply the contract to B. C. Malcolm shop employees. The first situation in which the question arose was about June 21 or 23, 1979. At that time, Bruce Malcolm was still an official of Malcolm Boring. He was working on a Malcolm Boring job in Anaheim, California, when Local 12 Business Agent Novak spoke to him. Novak said that he had a grievance from an employee named Newton about a difference in wages that was paid in the yard and in the field. Bruce Malcolm told Novak that 80 percent of the field wages were paid while an employee was in the yard and there were no fringes paid, but that the employee kept working steadily when it rained and when work was slow. Novak replied by saying that it was not a bad deal.

In mid-October 1979, David Frederick made a complaint about his pay to Local 12 Business Representative Robert Dye. Frederick was one of the employees who did fieldwork on the Malcolm Boring payroll at full contract rates and also did shopwork on the B. C. Malcolm payroll at 80 percent of contract rate without fringe benefits. Frederick explained the situation to Dye. In December 1979, Dye went to the Malcolm Boring office and discussed the matter with Billy C. Malcolm. Billy C. Malcolm explained the structure of B. C. Malcolm and Malcolm Boring and in effect confirmed what Frederick had told Dye previously. Dye took the position that the contract covered shopwork and Billy C. Malcolm took the position that it did not.[20] That dispute led to this litigation.

By letter dated January 28, 1980, Malcolm Boring notified the Union that it desired to bargain separately for a new agreement at the expiration of the contract in 1980. The letter also asked for a copy of the current contract for Southern California and for the Union's position with regard to what was timely notice of termination. By letter dated January 30, 1980, Malcolm Boring notified the engineering contractors association that the association did not have authority to represent the company in collective bargaining. By letter dated February 22, 1980, Malcolm Boring notified Local 12 of the termination of both the San Diego and the Southern California agreements to be effective on the applicable termination dates of those contracts. In that letter Malcolm Boring offered to negotiate and asked that a meeting be scheduled. By letter dated March 24, 1980, Local 12 acknowledged receipt of Malcolm Boring's letter canceling the contract. Local 12 referred to Malcolm Boring's letter as "Letter of cancellation of your Short Form Agreement for Construction." Local 12 notified Malcolm Boring that its agreement was tied to the terms of the master agreement which did not terminate until July 1, 1980, for Southern California and June 15, 1980, for San Diego. Local 12's letter also stated that Local 12 would hold Malcolm Boring's letter until the conclusion of the term of the master agreements and, at that time, Local 12 would contact Malcolm Boring for the purpose of collective bargaining.

On December 31, 1980, the attorneys for Local 12 wrote to the attorneys for Malcolm Boring a letter[21] which stated in part:

> Because Local 12 no longer represents a majority of Malcolm's employees, it has decided to disclaim interest in bargaining for these employees. Therefore, Malcolm Boring shall be considered a nonsignatory employer and shall be treated accordingly.

2. Analysis and conclusions

Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm constitute a single employer. However, that does not answer the question whether the two parts of the single employer had single or separate bargaining units. As the Board held in Peter Kiewit Sons' Co. and South Prairie Construction Co., 231 NLRB 76, 77 (1977), enfd. 595 F.2d 844 (D.C. Cir. 1979):

> In determining whether a single employer exists we are concerned with the common ownership, structure, and integrated control of the separate corporations; in determining the scope of the unit, we are concerned with the community of interests of the employees involved.
> Section 9 of the Act gives the Board considerable discretion in determining appropriate units. Section 9(b) of the Act empowers the Board to "decide in each case whether, in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by this Act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or subdivision thereof . . . ." The mandate of that section "to assure to employees the fullest freedom" indicates that our primary concern is the degree of common interests of the employees involved. The ultimate unit determination is thus resolved by weighing all the factors relevant to the community of interests of the employees. Where, as here, we are concerned with more than one operation of a single employer, the [20] Dye testified that, during this conversation, Billy C. Malcolm told him that he was going to go out of business and was going to lease his equipment to his son Bruce. However, Gannon, another union representative who was at the meeting, made contemporaneous notes in which he quoted Billy C. Malcolm as saying that he would be going out of business and leasing his equipment to a son other than Bruce. I believe that Dye was confused with regard to the names of the sons. Dye testified that Billy C. Malcolm told him that Bruce Malcolm was an officer of Malcolm Boring. Billy C. Malcolm averred that he did not tell Dye that Bruce Malcolm was an officer but he might have told him that Thomas Malcolm was. At that time Bruce Malcolm had his own business. I believe that Dye was again confused with regard to the names.

[21] On the stipulation of the parties the letter was received as evidence as a late-file exhibit and was marked NMU Exh. 1. The stipulation went to the question of authenticity and all parties reserved their rights to argue or challenge in their briefs the relevancy or any other matters relating to that exhibit.

> following factors are particularly relevant; the bargaining history; the functional integration of operations; the differences in the types of work and the skills of employees; the extent of centralization of management and supervision, particularly in regard to labor relations, hiring, discipline, and control of day-to-day operations; and the extent of interchange and contact between the groups of employees.

The facts with regard to those criteria are set forth in detail in the discussion of the single-employer issue above and will not be repeated here. However, other considerations of particular importance must be mentioned. The skills needed by the employees of B. C. Malcolm are substantially different from those of the employees of Malcolm Boring. That is so because the work of the two Companies is of a very different nature. Malcolm Boring is wholly engaged in a construction business. The skills required of the employees are those of construction workers on the construction site. B. C. Malcolm fabricates, maintains, repairs, and leases equipment to construction firms. Its employees need skills appropriate to those tasks and the work is performed in the shop. Malcolm Boring is a construction industry employer and B. C. Malcolm is not. B. C. Malcolm is not simply a minor adjunct of Malcolm Boring. It is a substantial business in its own right[22] and leases equipment to a number of other construction firms in addition to Malcolm Boring. Malcolm Boring signed a short-form agreement with Local 12 in 1962 and it is alleged that, through that short-form agreement, it is bound by the Southern California Master Labor Agreement of July 1, 1977, to July 15, 1980. That master labor agreement is a construction industry agreement and it contains an 8-day union-security clause that is lawful when applied to "an employer engaged primarily in the building and construction industry."[23] It is unlawful when applied to an employer who is not engaged primarily in the building and construction industry.[24] The original contract between Malcolm Boring and Local 12 was a pre-hire agreement which incorporated a union-security clause. That also could be lawful only where the employer was primarily in the building and construction industry. The Southern California Master Agreement of 1977–80 contains clauses limiting the right of employers to subcontract onsite construction work to other employers. Those clauses could not have any meaning with regard to B. C. Malcolm who does no onsite work.[25] If the employees of B. C. Malcolm are lumped into the Malcolm Boring bargaining unit and covered by the master labor agreement, the nonconstruction employees of B. C. Malcolm would not only be bound by a pre-hire contract where the majority representation status could arguably be attributed to the union-security clause, but would also be subject to the requirement that they join Local 12 on the eighth day after their employment.

Moreover, it is basic Board policy to accept the voluntary agreement of the parties as to the scope of the unit. As the Board held in A-1 Fire Protection, Inc., and Corcoran Automatic Sprinklers, Inc., 250 NLRB 217, 220 (1980):

> In resolving disputes over the scope of a bargaining unit, the Board's starting point consistently had been its policy of accepting voluntary agreements between parties on unit scope, whether made as part of a voluntary recognition agreement or entered into in a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election. In light of this policy, the Board's analysis of such a dispute includes an examination of the agreed-upon unit and an examination of the circumstances surrounding the alleged agreement on unit scope to determine whether it in fact reflects the intent of the parties and constitutes a voluntary agreement.

In that case, the Board found that the two parts of a single employer had separate bargaining units in a "double-breasted operation," where one of the parts performed nonunion construction work and the other performed union construction work.

In determining what the agreement was with regard to the scope of the unit, it is necessary to consider both the contract and the practice of the parties. In the instant case, there is a serious question whether there even is a contract. In 1962 Malcolm Boring signed a short-form agreement with Local 12. It bound itself to an agreement with that union and with no other. The Southern California Master Labor Agreement of 1977–80, which is the key contract in this case, has an entirely different bargaining unit from the one agreed to by Malcolm Boring in 1962. The 1977–80 Southern California Master Labor Agreement is an agreement between employers and a number of different unions including Carpenters, Laborers, and Teamsters. Even assuming that the Local 12 part of the master labor agreement can be severed from the remainder of the agreement in such a way as to be binding on Malcolm Boring, there are serious ambiguities with regard to the scope of the unit. The 1977–80 master labor agreement did not contain in the basic unit description language that had appeared in prior agreements concerning coverage of the contractors' yards and shops. Similar language was used in the 1977–80 agreement but it was included in an appendix related to special working rules for the operating engineer craft. There is serious doubt as to whether the parties ever intended that shop employees as opposed to construction employees should be covered in light of the fact that the short-form agreement signed by Malcolm Boring in 1962 had the box for construction checked but not the box for shop. In view of all these ambiguities it is particularly important to look to the practice of the parties.

Malcolm Boring traditionally hired unskilled employees. When those employees obtained a sufficient degree of skill, they were permitted to join Local 12 and to enjoy coverage by the contract. That practice was followed openly over the years. The evidence does not establish that the practice was a result of deception or misrepresentation by Malcolm Boring. On occasions Malcolm Boring had to argue with Local 12 before Local 12 would accept the fact that employees had sufficient skills to be allowed to join the Union. An argument could be made that Local 12 considered the contract to be a members-only agreement that did not apply to nonmembers. Looking at the situation more favorably from Local 12's point of view, Local 12 required employees to have a certain degree of skill before joining the Union and, when they had attained that degree of skill, they also were eligible for coverage under the contract. In any event, the practice was for the contract to cover skilled construction employees of Malcolm Boring. B. C. Malcolm shop employees were never covered. In sum, I do not believe that the General Counsel has established that the voluntary agreement of the parties, as construed in the light of their practices, included shop employees in the scope of the unit.

[22] From July 1979 through June 1980 B. C. Malcolm's volume of business from rental and sales of equipment was approximately $228,780. From August 1979 through July 1980 Malcolm Boring's volume of business from construction industry work was approximately $1,283,165.

[23] Sec. 8(f) of the Act.

[24] Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act.

[25] Sec. 8(e) of the Act.

Under all these circumstances, I find that the employees of B. C. Malcolm are in a separate bargaining unit from the employees of Malcolm Boring and that any contract that Malcolm Boring had with Local 12 did not apply to the employees of B. C. Malcolm. In light of that finding, I recommend that the allegation that Malcolm Boring and B. C. Malcolm refused to bargain with Local 12 in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act be dismissed.[26]

E. The 8(a)(1) Allegations

Paragraph 11 of the complaint alleges that in or about October 1979 Billy C. Malcolm violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by stating to employees at the Chino facility "that he intended to end his construction boring business, in order to discourage activity on behalf of or in support of the IUOE." David Frederick testified that, in August or September 1979, Billy C. Malcolm told him that he had negotiated a contract for Bruce Malcolm with NMU, that Bruce was going to try that Union, and that B. C. Malcolm was considering signing with that Union. As set forth above, Billy Malcolm denied that that conversation took place and I have credited Billy C. Malcolm. Larry Cochell testified that, in June 1979, Billy C. Malcolm told him that Malcolm Boring would be closing down in January 1980. Cochell also testified that in late September or October 1979 Billy C. Malcolm told him that he was going to turn the boring business over to the boys and start a pipe business.[27] Billy C. Malcolm testified that he never told Cochell that he would close down his boring business. As between Billy C. Malcolm and Cochell, I credit Billy C. Malcolm.[28]

Paragraph 12 of the complaint alleges that in or about October 1979 Billy C. Malcolm interrogated an employee at the Chino facility regarding his union sympathies and membership. Larry Cochell testified that, in the latter part of September or early October 1979, Billy C. Malcolm spoke to him in the shop and asked him what his thoughts were on the NMU. He averred that Billy C. Malcolm mentioned some of the benefits of the NMU. Although I have some doubts as to Cochell's credibility, Billy C. Malcolm did not testify with regard to that conversation and I credit Cochell. However, in the entire context of the situations, as set forth above, I do not believe that that one isolated question interfered with, restrained, or coerced Cochell or any other employee in the exercise of his rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

Paragraph 13 of the complaint alleges that in or about October 1979 Bruce C. Malcolm interrogated an employee at the Chino facility regarding his union sympathies and membership. Cochell testified that, about the first of October 1979, Bruce C. Malcolm asked him what his thoughts were about the NMU and told him that he had signed a contract with that Union. As found above, Bruce C. Malcolm was not a single employer with Malcolm Boring or B. C. Malcolm. At that time Bruce C. Malcolm had his own business and Cochell was not his employee. Bruce C. Malcolm and Cochell had been friends and it appeared that Bruce C. Malcolm was merely asking Cochell's advice concerning his new business. I do not believe that Bruce C. Malcolm's question in any manner interfered with, restrained, or coerced Cochell or any other employee in the exercise of rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act. I shall recommend that all of the 8(a)(1) allegations in the complaint be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Malcolm Boring, B. C. Malcolm and Bruce Malcolm, Inc., are, and each is, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 12 and NMU are and each is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the credible evidence that Malcolm Boring, B. C. Malcolm, Bruce Malcolm, Inc., or NMU violated the Act as alleged in the complaint.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and upon the entire record in this case, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

---

[26] As the United States Supreme Court held in N.L.R.B. v. Local Union No. 103, International Association of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL-CIO [Higdon Construction Co.], 434 U.S. 335, 345 (1978): "The employer's duty to bargain and honor [an 8(f)] contract is contingent on the union's attaining majority support at the various construction sites." The Board has held that that duty also applies where a union attains majority status in a bargaining unit consisting of a permanent stable work force which moves from jobsite to jobsite. Precision Striping, Inc., 245 NLRB 169 (1979), enforcement denied 642 F.2d 1144 (9th Cir. 1981). The General Counsel contends that the Union did secure majority status in such a permanent stable work force. As to part of that argument, the General Counsel lumped together the construction and nonconstruction employees, deleted from the unit employees who had not worked a certain number of days within a given period, and counted as part of the bargaining unit workers who were the sons of the owner. However, in view of the conclusions reached above, there is no need to decide the question of majority status.

[27] It is noted that Local 12 Business Agent Dye did not contact Malcolm Boring concerning its claim that shop employees were covered by the contract until December 1979.

[28] Even if Cochell were credited, it would be clear that the alleged threat had nothing to do with Local 12's claim that the contract covered shop employees. The threat allegedly occurred in October 1979 and Local 12's claim was made in December 1979.

ORDER[29]

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[29] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Ditzler Mechanical Contractors, Inc. and Francis X. McGowan and Local Union No. 598, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO, Party to the Contract. Case 19-CA-11634

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On September 10, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Frederick C. Herzog issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Ditzler Mechanical Contractors, Inc., Albany, Oregon, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

FREDERICK C. HERZOG, Administrative Law Judge: On August 1, 1979, a charge was filed by Francis X. McGowan, an individual (hereinafter referred to as the Charging Party), against Ditzler Mechanical Contractors, Inc. (hereinafter referred to as the Respondent), alleging that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act. Based thereon a complaint was issued by the Regional Director for Region 19 of the National Labor Relations Board on August 17, 1979, alleging that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act. The Respondent's answer to the complaint admitted certain factual allegations but denied any wrongdoing.

Thereafter, in February 1980, the Respondent entered into an informal settlement agreement. The Charging Party did not join in this agreement. However, in May 1980, the Regional Director withdrew his previous approval of the settlement agreement and reinstated the original complaint based on his assertion that the Respondent had failed to comply with the terms of the settlement agreement. The Respondent's answer was, by letter, also reinstated.

The case was heard before me at Richland, Washington, on November 4, 1980. The General Counsel appeared through counsel. The Charging Party appeared in person. As a party to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Respondent, Local Union No. 598, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO (hereinafter referred to as the Union), appeared through counsel. However, the Respondent did not appear at the hearing. Its counsel, in a telephone conversation with me, stated that the Respondent's decision not to appear was consciously made and was not based on any scheduling conflict. I advised her that we would go forward with the hearing; she voiced her agreement and understanding.

Thus, while not all parties were present at the hearing, it is clear that each party had an opportunity to be present, to participate, to present evidence, and to examine and cross-examine witnesses. Based on the record thus compiled, as well as my review of the briefs filed by counsel for the General Counsel and the Union, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. COMMERCE

The Respondent is an Oregon corporation with its primary offices and place of business in Albany, Oregon, where it is engaged as a plumbing contractor. During the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint herein, it had gross sales and services valued in excess of $500,000. During that same period, it sold and shipped goods, or provided services to customers outside the State of Oregon or sold and shipped goods or provided services to customers within the State of Oregon (with said customers themselves being engaged in interstate commerce by other than indirect means), all of which had a total value in excess of $50,000. Additionally, during the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint herein, it purchased and caused to be delivered at its facility within the State of Oregon goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources outside the State of Oregon or from suppliers within the State of Oregon which in turn obtained such goods and materials directly from sources outside said State.

Based on the foregoing admitted allegations of the complaint, I find that the Respondent is engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

It is undisputed and I find that the Union, Local Union No. 598, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. The Issues Presented for Determination

The complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act by virtue of the fact that one of its supervisors and agents also served as the president of the Union and established its policies and procedures, and participated in the affairs and meetings of the Union. Additionally, the question regarding the appropriate remedy for such actions is presented.

The Union asserts several arguments disputing the General Counsel's contention that a prior settlement agreement between the Regional Director and the Respondent should be set aside or that unfair labor practices have been committed.

B. The Conduct Upon Which the Complaint is Based

The Respondent herein is a contractor with its home office at Albany, Oregon, some 35 miles south of Portland, Oregon. However, it also operates in the area of southeastern Washington, primarily in the tri-cities area of Pasco, Richland, and Kennewick. In order to carry out its operations in southeastern Washington it has an office located in the tri-cities area.

For 2-1/2 years prior to the hearing herein, such operations were headed by William "Billy" James Elam. During this 2-1/2 year period Elam served as the Respondent's "general foreman" and, as was judicially admitted by the Respondent's answer to the complaint herein, Elam was the Respondent's superintendent at all times material herein, acting as the Respondent's agent and supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) and (13), respectively, of the Act. While Elam testified that he spent a substantial portion of his time performing the actual manual labor associated with the Respondent's operation as a small contractor, it is clear that he served for approximately 2-1/2 years without layoff or interruption as the coordinator and head of the Respondent's general operations in southeastern Washington. This involved coordination of several projects at various times. It appears that such projects involved crews of anywhere from one to six employees, as well as foremen. The foremen were deemed to be responsible for the day-to-day operations on the various jobsites, and each foreman reported directly to Elam. Elam reported only to Ditzler, and Ditzler made the 5-hour drive from the home office in Albany, Oregon, to the tri-cities area only once each week.

The General Counsel's complaint herein is based on the fact that throughout this period of time Elam was serving as the superintendent for the Respondent, he also served as the president of the Union with which Ditzler had a collective-bargaining relationship. Apparently, Ditzler has entered into successive collective-bargaining agreements with the Union since approximately 1972. While the collective-bargaining agreement which was effective at the time of the hearing herein was not offered in evidence, Elam testified that it was a 3-year contract providing for a termination date in June 1982.

As he had done while testifying about his responsibilities and duties as superintendent for the Respondent, Elam also sought to down-play the importance and significance of his role as the president of the Union. Thus, throughout his testimony and that of other witnesses for the Union, the office of the presidency of the Union was depicted as largely ceremonial. It was admitted that Elam presides over membership meetings of the Union, but it was disputed that he had any real input in the collective-bargaining process, in the resolution of grievances, or in recruiting new members for the Union. Instead, his role as presiding officer of the Union's meetings was portrayed as one lacking in discretion, governed only by Robert's Rules of Order, and giving him no more power or authority within the Union than that of any other rank-and-file member. In this connection it was noted that Ditzler is a small contractor and that its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union is only one of some 106 such agreements which the Union and its 2,000 to 2,100 members have within the Union's jurisdiction.

C. Discussion and Conclusions

1. First of all, the Union contends that the settlement agreement herein should not have been set aside by the Regional Director and that I may not properly make findings based on conduct which was merged into the settlement agreement. I disagree. Despite difficulty in determining exactly how this settlement agreement was breached,[1] it is clear from Elam's testimony that the settlement agreement's provisions included, as a minimum, a requirement that he elect to divest himself of one of the offices he held. It is equally clear from Elam's testimony that he failed and refused to abide by this provision, for, as he testified, he became indignant when told about the terms of the agreement. Therefore, he decided to continue in both positions. At the time of the hearing herein, he was still the Respondent's superintendent and he was still the Union's president.

Indeed, the Union's position herein is not that Elam has satisfied the terms of the settlement agreement, but that the General Counsel has failed to prove that it should be set aside. Alternatively, the Union asserts that, even if the General Counsel has done so, the law does not require such an election between offices by a low-level supervisor in the building and construction industry.

The Respondent's postsettlement conduct is shown through the testimony of Elam to warrant the Regional Director's action in setting aside the settlement agreement. For the Respondent failed to abide by the terms of the agreement and, instead, obstinately continued the very conduct which had been the subject of the settlement agreement; i.e., continuation in both offices. Obviously, where the Respondent fails to abide by an agreement and engages in further conduct contrary to the terms of the agreement, the Regional Director has no choice but to set it aside under the terms of Section

[1] This difficulty is caused by the fact that the counsel for the General Counsel failed to place into evidence the notice to employees which, presumbly, was attached to the settlement agreement itself, which is in evidence as G.C. Exh. 1(i). Absent the notice to employees, I am unable to tell with precision just what the terms of the settlement agreement were.

101.9(e)(2) of the Board's Statements of Procedure, Series 8, as amended. World-Wide Press, Inc., 242 NLRB 346 (1979); Tompkins Motor Lines, Inc., 142 NLRB 1, 3 (1963), enforcement denied on other grounds 337 F.2d 325 (6th Cir. 1964); cf. Henry I. Siegel Co., Inc., 143 NLRB 386, enfd. 328 F.2d 25 (2d Cir. 1964); United Dairy Co., 146 NLRB 187 (1964).

Thus, I find and conclude that the General Counsel should prevail on the threshold questions of whether or not the Respondent engaged in further unfair labor practices following approval of the settlement agreement, and that those unfair labor practices are sufficient to warrant setting aside that agreement.[2]

2. The Union contends that the General Counsel's case must fall because there is no evidence of intent to improperly influence employees or members of the Union by or on behalf of the Respondent by Elam. However, this argument is without merit for such a showing is irrelevant. Janesville Products Division, Amtel, 240 NLRB 854, 860 (1979), and cases cited therein. Instead, the proper inquiry is whether or not there has been such a mingling of supervisory and employee-representative functions as to deny the Respondent's employees rights under the Act to be represented in collective-bargaining matters by individuals who have a single-minded loyalty to their interests. Jeffrey Manufacturing Company, Screw Conveyor Division, 208 NLRB 75 (1974). The facts in this case demonstrate such a "mingling" of supervisory and employee representative functions as to make the violation of the Act seem obvious.

In light of the fact that Elam was the overseer, not merely of the Respondent's employees, but also of the Respondent's foremen, Elam must be found to be a "high-level" supervisor, not a simple or low-level "master mechanic." Welsbach Electric Corporation, 236 NLRB 503 (1978). Further, his long and uninterrupted tenure as superintendent for the Respondent's entire operations in southeastern Washington belies any claim that Elam was no more than a "transitory" supervisor, typical of the building and construction industry. Nassau and Suffolk Contractors' Association, Inc., 118 NLRB 174, 184 (1957); Detroit Association of Plumbing Contractors, 132 NLRB 658, 659 (1961).

The duties of the president of a local union affiliated with the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada are set forth in the latter's constitution. Similarly, the constitution of the Union sets forth the duties of its president. The provisions of the said constitutions differ only slightly on this subject matter. Each provides for the president to preside over all meetings of the local union and to do so under Robert's Rules of Order, though the International Union provides further that he do so in accord with commonsense. Each constitution provides that the president of the local union "shall have a general supervisory control over all matters pertaining to the general welfare of the Local Union." (Emphasis supplied.) Finally, it is provided that the president shall be an ex officio member of all committees; the local constitution provides that he should do so "with voice" but no vote, while the International Union's constitution provides that he shall be "over" all committees.

Under these circumstances, it appears quite evident that prudent employees of the Respondent would, when exercising their right to freely engage in union activities without interference from their employer, experience some degree of inward restraint. Before taking issue with the views expressed by Elam in any of the workings of the various committees of which he is necessarily a member, any employee of the Respondent would think twice, for the duties of a union officer, vested with "general supervisory control over all matters pertaining to the general welfare of the Local Union," are manifestly much greater than "ceremonial."

Based on the considerations set out above, I find and conclude that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act by permitting its supervisor and agent to continue to hold office as the president of the Union.

THE REMEDY

The record in this case contains no evidence indicating that Elam, the Respondent, or the Union has, in fact, cooperated in such a way as to actually deny employees rights. Additionally, there is no evidence that the Union has been so infused with the Respondent's presence as to justify a finding that the Union has been "dominated" by the Respondent. If such evidence existed it would warrant the revocation of the Union's certification. Abilene Area Sheet Metal Contractors, 236 NLRB 1652 (1978). Instead, the evidence here merely indicates supervisory participation in union affairs.[3]

Under such circumstances including my consideration of the fact that the Respondent has not complied with an informal settlement agreement which must have contained, at the least, a cease-and-desist provision, it is necessary to set aside the existing collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union.[4] Bisso Towboat Company, Inc., 192 NLRB 885 (1971); Janesville Products Division, Amtel, supra; Abilene Area Sheet Metal Contractors, supra. However, the evidence shows that the Union had an established relationship with the Respondent for some years before Elam's employment as a supervisor. The record evidence, moreover, affords no basis for questioning the majority status of the union. Thus, requiring that Elam, the supervisor, be separated from the administration of the Union and participation in its affairs, and requiring that the collective-bargaining agreement be set aside, will suffice to remedy the 8(a)(2) violation found herein.[5] More specifically, I do not find

[2] In this connection I have considered the Respondent's presettlement conduct only as background evidence. See discussion Jake Schlegal, Jr., d/b/a Aurora and East Denver Trash Disposal, 218 NLRB 1, 9 (1975).

[3] I do not regard the evidence that Elam participated in the adjustment of grievances as a member of a committee for the Union as having sufficient probative value to base any findings thereon.

[4] In light of the fact that the Union participated in the hearing herein such a finding is warranted.

[5] The General Counsel's statements of position regarding the remedy in this matter have been less than helpful to me. At the hearing I inquired of her regarding the General Counsel's position on whether or not the collective-bargaining agreement between the parties should be set aside. She responded that, not having previously thought of the matter, she would reserve comment and answer my inquiry in her brief. However, the brief fails to answer this issue. Instead, it merely points out, accurately, that it necessary that the Respondent withdraw and withhold recognition from the Union. Jeffrey Manufacturing Company, supra. By setting aside the collective-bargaining agreement between the parties, it should be expressly understood that the Respondent is not thereby required to depart from, or vary, any of the substantive terms, conditions, and benefits for employees currently in effect. Bisso Towboat Company, supra.

Conclusions of Law

1. The Respondent is an Employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By permitting a supervisor to serve as the president of the Union, thereby necessarily involving him in the establishment of the Union's policies and procedures and requiring his participation in the affairs and meetings of the Union, the Respondent has interfered with the administration of the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act.

4. The Respondent did not violate the Act in any manner other than as specified above.[6]

ORDER[7]

The Respondent, Ditzler Mechanical Contractors, Inc., Albany, Oregon, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Assisting and encouraging membership in Local No. 598, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO, by permitting any supervisor, as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act, to serve as the president of the labor organization.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization, to form a labor organization, to join or assist Local Union No. 598, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through a representative of their choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from engaging in such activities, except to the extent permitted by Section 8(a)(3) and Section 8(f) of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Post at its offices in Albany, Oregon, and in the tricities area of the State of Washington copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being duly signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to insure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Sign and return by mail to the Regional Director for Region 19, immediately upon receipt from him, copies of the attached notice, marked "Appendix," for posting by the Union, should it desire to do so.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 19, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

We will not permit General Foreman and Superintendent William "Billy" James Elam or any other supervisor to serve as a union officer or representative.

We will not give effect to our current collective-bargaining agreement with Local 598, and we will not change the wages and other conditions of employment under the contract.

We will not unlawfully interfere with the operation of any union of your choice.

We will not in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act.

there is no issue of "domination" involved in this case and states that the General Counsel seeks the "usual remedies," making no effort to brief or argue the question of just what they may be. Instead, the General Counsel's brief goes on to state, "It should be further noted that this is not a limited request and General Counsel further seeks any and all remedies deemed necessary and appropriate by the Adminstrative Law Judge."

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On April 2, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Nancy M. Sherman issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief. Respondent Interior Concepts, Inc., filed limited cross-exceptions and an answering brief to the General Counsel's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs, and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith.

The extensive prior litigation in this proceeding is described in considerable detail in section I of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision. It suffices for our purposes here that the Board found that the named Respondents in the earlier proceedings violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) by various conduct and that the Board ordered those Respondents to make whole the Union and the employee discriminatees in accordance with the Board's Order. Both the Board's Decision and Order[1] and its Supplemental Decision and Order[2] were enforced by the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.[3]

The sole issue before the Board now involves whether Respondent Interior is an alter ego of the named Respondents in the earlier proceedings and thus liable on the judgments in such proceedings.

The Administrative Law Judge has provided a comprehensive review of the record evidence including, inter alia, the ownership, management, business purpose, organization, and operation of the companies involved in this proceeding. Only limited exceptions have been filed to the Administrative Law Judge's factual findings.[4] It would serve no purpose to repeat or, in view of the extensive and detailed nature of such evidence, to attempt to summarize this evidence at the outset of this Decision and Order. The gravamen of this case is whether such evidence shows that Interior is an alter ego of Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts. Respondents urged and the Administrative Law Judge found the evidence fails to establish such alter ego status. The General Counsel excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's findings and contends that the credited record evidence supports a legal conclusion that Interior is an alter ego of Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts. We agree with the General Counsel.

The Administrative Law Judge found that the record evidence satisfied various indicia of alter ego status. Significantly, the Administrative Law Judge found both substantially identical ownership and substantially identical management in the four corporations. Thus, she found that, at the time Interior began operations in January 1976, 75 percent of its stock was owned by Roberta Florence, who owned all of the stock of Bobbe and Concepts and whose husband owned half of Custom's stock. With respect to the management of the four corporations, the Administrative Law Judge found that Frank Florence was an officer of all four companies, and that he managed the first three corporations on a day-to-day basis, performed selling functions for all four corporations, incorporated Interior, and by the end of 1979 was receiving the same salary from Interior as Interior's president, Terry Sterling. Similarly, Sterling, who served as salaried controller and office manager for Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts, continues to perform or supervise at least some of the functions he performed for the earlier three companies in his position as Interior's president.

Other indicia of Interior's alter ego status found by the Administrative Law Judge included evidence that Sterling and Frank Florence solicited and obtained business for Interior while they were still on the payroll of Concepts and before Interior formally began operations. Furthermore, one of Interior's first customers was Benjamin Brothers, which had been a customer of Custom and a major customer of Bobbe and Concepts, and to which Interior provided substantially the same services (except fabrication) which Benjamin Brothers had received from the other three corporations. Also, Roberta Florence handled all of the billing functions for both Concepts in Drapery and Interior. Finally, the Administrative Law Judge found that the Florences, Sterling, and two installers, who constituted the entire final payroll of Concepts, were transferred to Interior's payroll without any break in their employment.

[3] Unpublished decision 96 LRRM 2394 (1976), and judgment of April 20, 1979.

[4] Respondent Interior has excepted to the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Sterling and Frank Florence were spending a substantial amount of time soliciting business for Interior while they were still on the payroll of Concepts in early 1975 and to her finding that there is a substantial identity of ownership and management between Interior and the other three named Respondents. The record supports these findings by the Administrative Law Judge.

Despite the Administrative Law Judge's finding that the foregoing evidence satisfied various indicia of alter ego status, she nevertheless relied on other "countervailing considerations" to conclude that Interior was not an alter ego of the other three corporations. In so concluding, the Administrative Law Judge found that Interior differed from the other three corporations because Interior never employed production employees, Interior's facilities were much smaller and at a different location, and Interior's customers (except for Benjamin Brothers) and its suppliers are different. Further, the Administrative Law Judge pointed out that the principal business shifted from manufacturing drapes to be used in private residences to sales to institutions and commercial establishments of products manufactured by others. In short, the Administrative Law Judge relied on changes in business operations to find that Interior is not an alter ego of the other three corporations.[5]

In assessing the changes in business operations for the purpose of determining Interior's status as an alter ego of Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts, it must be taken into account that a substantial portion of these changes took place in Custom's successor alter egos, Bobbe and Concepts. Thus, Custom manufactured draperies from its own materials for residential customers and marketed the product through department stores. When Custom was no longer in an economic position to carry an inventory of materials, Bobbe was incorporated and continued the business by manufacturing draperies from customers' materials. A consequence of this change was a loss of residential business and a shift to institutional customers which was continued by Concepts. Another consequence of these changes in business operations from Custom to Concepts—and carried forward in Interior—was the transformation from a manufacturer to a broker of draperies materials and goods.

When viewed against the background of the changes in business operations from Custom to Concepts, the changes from Concepts to Interior do not represent an abrupt shift but another step in the evolution of the drapery business from manufacturer to broker and from residential to institutional customers. In each instance, the principals of all four corporations applied their expertise in the drapery business to the economic conditions available to them. There was no real hiatus between Concepts and Interior, which was consistent with the pattern of discontinuing one drapery business and commencing a new scaled-down operation in the earlier three corporations.[6] In short, although Interior downplays the scope and effect of the foregoing record evidence showing both a connection between, and carryover from, the business operations of Concepts and Interior, the point remains that it was a spinoff of the former businesses tempered by the economic resources available to the principals at each given time. Thus, the changes in business operations revealed by this record can be characterized fairly as having:

> . . . amounted essentially to evolutions, extensions and developments merely, such as could characteristically be expected to occur in the particular business field and in the economic era involved, without having so changed the nature of the enterprise and its job situations as to cause it to be outside the bounds of legitimate remedial area in respect to the discriminatees.[7]

In sum, we find that Interior is an alter ego of Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts. As such, we find that Interior is derivatively liable to provide the remedies ordered by the Board including backpay due the discriminatees.[8]

[5] The Administrative Law Judge also found that the evidence failed to establish that Interior was set up for the purpose of evading the Act and that there was no transfer of assets. Although she acknowledged that these two factors were not necessary elements to find alter ego status, she nevertheless weighed them along with the other changes described above in reaching her conclusion that Interior was not an alter ego of the other three named corporations. We find the Administrative Law Judge's reliance on these factors to be misplaced.

[6] Custom's operations were discontinued in August 1974, the same month that Bobbe was incorporated. Similarly, Bobbe went out of business and Concepts commenced operations, both in February 1975. As more fully discussed by the Administrative Law Judge, Concepts was winding down its business at the same time Interior was being incorporated in August 1975. We also note that, just as the change from Bobbe to Concepts in February 1975 coincided with the issuance of one of the complaints and the filing of the charges that resulted in another of the complaints here, Concepts was ceasing business and Interior was formed while these cases were before the Board.

[7] N.L.R.B. v. Ozark Hardwood Company, 282 F.2d 1, 6 (8th Cir. 1960). The only reasons offered by Interior for the changes in the corporate entity were the need for a fresh start and Continental Bank's concern that its interest might be affected by other creditors. But there is no contention, or evidence to show, that such changes could not have been handled within the framework of Concepts. The absence of such evidence, coupled with the substantial identity of ownership and management of the corporations, undermines Interior's contention that it is not an alter ego.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Interior Concepts, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Interior Concepts, Inc., is an alter ego.

3. As the alter ego of Custom Manufacturing Company (Successor to Zion Industries, Inc.,—Curtains and Drapery Division); Bobbe Drapery Products Co., Inc.; and Concepts in Drapery Design, Inc., Interior Concepts, Inc., is derivatively liable for backpay due discriminatees as part of the Board's remedy for unfair labor practices as set forth in 220 NLRB 1256 (1975) and 230 NLRB 691 (1977).

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that Interior Concepts, Inc., Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, as an alter ego of Custom Manufacturing Company (Successor to Zion Industries, Inc.—Curtain and Drapery Division); Bobbe Drapery Products, Co., Inc.; and Concepts in Drapery Design, Inc., shall make whole the discriminatees named in the Board's Supplemental Decision and Order set forth at 230 NLRB 691, 692, in the amount and manner described therein.

DECISION

NANCY M. SHERMAN, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in Chicago, Illinois, on November 17, 1980, pursuant to a backpay specification and notice of hearing issued on May 16, 1980. The backpay specification alleges that Interior Concepts, Inc. (Interior Concepts), is an alter ego of other corporations which are named in the specification and which in April 1979 were judicially directed to pay certain sums required by a Supplemental Decision and Order of the Board issued in July 1977.

Upon the entire record, including the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by counsel for the General Counsel and by counsel for Interior Concepts and by its agents Terry Sterling, Frank Florence, and Roberta Florence, I hereby make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE PRIOR LITIGATION

On October 2, 1974, The International Chemical Workers Union, Local 665 (the Union), filed a charge against "Custom Manufacturing Co., Successor to Zion Industries, Drapery Div." (Custom), docketed as Case 13-CA-13630, which alleged, inter alia, that "the above-named employer" had "discriminated against Union members and officers." On November 20, 1974, a complaint bearing this docket number was issued against Custom. The complaint contained no allegations that Custom had unlawfully terminated employees or failed to make contractually required payments, but did allege, inter alia, that at all material times "Frank Florence occupied the position of President of [Custom], and has been and is now an agent and supervisor of" Custom.

On November 27, 1974, the Union filed against Custom another charge, which was docketed as Case 13-CA-13796. The charge alleged, inter alia, that "the Employer" had "through its agents and officers unilaterally terminated the Accident & Insurance Plan, the Life Insurance Plan, and the Pension Plan." On February 6, 1975, a complaint with the docket number 13-CA-13796 was issued against Custom. The complaint alleged, inter alia, that at all material times Frank Florence "occupied the position of president of the Respondent, and has been and is now an agent and supervisor of Respondent, acting on its behalf." The complaint further alleged that Custom had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act) by unilaterally changing existing wage rates, benefits, and conditions of employment by failing and/or ceasing to make payments and contributions into and discontinuing the pension plan described in a collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and Custom.

On February 13, 1975, the Union filed a charge, docketed as Case 13-CA-13998, against Custom and Bobbe Drapery Products (Bobbe). The charge alleged that "the above-named Employer, through its officers and agents," had unlawfully transferred and/or closed down "its" Zion, Illinois, facility. On April 22, 1975, the Union filed an amended charge in Case 13-CA-13998, against Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery Design, Inc. (Concepts in Drapery), Frank Florence, and Roberta Florence. The amended charge alleged, inter alia, that "the above-named Employer, through its officers and agents," had unlawfully transferred and/or closed down "its" Zion, Illinois, facility. That same day, the Union filed an amended charge in Case 13-CA-13796 against Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, Frank Florence, and Roberta Florence, alleging, inter alia, that "the Employer has through its agents and officers unilaterally terminated the Accident & Insurance Plan, and Life Insurance Plan, and the Pension Plan." On April 24, 1975, the Union filed a first amended charge in Case 13-CA-13630 against Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, Frank Florence, and Roberta Florence. The charge alleged, inter alia, that "the above-named Employer" had "discriminated against union members and officers."

On April 30, 1975, a complaint was issued with the docket number 13-CA-13998. The caption named Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence." The body of the complaint stated that Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, Frank Florence, and Roberta Florence would be referred to as "Respondents, collectively." The complaint alleged, inter alia, that the initial charge had been served on "Respondent Custom" and "Respondent Bobbe"; that the first amended charge had been served on "Respondents"; that Bobbe was the alter ego to Custom; that Concepts in Drapery was an alter ego to Custom and Bobbe; and that Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Design were "employers" within the meaning of the Act. The complaint further alleged that at all material times Frank Florence was president of Custom and was an agent and supervisor of Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery; and that Roberta Florence was at all material times president and an agent of Bobbe and Concepts in Drapery. Also, the complaint alleged that "Respondents" had violated the Act by unilaterally terminating a collective-bargaining agreement between Custom and the Union, and by terminating "all its [sic] employees employed at its Zion, Illinois, facility, and thereafter [failing] and [refusing] to offer employment to those employees at its Chicago, Illinois, facility."[1]

Also on April 30, 1975, the Regional Director issued a pleading whose caption named Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence." The docket numbers on the pleading were 13-CA-13640 and 13-CA-13796, and it was entitled "Amended Consolidated Complaints and Notice of Hearing." The body of the complaint stated that the corporations named in the caption "[A]nd Their Agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence" were "herein called Respondent Custom, Respondent Bobbe, Respondent Concepts, Respondent Frank Florence, and Respondent Roberta Florence, respectively, and Respondents collectively." The complaint alleged, inter alia, that the first amended charges in both cases had been served "on Respondent Custom; Respondent Bobbe; Respondent Concepts [in Drapery]; Respondent Frank Florence and Respondent Roberta Florence." The complaint further alleged that Bobbe was an alter ego to Custom; Concepts in Drapery was an alter ego to Bobbe and Custom; and "Respondents" Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery were "employers" engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act. Also, the complaint alleged that at all material times Frank Florence was president of "Respondent" Custom and an agent and supervisor of "Respondents" Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery; and that at all material times Roberta Florence was president of and an agent and supervisor of "Respondents" Bobbe and Concepts in Drapery. The complaint further alleged that "the Respondents" had violated the Act by, inter alia, unilaterally changing existing wage rates, benefits, and conditions of employment by failing and/or ceasing to make payments into, and discontinuing, the pension and insurance plans described in a collective-bargaining agreement between Custom and the Union.

About May 23, 1975, a single answer was filed to both April 30 complaints. This answer was captioned "Respondent's Answer to Complaint"; stated that Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence" would be collectively referred to as "Respondent"; and contained averments ascribed to "Respondent." The end of the answer names Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence," and is signed by counsel as "[t]heir" attorney. By letter to the Regional Director dated June 24, 1975, counsel stated, inter alia, "On behalf of the Respondents . . . we hereby withdraw the 'Respondent's Answer to Complaint.'" On June 30, 1975, William G. Kocol, counsel for the General Counsel, filed a motion for an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and for summary judgment. The motion stated, inter alia, that "the Respondent" had filed and then withdrawn an answer, and that, if the Board issued an order transferring the case to itself, Kocol intended to file a supplemental brief as to an appropriate remedy.

On July 8, 1975, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to itself and a Notice To Show Cause why the Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. The order stated that the complaints alleged unfair labor practices by "Respondents," that an answer had been filed by "Respondents," and that "Respondents" had subsequently withdrawn "their" answer. The affidavit of service of this document states, inter alia, that copies were served by regular mail on Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, Frank Florence, and Roberta Florence, respectively. No party filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause. Kocol filed a brief which sometimes referred to the opposing party as "Respondents" but at one point referred to "the doubtful continued viability of Respondent's business operation were it to incur" certain additional expenses, and requested that "the Board order Respondents to offer employment at its [sic] Chicago, Illinois, facility to those employees who were employed at the Zion, Illinois, facility, and to pay backpay until such offer of reinstatement." The certificate of service attached to this brief avers that copies were mailed to, inter alia, Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, Frank Florence, and Roberta Florence, respectively.

On October 14, 1975, the Board issued a Decision and Order, reported at 220 NLRB 1256, in these three cases. The Decision initially stated that Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence [are] herein called the Respondent." The Decision went on to state that the complaints alleged unfair labor practices by "Respondent." The Board then stated that the action of "Respondent" in withdrawing its answer meant that the allegations of the complaint must be deemed admitted. Part I of the Board's "Findings of Fact," headed "The Business of the Respondent," refers by name to Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery, but does not refer by name to Frank Florence or Roberta Florence. Nor are the Florences referred to by name in any of the other findings of fact, which usually refer to "Respondent" in the singular but sometimes use the plural. Part V of the Decision, entitled "The Remedy," states, inter alia, that backpay and contributions to the pension and insurance plans are to be paid by "Respondent." The Board's Conclusions of Law state that Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of" the Act. These Conclusions of Law further state that "Respondent" had engaged in certain unfair labor practices which included refusal to make payments to the pension and insurance plan as provided in the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and the termination of and failure and refusal to offer reinstatement to employees. The Board's Order states, in part:

[1] The word "its" is used as a pronoun for "Respondents'" in other portions of the complaint as well.

> Respondent, Custom . . . Bobbe . . . Concepts in Drapery . . . its officers, agents, including Frank Florence and Roberta Florence, successors, and assigns, shall:
> * * * * *
> 2 Pay into the pension plan and insurance plan all due and owing payments and contributions as provided in the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.
> (e) Offer all employees in the appropriate unit who were terminated at its Zion, Illinois, facility employment at its Chicago, Illinois, facility, paying their travel and moving expenses if they accept the offer of employment, and make said employees whole for any losses they incurred by reason of the discrimination against them in accordance with the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

Paragraphs 2(g) and (h) of the Order required the posting and mailing of notices. Each notice was to bear the typewritten names of Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence," and contained a blank to be executed by "Representative" and "Title." The affidavit of service of this Decision indicates, inter alia, that copies were sent by regular mail to Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, Frank Florence, and Roberta Florence, respectively.

On July 19, 1976, the Board, by Deputy Associate General Counsel Elliott Moore, filed with the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit an "Application for Summary Entry of a Judgment Enforcing the Board's Order." Frank Florence and Roberta Florence were not named in the caption of the application, which designates Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery as "Respondent." The body of the application states that the Board's order had been issued against "Respondent, Custom . . . Bobbe . . . Concepts in Drapery Design, Inc., and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns." The application requested a judgment against "Respondent, Custom . . . Bobbe . . . Concepts in Drapery Design, Inc., and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns." Attached to the application were copies of a proposed judgment whose caption named as "Respondent" (in addition to Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery) "their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence," and which called for a judgment against "Respondent, Custom . . . Bobbe . . . Concepts in Drapery . . . and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns." The proposed judgment constituted an almost verbatim copy of the Board's Order. Apparently, no opposition to the application was filed. On August 23, 1976, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit entered the judgment proposed by Board counsel.[2]

On February 17, 1977, the Regional Director issued a document entitled "Backpay Specifications and Notice of Hearing" bearing all three Board docket numbers, and naming in the caption Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence." The document recited that a Board Order had been issued against Custom "et al.," and that the court of appeals had "enforced in full the backpay provisions of the Board's Order." The document contained certain allegations regarding the amount due from "Respondent," including allegations regarding the amount owed to each discriminatee and to the Union's pension and welfare fund. The total amount claimed was $35,791.90, plus interest. So far as relevant here, the affidavit of service states that the "Backpay Specifications" was served solely on "Custom Manufacturing Company c/o Frank Florence & Roberta Florence," and on a member of the law firm Goodman and Goodman, Ltd. By letter dated February 18, 1977, which recited the docket numbers of all three cases, this law firm advised the Regional Director that it did not represent "the Respondent." By telegram dated March 18, 1977, counsel for the General Counsel advised Frank and Roberta Florence that an answer to the backpay specifications had been due on March 8, 1977, and that failure to file an answer immediately would necessitate the filing of a Motion for Summary Judgment.[3] By letter dated March 22, 1977, to "Frank Florence & Roberta Florence/Frank Florence & Associates . . . Dear Mr. & Mrs. Florence," Carl Tominberg, counsel for the General Counsel, stated:

> . . . your answer to the Backpay Specification was due on March 8, 1977. Unless you file your Answer immediately I will be forced to move for Summary Judgment. To the extent that your Answer fails to deny the allegations of the Backpay Specification . . . you shall be precluded from introducing any evidence [controverting such allegations.]

No response to the backpay specifications was filed. On April 6, 1977, Tominberg filed with the Board a "Motion To Transfer Proceedings to the Board and Motion for Summary Judgment." The caption of the motion named Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence." The body of the motion requested summary judgment, for failure to file an answer to the backpay specifications, against Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence." So far as relevant here, the affidavit of service with respect to this motion named only "Custom Manufacturing Company c/o Frank Florence and Roberta Florence." On April 20, 1977, under the same caption and with the same docket numbers as those set forth in the motion, the Board transferred the proceedings to itself and directed that cause be shown before May 4, 1977, why the Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. So far as relevant here, the affidavit of service states that the show-cause notice was mailed by registered mail to "Custom Manufacturing Company c/o Frank Florence and Roberta Florence" only and by regular mail to Bobbe and Concepts in Drapery.

[2] Thereafter, the clerk of the court returned the original appeal record to the Board. The clerk's covering letter, dated February 25, 1977, states that the title of the cause is "National Labor Relations Board, Petitioner, Custom Manufacturing Company, etc., et al., Respondents."

[3] The copy of this telegram in the Board's formal file in Washington, D.C., is almost illegible. My description is based mostly on the description in the Board's 1977 Supplemental Decision and Order herein (230 NLRB 691) and on the description in the General Counsel's April 1977 Motion for Summary Judgment. The Board's Decision states that the General Counsel "telegraphically advised Respondent's agents, Frank and Roberta Florence."

No response was filed to the April 20, 1977, show-cause notice. On July 7, 1977, the Board issued a Supplemental Decision under the same caption and with the same docket numbers as those in the April 6, 1977, motion. 230 NLRB 691. The Decision stated, inter alia, that the Board's October 1975 Order had directed that Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence, herein called the Respondents, make whole certain employees and the [Union's] pension and insurance fund." In view of the absence of any response to the General Counsel's motion and the Board's show-cause notice, the Board found the allegations of the backpay specifications to be true.[4] The Board's ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment states, inter alia, that the Board "orders the payment [of the amounts set forth in the Specifications as net backpay and as payments due and owing to the contractual pension plan] jointly and severally by Respondents." The Order itself states, in part:

> [T]he National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondents, Custom . . . Bobbe . . . Concepts in Drapery . . . and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence, make whole the discriminatees named below, by payment to them of the amount following their names and by payment to the [union] pension plan . . . the amount following its name.

So far as relevant here, the affidavit of service of this Supplemental Decision and Order recites that copies were served on Custom "c/o Frank Florence & Roberta Florence," Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery.

On March 19, 1979, Deputy Associate General Counsel Moore filed on behalf of the Board an application to the Seventh Circuit for a supplemental judgment enforcing the Board's July 1977 Order. The caption named as "Respondents" Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence." The application stated that the 1977 Board Order had been issued against "Respondents, Custom . . . Bobbe . . . Concepts in Drapery . . . and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence." Further, the application stated that the Board had ordered "Respondents, Custom . . . Bobbe . . . Concepts in Drapery . . . and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence" to make whole the discriminatees by payment to them of "the amount following their names and by payment to the [Union] pension plan . . . the amount following its name." Also, the application alleged that "the Respondents" had committed unfair labor practices. The application requested a supplemental judgment summarily enforcing the Board's 1977 Order, and requiring "Respondents, Custom . . . Bobbe . . . Concepts in Drapery . . . and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence" to comply therewith. So far as relevant here, the certificate of service with respect to this application recites service on the law firm Dorfman, DeKoven, Cohen, and Laner (described in the certificate of service as counsel for "Respondents"); Custom "c/o Frank Florence & Roberta Florence," Bobbe; and Concepts in Drapery. On April 20, 1979, the Seventh Circuit entered a "Supplemental Judgment Enforcing a Supplemental Order of the National Labor Relations Board." This judgment, in the form requested by Board counsel, named in the caption "Custom . . . Bobbe . . . [Concepts] in Drapery . . . and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence, Respondents"; and required "Respondents, Custom . . . Bobbe . . . Concepts in Drapery . . . and their agents Frank Florence and Roberta Florence [to] make whole the discriminatees named below, by payment to them of the amount following their names and by payment to the [union] pension plan . . . the amount following its name."

II. THE INSTANT PROCEEDING

A. Jurisdiction; Matters Established by the Pleadings

On May 16, 1980, the Acting Regional Director issued the backpay specification and notice of hearing which gave rise to the proceeding before me. The specification alleged, inter alia, that Interior was an alter ego of Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery and was obligated to pay to the employees and the Union funds the sums specified in the Board's July 1977 Order and the Court's 1979 judgment. On June 2, 1980, Attorneys Richard L. Marcus and Irving M. Geslewitz, on Interior's behalf, filed a motion to dismiss the May 1980 backpay specification for lack of jurisdiction.[5] Interior asserted that the Court's April 1979 judgment was final and did not remand the proceedings to the Board, and that the Board had failed, before issuing the May 1980 backpay specification, to apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence that Interior was an alter ego of the other three corporations. Further, the motion asserted that the Board's Rules and Regulations do not provide for a proceeding of the nature described in the May 1980 backpay specification. On July 31, 1980, this motion was denied by Administrative Law Judge William A. Gershuny on the authority of N.L.R.B. v. C.C.C. Associates, Inc., 306 F.2d 534 (2d Cir. 1962). See also Coast Delivery Service, Inc., 198 NLRB 1026 (1972).

[4] In the form signed by the Board members, the Supplemental Decision states, inter alia, that "Respondents [sic] counsel's law firm advised that it no longer represented the Respondents." (As printed in the Board's bound reports, the first word in the quoted material is Respondents'.") The letter in fact referred to "the Respondent."

[5] The face of this May 1980 backpay specification indicates that efforts were made to serve, inter alia, Concepts in Drapery, Custom, and Bobbe "c/o" the Florences, and the Florences individually. None of these was named in the certificates of service filed by Interior's counsel in connection with his motion and reply memorandum.

The caption of the May 1980 backpay specification set forth the docket number of all three cases and named Custom; Bobbe; Concepts in Drapery; "and their agents Frank and Roberta Florence"; and "Interior Concepts, Inc., and its agents Terry Sterling, Frank and Roberta Florence." The backpay specification alleged, inter alia, that in October 1975 the Board had ordered "Custom, Bobbe, Concepts [in Drapery], their agents Frank and Roberta Florence, and successors and assigns" to pay into the pension plan and the insurance plan all due and owing payments, and to make whole employees who had been discharged from the Zion, Illinois, facility for any losses they incurred as a result of "Respondent's" discrimination against them. The backpay specification further alleged that the Board's July 1977 Supplemental Decision and Order ordered "Respondents Custom, Bobbe, Concepts [in Drapery] and their agents Frank and Roberta Florence" to make payments totalling $35,791.90, plus interest to 10 named employees and the Union's insurance and pension funds "for Respondents [sic] violations" of the Act. In addition, the backpay specification alleged that Bobbe and Concepts in Drapery were successive alter egos of Custom, and that "[T]he Florences by Roberta Florence and/or by Frank Florence have been, at all times material herein, shareholders of 50 percent or more of the stock in Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts [in Drapery], and, at all times material herein, were controlling owners or the owner of Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts [in Drapery]." Attorney Geslewitz filed an answer to the backpay specification as Interior's attorney, in which answer he admitted all the allegations set forth in this paragraph except the alter ego allegations.[6] At the hearing before me, Attorney Geslewitz appeared on behalf of Interior and on behalf of the Florences in their capacity as its agents. Geslewitz then admitted the alter ego allegations set forth in this paragraph.

B. The Businesses Operated by Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, and Interior

1. Custom

Custom was organized in 1967 and incorporated in 1969, several years before the marriage of Frank and Roberta Florence. Initially, Frank Florence owned all of Custom's stock. In 1972, one Ben Rubin bought 50 percent of Custom's shares. Until 1973, Custom was located on Western Avenue in Chicago, Illinois. During this period, Custom was a profitable operation. In July 1973, Custom leased, and moved its entire operations to, a Zion, Illinois, plant previously occupied by the drapery division of Zion Industries, Inc. Custom did not purchase the plant building in Zion, about 25 miles from Chicago, but did purchase Zion Industries' equipment, sewing equipment, inventory, and fixtures. In addition, Custom moved its Chicago equipment to the Zion plant. In order to obtain capital to purchase and operate the business in Zion, Custom borrowed $150,000 from Continental Illinois Bank (Continental). To secure this loan, Continental retained a security interest in all of Custom's assets, including its inventory, fixtures, machinery, and accounts receivable. The loan was personally guaranteed by Rubin, his wife, and Frank Florence.[7]

When operating the plant, Zion Industries had had a collective-bargaining agreement with the International Chemical Workers Union, Local 665 (the Union) covering factory and warehouse employees. Custom hired about 50 of these former Zion Industries employees, recognized the Union, and either assumed the existing collective-bargaining contract or executed a new one. The Board found in the unfair labor practice proceeding that Custom entered into a collective-bargaining agreement effective from July 1, 1974, to June 30, 1976 (220 NLRB at 1257-58). The unopposed February 1977 backpay specification states that in July 1973 "Respondent ceased" making payments into the Union's pension and welfare fund.

Frank Florence was Custom's president and treasurer, and directed Custom's business on a day-to-day basis. In August 1973, Terry Sterling became Custom's salaried controller and office manager, in which capacities he "sat in on most of the labor relations," oversaw the billing and the invoices, had the orders processed, kept track of making payments on payables, made credit information, and organized the office. He was never an officer or shareholder in Custom, and is no kin to the Rubins or the Florences.

Between 85 and 90 percent of Custom's business consisted of manufacturing draperies from its own fabrics to be hung in private residences. The homeowner would select a fabric from a sample on display at Custom's factory or (more often) at a retail store. If the selection was made at a retail store, a salesperson would take down the customer's dimension and fabrication specifications and forward the order to Custom, which would make the draperies and bill the store. Inferentially, the store had to pay Custom whether the homeowner paid the store or not. If the selection was made at Custom's own factory, someone from Custom's office would take down the measurements. Custom would then manufacture the draperies and bill the homeowner directly. On occasion, Custom's employees would also install the draperies. Custom did not sell raw fabric, but on occasion, if a customer wanted a set of draperies and also wanted a few yards of the drapery material to make something else, Custom would include that yardage as part of the sale. About 10 to 15 percent of Custom's business came from Benjamin Brothers, Custom's only nonretail customer. Benjamin Brothers is a hotel furnishing supplier which puts together packages of furniture, fixtures, draperies, and other items which would go into the rooms of a hotel which is being opened up, remodeled, or refurbished. As described in greater detail infra, section II,B,4, the fabric for draperies ordered by Benjamin

[6] The certificate of service attached to this answer names only the union representative.

[7] The Florences were married in 1972. Roberta Florence had received moneys from her former husband, who was killed in an accident, and had to raise three children from that marriage. Frank Florence told Continental that, because of these circumstances, he would not "allow" his wife to sign on the loan. Continental agreed.

Brothers was supplied by it to Custom, which fabricated and installed them.

According to a partly unaudited statement by Custom's accountants, between Custom's commencement of operations in July 1973 and May 31, 1974, Custom lost over $117,000.[8] About June 1974, Continental asked Custom to set up a collateral account into which all accounts receivable moneys were to be directly deposited, to discontinue purchasing any more inventory, and to reduce Custom's receivables and inventory. Custom agreed. Funds were transferred by Continental from this collateral account to cover Custom's payroll and other necessary expenses, but the bulk of the money in this account was retained by Continental to pay Custom's note, mostly the interest. Frank Florence testified that, at the end of June 1974, 50 percent shareholder Rubin, who is no kin to either of the Florences, "skipped out . . . he just took off like a bird . . . I could kill him."

About this same time, Continental said that, because of the amount of money which Custom owed to its landlord, to Zion Industries, and to others, it would be best to continue operating as a newly formed corporation. In July or August 1974, Custom as such went out of business, and all the employees were "let go."[9] On an undisclosed subsequent date, Custom was dissolved as an Illinois corporation.

During the calendar year 1974, Custom lost more than $200,000. During that calendar year, Frank Florence, who devoted his full time to the business, and Rubin, who according to Custom's tax return also did so, received as salaries from Custom $12,287 and $12,000, respectively.

2. Bobbe

The new corporation formed because of Continental's request (and, according to Frank Florence, because "we felt it was maybe a way to start up new business") was Bobbe. Because of Custom's losses and Frank Florence's personal guarantee of Custom's debt to Continental, he had no money and all of Bobbe's capitalization was provided by his wife, Roberta, who incorporated Bobbe and owned all the stock. Roberta Florence was Bobbe's president but took no active role in the business. Frank Florence was Bobbe's vice president and secretary and managed it on a daily basis. Sterling was Bobbe's salaried controller and office manager, in which capacities he performed the same duties, including labor relations duties, which he had performed for Custom. He was never an officer of Bobbe. Bobbe operated from the same plant in Zion as Custom had, and, with Continental's permission, used machinery which had been pledged by Custom but had not yet been sold. Bobbe, like Custom, manufactured and sometimes installed made-to-measure draperies. However, because Bobbe had no money with which to maintain an inventory, Bobbe manufactured draperies from fabric supplied by the customer. Of Bobbe's four suppliers, three had been suppliers of Custom. Although Bobbe had fewer customers than Custom, practically all Bobbe's customers had also been customers of Custom. Among these retained customers was Benjamin Brothers, which represented a substantial part of Bobbe's business. With the Union's "permission," Bobbe recalled on various dates between August 10 and November 2, 1974, about 14 of the approximately 51 unit employees laid off by Custom. Also, Bobbe hired one bargaining unit employee (John Popelka, a warehouse employee) who had not been on Custom's payroll when it shut down; recalled two installers (Trinidad Soria, who is Frank Florence's son-in-law, and Steven Scalf) who had worked for Custom in nonunit jobs; and recalled as a supervisor Mildred Popelka, who had been a supervisor for Custom. The Board in effect found in the unfair labor practice proceeding that Bobbe was bound by the July 1974 collective-bargaining agreement; but the unopposed February 1977 backpay specification alleged that, while Bobbe was in operation, no payments were made into the contractually described pension and welfare funds. As previously noted, the November 1974 charge herein names Custom and complains of the failure to make such payments.

Bobbe's operations lost money. Continental asked the Florences to sell off whatever equipment they could and to move operations from Zion to a smaller space. As proffered reasons for this request, Continental expressed fear that Bobbe's landlord would distrain Custom's equipment, in which Continental had a security interest, for nonpayment of rent, and further said that unnecessary utility expenses were being incurred because the Zion plant was much larger than was needed for the curtailed manufacturing operation. Much of the remaining equipment was sold, and, with Continental's permission, the unsold equipment was moved to a plant on Schubert Avenue in Chicago. In February 1975, Bobbe surrendered its corporate charter to the State of Illinois. During the 6 months Bobbe was in business as such, Frank Florence received $13,605 and Roberta Florence received nothing. Roberta Florence had invested $5,000 in the business, and its losses amounted to about $4,300.

3. Concepts in Drapery

When operations were moved from Zion at Continental's request, a new corporation, Concepts in Drapery, was set up in February 1975 to operate the business while it was located on Schubert Avenue. Roberta Florence furnished all the capital, owned all the stock, was the corporate president, took an active management role, and worked parttime preparing all the invoices and handling all the billing functions. Frank Florence was vice president and secretary or treasurer, ran the factory, and did selling on the telephone. Sterling was the salaried controller and office manager, and performed the same labor relations and other duties he had performed when on Custom's and Bobbe's payrolls. In addition, he helped run the factory and sell off the pledged equipment. He owned no stock in and was not an officer of Concepts in Drapery. Nor did he perform any selling for that corporation. Installers Scalf and Soria, both nonunit personnel, moved from Bobbe's to Concepts in Drapery's payroll, as did Supervisors Mildred Popelka and Ella Stewart and warehouseman John Popelka. This warehouseman was the only unit employee who was moved between these payrolls. In February and March 1975, Concepts in Drapery hired eight factory workers who had never worked in the Zion plant. The Board found in the unfair labor practice case that Section 8(a)(3) and (1) had been violated since February 1, 1975, by the termination of the Zion employees and by the failure and refusal to offer them employment in the facility on Schubert Avenue in Chicago. 220 NLRB at 1258, 1259. The unopposed February 1977 backpay specification alleged that eight named employees (all of whom had been on Custom's payroll and four of whom had been on Bobbe's payroll) would have accepted employment at the Schubert Avenue facility. The Board's judicially enforced backpay order specifies their names and the amounts due them.

[8] Interior's brief attributes Custom's losses "primarily" to the difficulty in training the former Zion employees to operate the automatic equipment brought over to Zion. While Custom did have such difficulties in connection with training employees, the record fails to show the extent to which such training problems contributed to Custom's losses over a period of 10 months.

[9] This was not the termination action found unlawful in the unfair labor practice case. Further, because the amount due to the union funds is based upon hours worked, no part of the required payments into these funds is attributable to the period covered by this 1974 separation.

Concepts in Drapery, like Bobbe, manufactured draperies from the customer's own fabric and sometimes installed them. Practically all of its customers, including Benjamin Brothers (a major customer), had been customers of Custom and/or Bobbe. Most of the suppliers of Concepts in Drapery had also been suppliers of Custom, and all of them had been suppliers of Bobbe.

As previously noted, in April 1975 the Regional Director issued complaints against Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents" the Florences, alleging, inter alia, that employees at the Zion plant had been unlawfully terminated and that economic provisions in a collective-bargaining agreement had been unlawfully dishonored. On July 8, 1975, these complaints were sustained by the Board, which ordered that the laid-off employees and the pension and insurance plans be made whole. By letter dated July 17, 1975, to Custom "c/o Concepts, Inc.," Continental formally demanded payment in full of all of Custom's remaining obligations to Continental. The amount owed consisted of more than $110,000, plus interest. After receiving this demand letter, Concepts in Drapery's management proceeded to finish off, deliver, and install orders which were in process. On August 1, 1975, manufacturing operations were discontinued, and on or before August 4 all bargaining unit employees were permanently laid off. The unopposed February 1977 backpay specification sets forth the August 1 date as the date when amounts due as backpay and as payments into the pension and welfare funds ceased to accrue. However, after August 1, installers Scalf and Soria remained on the payroll; they installed draperies which had been manufactured by Concepts in Drapery, corrected some errors in installation, and did some repair work. Sterling and the Florences tried to collect all of Concepts in Drapery's remaining receivables, out of which they and the installers received their salaries, and also tried to collect Custom's remaining receivables. The remaining equipment was sold on or before August 4, 1975, and the proceeds were remitted to Continental via the collateral account. By October 1975, all of Custom's collectible accounts receivable were collected, and the amounts so collected were so remitted to Continental. After that time, no payments were made to Continental on the outstanding debt, which as of August 1975 totalled about $110,000, including interest. The orders which remained unfilled when Concepts in Drapery stopped manufacturing were given to Drapemaster, a competitor, which billed the customers directly and paid Concepts in Drapery nothing for the business.[10]

Concepts in Drapery never made any profits. After its February 1975 formation, Frank Florence received from it a total of $9,000 and Roberta Florence received from it a total of about $3,000.

4. Interior

It is unclear from the record whether the corporate charter of Concepts in Drapery ever actually lapsed. On August 19, 1975 (2 months after the withdrawal of the answer to the unfair labor practice complaint against Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, "and their agents" the Florences and 18 days after Concepts in Drapery ceased manufacturing operations), the Illinois secretary of state, at Frank Florence's request, issued a corporate charter to Interior. The articles of incorporation do not state that the corporation's purposes include any kind of manufacturing, but do state that such purposes include, "To sell and supply, at wholesale or retail, all kinds and descriptions of material, fabrics and all other related products incidental to the decorating of hotels, motels, residential properties, commercial and office properties."

The Florences, Sterling, and installers Soria and Scalf remained on Concepts in Drapery's payroll until the end of its last payroll period, December 29, 1975, on which date they were the only persons still working for that corporation. Interior's first payroll period did not begin until January 4, 1976, on which date its entire work force consisted solely of the five persons who had been on the payroll of Concepts in Drapery until the end of December 1975.[11] Moreover, Interior's acquisition of a lease at its first location, on Peterson Avenue in Chicago, did not take place until sometime in January 1976.

However, before January 1976, Concepts in Drapery personnel who were still on that corporation's payroll solicited orders and performed work for Interior. Thus, Frank Florence, who appeared to be in his fifties, testified that the only thing he had ever done in his life was to manufacture or sell draperies; that, with the early August 1975 sale of the last of Custom's pledged machinery, he knew that he would have no equipment to manufacture draperies; that by the time Interior was incorporated in mid-August, he knew it was going to be a selling company in the drapery business; that obtaining the kind of business handled by Interior takes about 6 to 8 months; and that he and Sterling began looking for such business "probably [in] September, October, November." In addition, Interior's records reflect that Benjamin Brothers was billed on December 3, 1975, for certain services, and that, ordinarily, this customer would not be billed until after the services were performed.[12] Also, Interior's records show that Slater Company, an office supply company, was billed for various amounts on December 4 and 9, 1975, and on January 7 and 13, 1976; and that it would have been billed before services were performed.[13] Further, Interior's records disclose two additional orders, billed respectively on November 3, and December 3, 1975, for customers who would ordinarily have been billed before services were performed. These were Interior's only orders billed before January 1976. However, Frank Florence testified that in late 1975 he "probably" solicited orders for Interior from some prospective customers who did not order anything. Furthermore, Frank Florence testified, and Interior's brief states (pp. 12–13), that by October 1975 all of Custom's collectible accounts receivable had been collected. Also, Frank Florence testified that the process of winding down the orders received by Concepts in Drapery was "pretty well finished by October" 1975. In view of the foregoing testimony by Frank Florence and the largely documentary evidence regarding Interior's billings between early November 1975 and early January 1976, and for demeanor reasons, I do not accept Frank Florence's testimony that in November and December 1975 Sterling and the Florences were "basically" collecting receivables for Custom and Concepts in Drapery, or Sterling's testimony that, from the time Concepts in Drapery ceased production until the end of 1975, Frank Florence simply collected all the remaining accounts receivable. For similar reasons, I do not accept Sterling's testimony that, for 5 to 6 months before Interior was started up, "pretty much" all his working time was taken up by collecting receivables; taking down, moving, and setting up the equipment which had been sold; doing "paper work"; and packing and moving records.[14] Rather, I find that at least by early October, while still on the payroll of Concepts in Drapery, Sterling (who admittedly did selling for Interior) and Frank Florence were spending a substantial amount of time in soliciting business for Interior.

[10] Frank Florence and Sterling testified that they wanted to arrange for the satisfactory completion and installation of all draperies on order, partly to avoid being sued and partly to make sure of collecting the full amounts due from customers to whom only partial deliveries had been made before Continental's demand and the cessation of manufacturing operations.

[11] These two installers continued to work for Interior until July 1980, a month or two after the issuance of the instant May 1980 backpay specification. Thereafter, they began to work for a firm called Complete Drapery Service, which Frank Florence testimonially described as "the new company." The record contains no other information about Complete Drapery Service.

At the time of Interior's incorporation, Roberta Florence owned 75 percent of Interior's stock and Sterling owned 25 percent. Thereafter, Sterling annually acquired from Roberta Florence 6 percent of the outstanding stock; at this rate, Sterling would not have acquired a controlling interest in the corporation until 1981, and would not have acquired all the stock until about 1989. In June 1980, after the issuance of the instant backpay specification seeking to render Interior liable for the more than $35,000 in question, Sterling purchased all of Roberta Florence's remaining stock, which was thereupon put in escrow for her inferentially until Sterling paid for it. Also in June 1980, Frank and Roberta Florence withdrew from their corporate offices as Interior's treasurer (possibly) and vice president, respectively. Sterling has at all times been president of Interior, and also performs selling functions for it. As president, he takes care of all credit arrangements for jobs, checks the contracts, verifies estimates, makes collections, and makes sure the job orders are processed to the salesmen. Frank Florence has at all times worked for Interior as a salesman. His 1976 salary was $26,000, substantially more than he had received during his last year on Custom's payroll or when he was on the payroll of Bobbe or Concepts in Drapery. By the end of 1979, Frank Florence was being paid at the rate of $44,800 a year (the same rate as Sterling) and Roberta Florence, who took no management role in Interior but has at all times worked in Interior's office, was being paid at the rate of $12,600 a year. As of November 1980, Interior's sales averaged $150,000 a month.

Interior has never manufactured draperies or any other product, employs no production or maintenance employees, and has never had any factory or workshop area nor any space for establishing such an area. The only machinery owned by Interior is office machinery and its only nonmanagerial personnel are salespersons, office workers, and installers. Interior is a contractor and subcontractor which receives orders from various commercial enterprises and fills such orders by obtaining products manufactured by others. As of the November 1980 hearing, about 30 percent of Interior's total volume consisted of the sale and installation of draperies and an additional 30 percent consisted of the sale and (inferentially) installation of what Interior President Sterling described as "related products"—that is, such products as blinds, shades, and woven woods. As of that date, the remaining 40 percent of Interior's volume consisted of building specialty products—for example, washroom equipment sold to general contractors; projection screens sold to schools and audio visual areas; grab bars and "I.V." and cubicle tracks sold to hospitals; and ashtray urns, medicine cabinets, and mailboxes sold to the construction industry. In addition, Interior sells to some of its customers, at a profit, raw fabric which Interior has purchased from other firms. Advertising distributed by Interior to its customers does not name any manufacturers or suppliers of draperies, but does name the manufacturers or suppliers of a number of building specialty products available through Interior. Where the products ordered from Interior consist of draperies, Interior customarily measures the job; orders the drapery rods; selects a fabric and a fabric supplier; orders the desired fabric sent to a drapery fabricator, which fabricates the draperies; schedules the installation; takes the rods and draperies out to the jobsite; and installs them. Interior's profit is obtained from putting this "package" together. Sterling testified that the number of draperies specified on a single order handled by Interior is much larger than the number specified on a single order filled by Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery; an Interior order might call for 150 or 200 pairs of draperies all the same size, while a single order filled by Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery would amount to draperies for a single private home or a single room in such a home. As to the number of draperies called for by an order handled by the old corporations, Sterling did not specifically except Benjamin Brothers; but, because Benjamin Brothers is a hotel supply firm, I infer that at least on occasion it ordered many more draperies than would be specified on an order proceeding from a homeowner.

[12] The first page of Interior's accounts receivable ledger for Benjamin Brothers sets forth amounts due from Benjamin Brothers to Concepts in Drapery for September and October 1975 billings.

[13] Sterling testified that Interior stopped doing business with Slater because of credit problems, and eventually wrote off what Slater still owedas a bad debt. The ledger shows that Interior obtained business from Slater between early December 1975 and August 1977, during which period Slater paid Interior about $19,730. The bad debt, written off in February 1978, amounted to about $448.

[14] The records of Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery were stored on Interior's premises.

Whereas the customers of Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery were mainly large department stores and other retail outlets, Interior's customers are largely commercial and institutional users, such as construction companies, office buildings, hospitals, universities, and government agencies. Of Interior's approximately 74 customers (about 25 of which it acquired before July 1976), only one, Benjamin Brothers, had been a customer of Custom, Bobbe, or Concepts in Drapery. As of November 1980, Benjamin Brothers provided Interior with 10 percent of Interior's business. When doing business with Custom (which ordinarily manufactured draperies from its own fabrics) as well as Bobbe and Concepts in Drapery (both of which always manufactured draperies from fabric supplied by the customer), Benjamin Brothers had provided the material for the draperies. When doing business with Benjamin Brothers, Custom, Bobbe, or Concepts in Drapery would measure the windows, determine whether new rods were required, and advise Benjamin Brothers of the yardage requirements. Then Benjamin Brothers would order the material and send it to Custom, Bobbe, or Concepts in Drapery for fabrication and installation. When doing business with Interior, whose business with Benjamin Brothers as of November 1980 had been limited to draperies, Benjamin Brothers orders the material (at least sometimes from the source recommended by Interior) and sends it to a fabricator (usually and perhaps always the fabricator recommended by Interior), which fabricator bills Benjamin Brothers directly for fabrication. Interior's responsibility is to make sure that the job is completed and acceptable to Benjamin Brothers' hotel customer. Interior's responsibilities include the installation of the draperies, which had also been done by Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery when they did business with Benjamin Brothers.

Of Interior's approximately 59 suppliers, about 6, including Benjamin Brothers, had been suppliers for Custom, Bobbe, and/or Concepts in Drapery. Kirsch, one of these six, is one of the largest curtain rod manufacturers in the country, and the kinds of curtain rods purchased from it by Interior are different from the kinds purchased from it by Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery. Draperies purchased by Interior are made of materials which meet commercial code fire retardance standards; whereas draperies manufactured by Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery were made of decorative materials. Four of Interior's suppliers had been competitors of Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery; one of these former competitors was Drapemaster, to which Concepts in Drapery had transferred some of its orders without cost.

No assets were ever transferred from Custom, Bobbe, or Concepts in Drapery to Interior or the Florences.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

"To determine whether one legal entity is the alter ego of another, the Board looks to the ownership, management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision of the two businesses. Where some of these listed indicia are 'substantially identical,' the Board will find an alter ego status. However, not all of these standards have to be satisfied; centralized control of labor relations or identical corporate ownership is not crucial to the finding of an alter ego." Blake Construction Co., Inc./M & S Building Supplies, Inc., 245 NLRB 630, 634 (1979). See also, Crawford Door Sales Co., Inc., and Cordes Door Company, Inc., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976); N.L.R.B. v. Tricor Products, Inc. and/or C & J Pattern Co., 636 F.2d 266 (10th Cir. 1980).

The Board has held that a finding of alter ego status requires the presence of substantially identical ownership between the enterprises in question. Clinton Foods, Inc., d/b/a Morton's I.G.A. Foodliner, 240 NLRB 1246, fn. 2 (1979), affd. in this respect 663 F.2d 223 (D.C. Cir. 1980). I agree with the General Counsel that this ownership criterion is met here. Thus, at the time Interior began operations in January 1976, 75 percent of its stock was owned by Roberta Florence, who owned all of the stock of Bobbe and Concepts in Drapery and whose husband owned half of Custom's stock. Interior does not appear to dispute that it met the "substantially identical ownership" criterion as of January 1976. Blake Construction, supra; Crawford, supra; Sturdevant Sheet Metal & Roofing Co., Inc., et al., 238 NLRB 186, 187-188 (1978). Interior does contend that the effect of Roberta Florence's stock ownership on Interior's status with respect to the other three corporations has been nullified by Sterling's purchase, after Interior received the instant May 1980 backpay specification seeking to hold it answerable for the sums owed by the old corporations, of all the stock still owned by her. Further, Interior points out that even before this purchase, Sterling already owned 44 percent of Interior's stock. However, assuming that when it began operations Interior was answerable for the backpay and union fund payments which were owed by the old corporations and which had been tolled before Interior's incorporation, Interior would not be absolved of liability because of subsequent changes in the identity of its stockholders. Gateway Service Co., 209 NLRB 1166 (1974); Topinka's Country House, Inc., 235 NLRB 72, 73-74 (1978); Miller Trucking Service, Inc., and/or Miller Trucking Service, Inc., a Subsidiary of Tulsa Crude Oil Purchasing Company, 176 NLRB 556 (1969), approved in this respect 445 F.2d 927, 930 (10th Cir. 1971). Moreover, if Sterling fails to pay for the stock, its ownership will revert to Roberta Florence.

Furthermore, there has been substantial identity of management in the four corporations. Frank Florence was an officer in Custom, Bobbe, Concepts in Drapery, and (for a period which ended after the 1980 issuance of the instant backpay specification) Interior. He managed the first three corporations on a day-to-day basis; performed selling functions for all four corporations;[15] incorporated Interior; and, by the end of 1979, was receiving the same salary from Interior as did Interior President Sterling. Moreover, when serving as salaried controller and office manager for Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery, Sterling had duties which included sitting in on most of the labor relations, overseeing the billing, having orders processed, keeping track of making payments on payables, collecting receivables, making credit collection information, and organizing the office. While it is true that he performed selling functions for Interior but had not done so for Concepts in Drapery or (so far as the record shows) the other two corporations, the record directly shows that as Interior's president he continues to make collections and takes care of all credit arrangements for jobs; and I infer that as Interior's president he continues to perform or supervise at least some of the other functions he previously performed as the other corporations' controller and office manager.

Furthermore, Sterling and Frank Florence solicited and obtained business for Interior while they were still on the payroll of Concepts in Drapery and before Interior formally began operations. Also, one of Interior's first customers was Benjamin Brothers, which had been a customer of Custom and a major customer of Bobbe and Concepts in Drapery, and to which Interior provided substantially the same services (except fabrication) which Benjamin Brothers had received from the other three corporations. In addition, Roberta Florence handled all the billing functions for Concepts in Drapery and then for Interior. Moreover, the Florences, Sterling, and the two installers, who constituted the entire final payroll of Concepts in Drapery, were transferred to Interior's payroll without any break in their employment.

However, countervailing considerations lead me to conclude that the record fails preponderantly to show that Interior occupies alter ego status with respect to the other three corporations. Thus, the evidence fails to show that Interior was set up for a purpose of evading the labor law responsibilities of Custom, Bobbe, and Concepts in Drapery.[16] Further, there was no transfer of assets from Concepts in Drapery to Interior.[17] Also, Interior has never employed any production employees, the kind of employees with respect to whom the other three corporations' unfair labor practices were committed. Moreover, Interior's facilities are much smaller than and have a location different from those of the other corporations. In addition, except for Benjamin Brothers, Interior's customers are all different from the other three corporations' customers and are all in different kinds of businesses; and most of Interior's suppliers are different from the suppliers of the other three corporations and many are in different kinds of businesses. Finally, while the principal business of the other three corporations was the manufacture of draperies to be used in private residences (which business included their sale and installation), Interior's business consists of the sale to institutions and commercial establishments of products manufactured by others, with about 30 percent of its volume consisting of the sale and installation of draperies and about 30 percent consisting of the sale and installation of related products. Cf. Co-Op Trucking Co., Inc., and C & E Warehouse, Inc., and S & S Trucking Co., a Partnership, 209 NLRB 289, 830–831 (1974).

The General Counsel's able brief seeks to minimize the significance of the differences between Interior's business and the business of the other three corporations on the ground that Interior "is today the business enterprise that Custom would have become if there had been no technical changes in corporate form . . . the change from Concepts [in Drapery] as a seller of labor to Interior as a broker of other companies' materials was . . . dictated by Continental Bank's demands . . . resulting in the sale of all the remaining manufacturing equipment. All that Concepts [in Drapery] had left went to Interior—business knowledge, expertise in the drapery products field, an important customer—Benjamin Brothers—to begin in the commercial area of the drapery products field, and a few months of time and payroll to begin development of this new aspect of the drapery business. The changes in business operations that . . . finally resulted in Interior's business operations would have occurred regardless of any changes in corporate form and could have been handled within the corporate framework of Custom, Bobbe, or Concepts" in Drapery.[18] However, almost any small corporate owner who has lost all his assets in a prior unfortunate corporate venture will seek to improve his economic future by taking advantage of his previously acquired expertise and business contacts and of any time left over from winding down the affairs of his failed business. In the circumstances of this case, I conclude that such activities by Frank Florence did not render Interior an alter ego of the other three corporations. The cases cited by the General Counsel in this connection do not call for a different result. In Southeastern Envelope Co., Inc., 246 NLRB 423, 425-428 (1979), a large part of the new corporation's work consisted of manufacturing the same product in the same way for the same customer as the old corporation. In Watson Meat Co., d/b/a Ideal Meat Co., Inc., 234 NLRB 1115 (1978), both corporations boned meat, although the old corporation owned the meat and also made sausage, whereas the new corporation boned meat owned by its customers.[19] In Rushton & Mercier Woodworking Co., Inc., and Rand & Co., Inc., 203 NLRB 123 (1973), enfd. 502 F.2d 1160 (1st Cir. 1974), cert. denied 419 U.S. 996 (1974), both corporations manufactured the same products, although the old corporation manufactured on a volume basis and the new corporation manufactured custom orders. The Board's and the court's opinions do not reveal the exact nature of the "changes, additions, expenditures, task-adaptations, etc. which came to exist in N.L.R.B. v. Ozark Hardwood Co., 282 F.2d 1, 6 (8th Cir. 1960). However, I do not believe that the differences between Interior and the other corporations can be fairly described, in the court's words, as "essentially . . . evolutions, extensions and developments merely, such as could characteristically be expected to occur in the particular business field and in the economic era involved, without having so changed the nature of the enterprise and its job situations as to cause it to be outside the bounds of legitimate remedial area in respect to the discriminatees."[20] [15] The record directly shows this for Concepts in Drapery and Interior only. However, from his testimony in this connection and the probabilities of the situation, I infer that he also performed at least some selling functions for Custom and Bobbe.

[16] However, I do not agree with Interior that such a showing is essential to an alter ego finding. Howard Johnson Co., Inc. v. Detroit Local Joint Executive Board, Hotel & Restaurant Employees & Bartenders International Union, AFL–CIO, 417 U.S. 249, 259, fn. 5 (alter ego cases involve "a mere technical change in the structure or identity of the employing entity, frequently to avoid the effect of the labor laws, without any substantial change in its ownership or management"; (emphasis supplied)); Tricor, supra at 270. I need not and do not determine whether the issuance of the 1980 backpay specification, more than 3 years after Interior's incorporation, motivated the Florences' resignation from their corporate offices and the agreement for immediate sale to Sterling of Roberta Florence's stock. None of the parties to these transactions testified to the reasons therefor.

[17] However, I do not agree with Interior that such a transfer is essential to an alter ego status. See, e.g., Dee Cee Floor Covering, Inc., et al., 232 NLRB 421, 426 (1977); Marquis Printing Corporation and Mutual Lithograph Company, 213 NLRB 394, 401 (1974). If such a transfer were necessary, it is difficult to see why Interior admitted that Bobbe and Concepts in Drapery occupied alter ego status with respect to each other and Custom.

[18] Bobbe returned its corporate charter to the State about 6 months before Interior's incorporation, and Custom's formal dissolution may also have occurred before Interior's incorporation. Further, the record fails to show whether the kind of business engaged in by Interior was wholly within the scope of any of the other three corporations' corporate charters.

If eventually affirmed, my conclusion that Interior is not the alter ego of the other three corporations means that the Union and the unlawfully discharged employees will as a practical matter be unable to collect anything from any of them.[21] At the outset of the hearing, I suggested that the Board Orders and Court judgments previously issued in these cases might render the Florences personally liable for the required payments. Arly W. Eggertsen, counsel for the General Counsel, replied negatively. While counsel is an able attorney, I am doubtful whether his assertions in this respect would preclude the Board and the court from otherwise interpreting their own Orders and judgments, respectively. For reasons which are unclear to me, Attorney Geslewitz has chosen in his brief to urge that the Florences are not personally liable.[22] It is true that corporate officers and agents are not ordinarily liable for backpay or other monetary remedies. However, under some circumstances they are so liable. See, e.g., Wayne Electric, Inc.; and Electrical Installation and Service, 241 NLRB 1056 (1979), and cases therein cited. Further, at least if the 1975-1979 Orders and judgments unambiguously impose monetary liability on the Florences personally, such a requirement could not be negated by any failure of the 1980 record to show such liability. The 1980 record fails to show that no monetary orders and judgments should have been entered against the Florences; and, in any event, at this point in the proceedings even such a showing might do the Florences no good. See Wayne Electric, supra. I express no views as to whether the prior orders and judgments do impose monetary liability on the Florences personally.[23] I have referred to the issue, and have set forth procedural facts which I regard as possibly relevant to its disposition, only because the Board's interpretation of its own Orders might speed up the final disposition of this 6-year-old proceeding.

Conclusions of Law

Interior Concepts, Inc., is not the alter ego of Custom Manufacturing Company (Successor to Zion Industries, Inc.—Curtain and Drapery Division); Bobbe Drapery Products Co., Inc.; or Concepts in Drapery Design, Inc.

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

---

[19] This change is remarkably similar to the change between Custom's operations and those of its admitted alter egos Bobbe and Concepts in Drapery. Custom manufactured draperies primarily from its own materials, whereas the other two corporctions manufactured draperies from customers' materials.

[20] However, as previously noted, the backpay period terminated with the cessation (not claimed to be unlawful) of manufacturing operations and before Interior's incorporation. No contention is made that Interior should be required to offer reinstatement to the discriminatees or to bargain with the Union.

[21] In any event, a finding that Interior is an alter ego to Custom might render Interior liable for Custom's debt to Continental, a sum which likely exceeds the sums due under the Board's Order.

[22] Geslewitz appeared on behalf of Interior and Sterling and the Florences as Interior's agents. A determination that the Florences are personally liable could not be adverse to Interior's interests, and, indeed, might well benefit Interior if it were found liable for the amounts in question.

[23] As a practical matter, any such liability would probablv have to be discharged by Roberta Florence. See fn. 7 and attached text supra.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On March 27, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Howard Edelman issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondents Consolidated Dress Carriers, Inc., Greenberg's Express Inc., GRG Delivery Inc., Clothing Carriers Corp., A Dynamic Delivery Corp., and JHT Leasing Corp., herein collectively denominated Respondents, filed exceptions and a supporting brief. Respondent Trucking Personnel, Inc., herein denominated Respondent Trucking, filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief, as did the Charging Party.[1] Both Respondents and the Party in Interest, Cloak & Dress Drivers & Helpers Union, Local 102, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, AFL-CIO, filed answering briefs to the Charging Party's cross-exceptions. Finally, the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondents, Consolidated Dress Carriers, Inc., Greenberg's Express Inc., GRG Delivery Inc., Clothing Carriers Corp., Dynamic Delivery Corp., JHT Leasing Corp., and Trucking Personnel, Inc., New York, New York, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HOWARD EDELMAN, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me on April 29 through May 1, June 10, 11, 12, 17, and September 9, 1980.

On August 29, 1978, complaint issued in Case 2-CA-15783 upon charges filed by Local 20408, United Warehouse, Industrial and Affiliated Trades Employees Union, herein called Local 20408. The complaint was amended on January 11, April 7 and May 7, 1980, during the course of the hearing herein. The thrust of the complaint alleges that Consolidated Dress Carriers, Inc., Greenberg's Express Inc., GRG Delivery Inc., and Clothing Carriers Corp., collectively called Respondent or Respondent corporations, violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by refusing to reinstate striking employees following their unconditional offers to return to their former positions of employment because said employees joined Local 20408 and participated in a strike on behalf of Local 20408 and because said employees sought assistance from Cloak & Dress Drivers & Helpers Union, Local 102, International Ladies Garment Workers' Union, AFL-CIO, herein called Local 102.

Briefs were filed by counsel for General Counsel and counsel for Respondent. Additionally, counsel for Respondent filed a reply brief. Upon consideration of the entire record, the briefs, and my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material herein, Consolidated Dress Carriers, Inc., Greenberg's Express Inc., GRG Delivery Inc., Clothing Carriers Corp., and Dynamic Delivery Corp., herein called Respondent Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic, respectively, have maintained their principal office and place of business in New York, New York, and have been, at all times material herein, engaged in providing trucking and related services in the garment industry.

At all times material herein, Respondents Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 for trucking services performed directly outside the State of New York.

At all times material herein, Respondent JHT, a New York corporation, has maintained its principal office and place of business in New York, New York, and has been, at all times material herein, engaged in the business of leasing and servicing trucks to Respondents Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic.

At all times material herein, Respondent JHT annually, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased goods and materials valued at in excess of $50,000, or performed services for employers who derive income exceeding $50,000 directly from outside the State of New York.

At all times material herein, Trucking Personnel, Inc., herein called Respondent Trucking, a New York corporation, has maintained its principal office and place of business in New York, New York, and has been, at all times material herein, engaged in the business of providing and performing labor services and related services.

At all times material herein, Respondent Trucking, annually in the course and conduct of its business operations described above, derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 for services performed directly outside the State of New York.

Respondents Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, Dynamic, JHT, and Trucking[1] admit and I find that each of them are and have been at all times material herein employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

Local 20408, is an organization in which employees participate, and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work. The evidence established that in July 1978 Local 20408 had collective-bargaining agreements with various employers covering approximately 200 employees. These agreements contained inter alia, provisions relating to wages, health benefits, pensions, grievance procedures, job classifications, etc. Additionally, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Certification of Representation to Local 20408 on at least four separate occasions, e.g., John F. Boyle Company, 222 NLRB 1309 (1976).[2]

I find Local 20408 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

Respondent admits and I find that Local 102 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

---

[1] On May 1, 1980, General Counsel moved to amend the complaint to include as additional Respondents, Greenberg's Express Inc., GRG Delivery Inc., Clothing Carriers Corp., Dynamic Delivery Corp., and JHT Leasing Corp. The amendment alleged that the above-named Respondents, including Consolidated Dress Carriers, Inc., and Trucking Personnel, Inc., were at all times material herein, a single and/or joint employer. On May 7, 1980, I issued an order granting General Counsel's motion to amend the complaint. Said order was appealed to the Board by Respondent Consolidated on May 28, 1980. The appeal was denied by the Board on June 2, 1980.

[2] Respondent, in its answer and throughout the course of the hearing herein, denied the labor organization status of Local 20408. Respondent in its reply brief admits the labor organization status of Local 20408.

A. Whether Respondents Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, Dynamic, JHT, and Trucking Constitute a Single or Joint Employer

At all times material herein and up through July 27, 1978, Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic were engaged in providing trucking services in the garment industry. JHT was engaged solely in the business of leasing trucks and related trucking equipment to Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing and Dynamic. Trucking was engaged primarily in providing handlers or laborers and helpers to Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic.[3] Trucking supplied well over 90 percent of all handlers, laborers, and helpers utilized by Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic. Over 85 percent of Trucking's total business during 1978 involved the supplying of labor to the aforementioned corporations. The remainder of Trucking's business involved supplying labor to various other corporations not involved in this proceeding.

The officers of Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, Dynamic, and JHT were Hyman Ruff, president, Thomas Gambino, vice president, and Joseph Gambino, secretary-treasurer. Ruff and the two Gambinos were the sole shareholders of the aforementioned corporations; Ruff owning 25 percent of the stock and the Gambinos owning 37-1/2 percent of the stock in each of the aforementioned corporations. The sole officer of Trucking was Hyman Ruff who was president. The sole shareholders of Trucking were Hyman Ruff and his wife.[4]

Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, Dynamic, JHT, and Trucking all maintained their sole office and principal place of business at the same location, 141 West 35th Street, New York City. The premises at 141 West 35th Street consisted of a storefront, behind which was a large warehouse area. In the back of the warehouse area was a mezzanine which was used as an office facility by Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, Dynamic, JHT, and Trucking. The warehouse area was utilized by Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and to some extent Dynamic. The bulk of Dynamic's operation, which was slightly different than that of Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, and Clothing, in that it delivered finished goods to retailers rather than to manufacturers, was conducted at a separate warehouse located nearby. Additionally, other warehouse facilities were maintained in and about the area of West 35th Street and were utilized more or less equally by Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic. JHT maintained a single warehouse facility at West 23rd Street.

The storefront sign above the facility located at 141 West 35th Street stated the name "Consolidated Dress Carriers, Inc." No other corporate name appeared over this storefront facility.

Trucking first came into existence sometime in 1975. Trucking is essentially a manpower type operation.[5] As a prerequisite to its existence, Ruff was required to obtain permission from Thomas and Joseph Gambino. When Trucking first commenced its operation, some of the clerical employees employed on the payrolls of the six other Respondent corporations previously named herein, were transferred to Trucking's payroll.[6]

Ruff and the Gambinos were in overall charge and ran the day-to-day operations for Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, Dynamic, and JHI. Ruff was generally responsible for the operations of Trucking. However, Joe Gambino did authorize loans to employees and adjust grievances of employees supplied by Trucking to Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic.

Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic each had a small complement of employees on their individual payroll. These employees were office workers, truckdrivers, and supervisors. Trucking had on its individual payroll a small complement of office workers. The office workers for the aforementioned six Respondent companies share the office facilities in the mezzanine of 141 West 35th Street facility including the office equipment, described in detail below. Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic employed virtually no helpers, handlers, or laborers on their payroll. These employees were supplied exclusively by Trucking. Moreover, the overwhelming majority of the total work force of Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic consisted of helpers, handlers, and laborers supplied exclusively by Trucking.

Jules Alterman, a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, was in charge of all warehouse employees, i.e. drivers, helpers, handlers, and laborers, working out of the 141 West 35th Street facility.[7] Alterman was directly responsible to the Gambinos and Ruff. Alterman, although he was on the payroll of Dynamic, spent the majority of his time at the 141 West 35th Street facility, which was not Dynamic's primary facility. His duties included determining how many laborers, helpers, and handlers were required on a daily basis by Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic and informing Trucking of the number of such workers required. Trucking then supplied the required number of workers. Alterman assigned all production employees working out of the 141 West 35th Street facility their daily work. Customers of Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic would call in to Alterman for pickups or deliveries. Alterman would accept such orders on behalf of corporations and assign the work to the employees, directing them to make the appropriate pickup and deliveries for all Respondent corporations.

At the 141 West 35th Street facility, Alterman punched the timecards of all the employees working out of this facility, both as they reported to and left work each day. In addition, he would authorize overtime work and distribute the weekly paychecks to the employees. All the employees assigned by Trucking to the aforenamed Respondent corporations, all received Trucking paychecks.

[3] A "handler" or "laborer" is an employee who performs delivery service in and around the garment center using handtrucks and racks to transport garments and materials.

[4] The record did not disclose the percentage of shares owned by Ruff and his wife.

[5] A manpower operation supplies workers or laborers to various employers requiring such services.

[6] The record does not contain the names of these employees nor the corporation by whom they were employed.

[7] It was stipulated during the course of the hearing that Alterman was a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

Alterman possessed authority to, and did in fact, fire several employees assigned by Trucking personnel to various Respondent corporations operating out of the 141 West 35th Street facility.

Employees furnished by Trucking to Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic were totally interchangeable although charged by Trucking to one of Respondent corporations. Respondent Trucking's personnel records establish that during the period of January 1 through July 27, 1978, the date of the strike herein, each specific employee set forth in the complaint as an alleged discriminatee was charged exclusively to one specific Respondent corporation.[8] Thomas Gambino and Jules Alterman testified that Trucking employees supplied and charged to one of Respondent corporations would be assigned to work on a day-to-day basis for other Respondent corporations. Interestingly, 52 of the striking employees set forth in the complaint and supplied by Trucking were charged to Dynamic. However, Gambino and Alterman testified that little or no Dynamic business transpired at the 141 West 35th Street facility. Therefore, since these employees concededly worked out of the 141 West 35th Street facility they must have performed work for Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, and Clothing, and in view of the testimony of Gambino and Alterman, above, I conclude such work was performed on an interchangeable basis as between these corporations.

Personnel supplied by Trucking applied for loans through Alterman and Joseph Gambino. Joseph Gambino, and presumably Thomas Gambino and Ruff, had final approval as to whether such loans would be granted. Such loans were repaid by means of deductions made from the employees' weekly Trucking paycheck. In addition, Joseph Gambino adjusted grievances of personnel supplied to Respondent corporations by Trucking whenever necessary.

Murray Pines was in overall charge of the office facility located in the mezzanine at 141 West 35th Street. Pines was on the payroll of Consolidated. He was directly responsible to the Gambinos and to Ruff. Pines supervised the work of approximately 10 office employees who were on different Respondent corporation payrolls. As in the case of laborers, the office workers were fully interchangeable. For example, employee Charles Chodash was on Consolidated's payroll, however, he operated the IBM programer for Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic. Anthony Mascia was on the payroll of GRG, however, he was in charge of workmen's compensation matters for Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic. Additionally and significantly, Lucy, another employee, was paid by Trucking but charged to one of five Respondent corporations. She was the keypunch operator for Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic.

The warehouse equipment, handtrucks, racks, and automotive trucks at the 141 West 35th Street facility were completely interchangeable. The automotive trucks were either leased from JHT or owned by one of Respondent corporations. A truck either owned by one of Respondent corporations or leased from JHT would display the name of any one of Respondent corporations for advertising purposes. The trucks were used interchangeably by each Respondent corporation operating out of the 141 West 35th Street facility. Although each corporation owned racks and handtrucks, such racks and handtrucks were also used interchangeably. Some of these racks were marked "Consolidated" and some "Dynamic."

Additionally, Consolidated paid entirely for cleaning service and rubbish removal at the 141 West 35th Street facility. Respondent corporations, including Trucking, shared the use of the photocopy machine located in the office at 141 West 35th Street. Trucking was not billed for the use of the machine nor for the cleaning service and rubbish removal.

Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic regularly performed trucking services for each other on a daily and interchangeable basis. For example, Consolidated might perform a delivery received by Greenberg's or vice versa. Clothing or any one of the other Respondent corporations might perform a pickup for Dynamic; however, inasmuch as Dynamic delivered merchandise to the retailer, whereas the other corporations did not, such delivery would be deposited at Dynamic's warehouse where Dynamic would make the delivery to the retailer. Respondent corporations did not bill each other for the services performed. Rather, annually the officers of the corporations would meet and allocate informal amounts due from one corporation to the other. These were called offsets.

The 141 West 35th Street facility was leased by Consolidated. Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, JHT, and Dynamic had an informal agreement with Consolidated wherein they utilized the facility. On an annual basis, informal arbitrary offsets would be charged against each corporation for its share of the rent. Trucking had a lease arrangement for its office space with Dynamic. Dynamic billed Trucking on an annual basis for the rental of space at 141 West 35th Street facility. This billing included office expenses, stationery, etc. The amount of this billing was determined arbitrarily by the Gambinos and Ruff. There was no specific special allocations either in the office or warehouse at the 141 West 35th Street facility. The space was used interchangeably.

B. Collective-Bargaining Agreements with Local 102

Respondents Consolidated, Greenberg's, and Clothing, as members of an employer association, were parties to an associationwide collective-bargaining agreement with Local 102, covering a bargaining unit which included all drivers, handlers, and helpers. Pursuant to the terms of the agreement, handlers and helpers received a wage of $4.25 and $4.98 per hour, respectively, as of June 1978.

---

[8] Respondent Trucking's personnel records establish for the period January 1, 1978, thru July 27, 1978, that 6 employees were charged to Consolidated, 1 to Greenberg's, 4 to GRG, 3 to Clothing, and 52 to Dynamic.

The handlers and helpers supplied to Respondent corporations by Trucking received wages considerably less than those provided by the Local 102 contract. In this connection, employees Ulrick Tovar and Ernest Joseph earned $2.75 per hour and Lucien Simon received $2.65 per hour.

C. The Strike

Sometime in June 1978, Ulrick Tovar, charged by Trucking to Dynamic but working out of the 141 West 35th Street facility and four or five other employees, also working out of the same facility, met with Matthew Eason, president of Local 20408, at that Local's office.[9] The employees indicated to Eason that they were unrepresented and were interested in representation by his union. Eason gave the employees authorization cards to sign and other authorization cards to distribute to their fellow employees.

Sometime during late June or early July 1978, about 2 weeks after the initial meeting, Eason met with approximately 50 employees working out of the 141 West 35th Street facility. During the intervening time between the meetings, these employees had signed Local 20408 authorization cards and at this time the cards were turned over to Eason. A total of 44 individuals, alleged as discriminatees by General Counsel, signed authorization cards for Local 20408. All the employees listed as their address the address of their employer, 141 West 35th Street facility.[10]

On July 10, Eason filed a representation petition with Region 2 of the National Labor Relations Board seeking to represent a unit of "truckdrivers, pushmen, rackmen and warehousemen, delivery men and messengers employed by Consolidated and/or Trucking at 141 West 35th Street."[11] A representation hearing on that petition took place on July 27, 1978.[12]

On July 27, 1978, Eason was present at the 141 West 35th Street facility sometime during the late morning hours. He was involved in a strike which was taking place at a nearby facility not involved in this proceeding, about a block away. Eason observed Thomas Gambino standing in front of the 141 West 35th Street facility. He approached Gambino and asked him whether he would consent to an election or recognize Local 20408. Gambino turned and walked away. As Gambino was walking away, an employee employed by Respondent at the 141 West 35th Street facility came over to speak with Eason. Gambino observed this, went over to the employee, and pushed him away from Eason stating to the employee that he was paying him to work and not to talk. Eason told the employee that Gambino had refused to speak with him and that if this was the way Gambino was going to act then the men should go on strike. Eason then began to gather the employees working at 141 West 35th Street facility together and informed them that the Employer had refused to talk to him and indicated to them that they should strike. At this time, those employees left their work stations and commenced picketing. Eason, who had union picket signs in his automobile, which he testified were customarily kept there, distributed picket signs to the employees and picketing commenced in front of the 141 West 35th Street facility. The picket signs distributed by Eason to the employees were preprinted standard union picket signs which stated, "Notice to the Public, Local 20408 Strike." Underneath the printing, the signs had crayoned in or penciled in the word "Consolidated." During the course of the day as employees working at the 141 West 35th Street facility returned from their morning pickup or delivery, they left work and joined the picket line. The picketing continued until about 6 p.m. During the course of the day, approximately 60 of the alleged discriminatees participated in the picketing.

On July 28, picketing continued throughout the day at the same location, in the same manner, approximately 65 pickets took part in the picketing.

On July 28, Sidney Gerstein, manager of Local 102, received word that a strike was in progress at the premises of 141 West 35th Street facility. Gerstein advised union representative Donald McDaniel to visit the premises. McDaniel, in the company of Local 102 representatives Ted Theus and Patrick Dyer, visited the 141 West 35th Street facility about midday. At this time, the Local 102 representatives spoke with some of the striking employees and informed them that Local 102 had a collective-bargaining agreement with Consolidated. They told the strikers that they were covered by this agreement and were entitled to get the benefits of this agreement which included higher wages and improved fringe benefits.

Following the Local 102 representatives' conversation with the strikers, Local 102 Representative Theus, spoke with Eason who was present at the picket line. Theus told Eason that Local 102 represented the employees of Consolidated. Eason replied that he would let that be determined (presumably by the NLRB by a resolution of the pending representation petition). Theus then asked Eason if he would object if he (Theus) tried to get the employees to report to work. Eason replied that he had no objection.

Shortly after Eason's conversation with Theus, Eason spoke to the striking employees. He related to them his conversation with Theus and informed them that he had no objection to their returning to work.

Shortly after Eason's meeting with the striking employees, he observed Thomas Gambino in front of the 141 West 35th Street facility. At this time he asked Gambino, "Why don't you put the workers back to work. . . They were not aware they had a union. . . . [presumably a reference to Local 102] It's not fair to take it out on them. . . . Put them back to work and let it be resolved before the Labor Board." Gambino turned without responding and walked away.[13]

---

[9] As set forth above, 52 of the 66 striking employees were charged to Dynamic although, according to the testimony of Thomas Gambino and Jules Alterman, very little work for Dynamic was performed at the 141 West 35th Street facility.

[10] Thirty-six employees listed Consolidated as their employer, four listed Trucking Personnel as their employer, two listed Thomas Gambino as their employer, one listed Consolidated-Trucking as his employer, and one listed Consolidated-Dynamic as his employer.

[11] Case 2-RC-18035.

[12] This hearing did not close. Further proceedings on the petition were apparently blocked pending final disposition of the instant case.

About 5 p.m. on July 28, McDaniel spoke with Hyman Ruff in the office of the 141 West 35th Street facility. McDaniel told Ruff that "The men wanted to come back to work." Ruff responded that "[h]e wouldn't put them back to work now, he had to speak to his attorney."[14]

On July 31, early in the morning, pursuant to a prior arrangement between the striking employees and Local 102 representatives, approximately 65 strikers reported to the Local 102 office. At this time, various Local 102 representatives explained to the striking employees the advantages of joining Local 102 and the expected benefits (higher wages and improved fringe benefits) that Local 102 could provide for them. Union authorization cards were then distributed to the employees who filled them out, signed them, and returned them to the Local 102 representatives. Sixty-five of the sixty-six alleged discriminatees signed Local 102 cards at this time.[15]

It was agreed between the Local 102 representatives and the striking employees that they would apply for reinstatement at 141 West 35th Street in small groups of 10 and 12 employees.

On July 31, John Rooney, Local 102 business agent, who normally dealt with Hyman Ruff in connection with the existing Local 102 contract, arrived at the 141 West 35th Street facility before any of the striking employees. Sometime between 8:30 and 9 a.m. that morning, Rooney met with Ruff in his office. At this time according to Rooney's testimony, he told Ruff, "there [are] men outside. They want to go back to work . . . Would you put them back to work?" According to Rooney, Ruff replied, "[N]o I have to see my lawyer first."[16]

Ulrick Tovar, who had accompanied Rooney with a group of 10 to 15 striking employees to 141 West 35th Street, testified that he arrived at the premises with the striking employees about 8:30 a.m. He saw Joe Gambino standing by the door of the premises. According to Tovar, the employees all stated, "We're coming back, we're coming back to work." Joe Gambino replied, "Wait a minute . . . I don't want you to come back to work, I don't want you any more over here."[17]

Striker Lucien Simon testified that when his group of employees arrived at the 141 West 35th Street facility following the arrival of Tovar's group, he observed Joe Gambino standing by the front door and heard him say, "No, no job, I don't want you anymore."

On July 31, some time during the day following the unsuccessful attempts by Rooney and the strikers to obtain reinstatement, Thomas Gambino and his attorney met with Sidney Gerstein at the office of Local 102. According to Gambino's testimony, "Gerstein mentioned something about the people coming to work for us. . . He talked about the people that were on strike. I told him the people did not work for Consolidated, this was a very legal thing involving the NLRB and something we had to discuss with a lawyer to determine. . . legally what it was all about." Gambino later testified that, "In essence he [Gerstein] said the people—he wanted us to put the people to work." Gambino replied that it was a legal thing pending before the NLRB.

On August 1, Tovar and approximately 10 to 12 other striking employees again returned to the 141 West 35th Street facility around 8:30 or 9 a.m. According to Tovar, Joe Gambino was by the front door. The employees stated to Gambino, "We come back to work, Local 102 is sending us back to work." Joe Gambino responded, "No we don't want you to work."[18]

On August 2, a number of striking employees contacted Eason at his office and advised him of their efforts to return to work and the refusal by Respondents' representatives to reinstate them. Eason then filed the instant charge herein.

On August 2, Eason sent Consolidated and Trucking a mailgram indicating that each of the discriminatees individually applied for reinstatement. The mailgram set forth as follows:

> Local 20408 represents all of the employees who you have discharged as a result of the work stoppage on July 27, 1978. Alternatively, each of them

[13] Thomas Gambino testified that he did not recall this conversation taking place. My impression of Thomas Gambino was that his testimony was often evasive, and at times I believe he was less than forthright. This was particularly true as to questions put to him concerning the operation of Respondent Trucking. I have concluded, as described below, that Respondents Trucking, Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, Dynamic, and JHT constitute a single highly integrated operation, a single employer within the meaning of the Act. Therefore, as one of the principles of this single employer, I conclude that Gambino was intimately aware of the operating details of Respondent Trucking, and his denials during cross-examination of knowledge of such details were designed, I believe, to be consistent with Respondent's defense that Respondent Trucking was neither a single nor a joint employer with Respondent Consolidated, et al., and not truthful. My general impression of Eason's testimony was that he was at all times responsive and forthright. Moreover, Eason's testimony is consistent in this respect with the testimony of McDaniel, Rooney, and Tovar and consistent with the admissions by Gambino himself in connection with his similar conversation with Gerstein, described below. Accordingly I credit Eason.

[14] At the time of this hearing Hyman Ruff was deceased. However, the Board has held that such hearsay evidence is admissible although subject to careful evaluation. Calandra Photo, Inc., and Irvin C. Levin, its Agent and Member of its Board of Directors, 151 NLRB 660, 671 (1965). In this case, the testimony of McDaniel is consistent with the admissions of Thomas Gambino in connection with a subsequent but similar conversation with Local 102 Manager Gerstein. Moreover, I found McDaniel at all times during his testimony to be generally responsive and forthright. Accordingly, I credit McDaniel.

[15] An examination of the 65 Local 102 authorization cards indicates that 63 were dated July 31. Two were dated July 30. Inasmuch as July 30 was a Sunday, and there is no evidence that any union solicitation or meeting took place on that date, I conclude that the cards were merely inaccurately dated and that the correct date should have been July 31.

[16] As previously noted, at the time of this hearing Hyman Ruff was deceased. For the same reason I credited McDaniel concerning an almost identical conversation with Ruff described above in fn. 14. I also credit Rooney.

[17] Joseph Gambino was not called to testify during the course of this hearing. Tovar generally impressed me as a credible witness. He was at all times during his testimony responsive and forthright. Moreover, his testimony is consistent with that of Eason, McDaniel, and Rooney, and with the admissions of Thomas Gambino described below. Accordingly, I credit Tovar.

[18] As previously noted, Joseph Gambino did not testify during the course of this hearing for the reasons set forth in fn. 17. I credit Tovar.

does individually hereby unconditionally apply for reinstatement.

III. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSION

A. Single-Employer Relationship

A critical issue is presented in this case as to whether Trucking and Consolidated, et al., constitute a single or joint employer.[19] A supplementary issue is also presented as to whether Consolidated, constitute a single or joint employer.

The Supreme Court held in Radio & Television Broadcast Technicians, Local Union 1264, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers AFL-CIO, et al. v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255, 256 (1965), that in determining whether enterprises constitute a single employer: "The controlling criteria, set out and elaborated in the Board decisions, are interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations and common ownership." The Board in Blumenfeld Theatres Circuit, a Partnership; Blumenfeld Enterprises, a Division of Cinerama, Inc; Rafic Oakland Theatre, a Partnership, 240 NLRB 206, 214, 215 (1979), held that a "single employer" status, for purposes of the National Labor Relations Act, depends upon all the circumstances of the case, that not all of the single 'controlling criteria' specified by the Supreme Court [in Radio & Television Broadcast Technicians, supra] need be present. . . ."

In the instant case, there is common ownership. In connection with Consolidated, et al., the officers and stockholders are identical. Ruff owned 25 percent of each corporation and Thomas and Joseph Gambino owned 37-1/2 percent of the stock of each of the above corporations. Additionally, the officers were identical: Hyman Ruff, president; Thomas Gambino, vice president; and Joseph Gambino, secretary-treasurer.

There is also common ownership between Trucking and Consolidated, et al. In Trucking, Ruff was in effect the sole owner and president.[20] Thus, Hyman Ruff owned effectively 100 percent of the shares of Trucking and 25 percent of the shares of Consolidated, et al. Ruff's ownership of 25 percent of the shares of Consolidated, et al. represents substantial ownership in view of the fact that no one shareholder owned more than 37-1/2 percent of the stock of these companies. The Board found common ownership in determining single-employer status where an individual owns substantially all of the stock in one corporation and a substantial portion, although less than a majority, of the stock in such other corporation. A & T Glass Company, 231 NLRB 998 (1977); L. H. & J. Coal Company Inc., 228 NLRB 1091, 1092 (1977).

The evidence also establishes that there was common management between Consolidated, et al., and Trucking. Ruff and the Gambinos occupied the same offices with respect to Consolidated, et al., and all three individuals were responsible for the day-to-day operations of these corporations. Although Ruff was the sole officer of Trucking, the evidence established that Joseph Gambino granted loans to employees on Trucking's payroll. The evidence also established that Joseph Gambino adjusted grievances of employees on Trucking's payroll.

Common management is further established by the duties of Alterman. Alterman was directly responsible to Ruff and the Gambinos. He was in overall charge and supervised production employees working out of the 141 West 35th Street facility, whether they were on Trucking's payroll or the payrolls of Consolidated, et al. In this respect, he assigned all such employees their daily work. He punched the timecards of all employees when they reported to and left work each day, he authorized and directed overtime, and distributed all weekly paychecks. Additionally and significantly, the evidence establishes that on occasion Alterman fired employees of Trucking personnel as distinguished from advising Ruff that Consolidated, et al., no longer wanted a particular individual supplied by Trucking to perform work for them.

Common management is further established by the duties of Murray Pines. Pines was in overall charge of the office at the 141 West 35th Street facility which employed office clericals on the payrolls of Consolidated, et al., and Trucking. He admittedly supervised all clericals on Consolidated et al., payrolls and, since he was the only supervisor in the office, it is presumable that in the absence of Ruff or the Gambinos he supervised the three employees employed on the payroll of Trucking as well.

The evidence established that there existed in all of Respondent corporations, including Trucking, a centralized control of labor relations. In this connection, the evidence established that the officers of Consolidated, et al., were identical; namely, Ruff and the Gambinos. All had equal authority to hire, fire, determine the wages, and other working conditions of their employees, and to adjust grievances. As the president and sole officer of Trucking, Ruff also possessed all of these functions with respect to employees on Trucking's payroll. Additionally, the evidence established that Joseph Gambino adjusted grievances of employees on Trucking's payroll.

The evidence also established that Consolidated, et al., and Trucking constituted a totally integrated operation engaged in the transportation of goods in the garment industry. In this connection, Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic were the corporations that were engaged in the actual physical transportation of goods. JHT was admittedly created solely for the purpose of supplying equipment to Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic. The evidence established that Trucking similarly was created essentially for the purpose of supplying labor to Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic. In this connection, permission was required from the Gambinos to Ruff as a prerequisite to the formation of Trucking. Additionally, upon the formation of Trucking, employees were transferred from Consolidated, et al., to staff Trucking's office personnel. Further, with the exception of the skeletal force of production employees maintained by Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic, Trucking furnished substantially all of the production employees (laborers, handlers, and helpers) to these corporations. That Trucking was created solely to supply labor to these Respondent corporations is established by the evidence that substantially all labor supplied by Trucking was supplied to Respondent corporations herein.

[19] Consolidated, et al., is used to designate Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, Dynamic, and JHT.

[20] As set forth above, the record indicates to some extent that Ruff and his wife were the sole owners of Trucking. There is no indication as to what if any percent of the ownership was vested in Ruff's wife. In view of the marital relationship and in view of the fact that Ruff's wife did not take part in any of the day-to-day operations of Trucking, I conclude that Hyman Ruff was, effectively, the sole shareholder.

The integration of the total operation is further established by the complete interchangeability of the office and production employees.

The evidence established that there was total interchange with respect to the employees supplied by Trucking and charged to Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic. In this respect, the testimony of Thomas Gambino and Alterman established that Trucking employees supplied and charged to one company would be assigned to work on a day-to-day basis for other Respondent corporations. Further, 52 of the 66 striking employees supplied by Trucking were charged to Dynamic. However, these employees all worked out of the 141 West 35th Street facility, where Dynamic carried out little or no business. Therefore, these employees charged to Dynamic must have performed work for Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, and Clothing on an interchangeable basis.

The evidence also established interchangeability as to office employees. In this connection, Charles Chodash, an employee on Consolidated's payroll, was the IBM programer for Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic. Lucy was an employee on Trucking's payroll but charged to one of Respondent corporations. She was the keypunch operator for Respondent corporations. Anthony Mascia, an employee on the GRG payroll was in charge of workmen's compensation matters for Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic.

That Trucking and Consolidated, et al., shared a single warehouse and office facility located at 141 West 35th Street is further evidence to establish the integrated nature of the entire operation. Significantly, the only corporate name appearing on the storefront or anywhere else at this facility was that of Consolidated.

Further establishing the integrated nature of the operation herein is the interchangeability of office and warehouse equipment. In this connection, the evidence established that office equipment such as the IBM installation and a photocopy machine were utilized by all Respondent corporations, including Trucking. Additionally, there was but a single cleaning and rubbish removal service which was paid for by Consolidated. The evidence also established that in the warehouse, racks and pushcarts, owned by different Respondent corporations and used to make deliveries, were freely interchanged as were automotive trucks which were owned outright or leased by different Respondent corporations from JHT. Such trucks might contain arbitrarily on the side panel the name of any one of Respondent corporations for advertising purposes.

Still further establishing the integrated nature of the operations was the informal manner by which operating costs were handled by Respondent corporations. The evidence established that rather than one corporation submitting a bill to another corporation for actual rent, labor costs, or use of equipment incurred by one company on behalf of the other, the principals, namely, Ruff and the Gambinos, would meet annually in an informal manner and decide on "offsets" to be allowed by one corporation against the other.

The Board in A & T Glass, supra, found a single-employer relationship existed based on common ownership, centralized control of labor relations policy, and a highly integrated business operation. In reaching this conclusion, the Board noted that the business, as in the instant case, was held out to the public as a single business. Additionally there existed, as in the instant case, considerable integration of the two businesses which was shown through occupancy of the same building, sharing of office space, advertising one another's services on vehicles, integration of employees, and the fact that the employees of both corporations used equipment and materials owned by the respondent, Glass, to perform outside work.

In Land Equipment Incorporated; and Equipment Service Rentals, a Single Employer, 248 NLRB 685 (1980), the Board found two companies constitute a single employer where one company supplied labor to another company that was its only customer and existed solely for the purpose of supplying said second company with labor at less than the prevailing wage rate.

The Board has consistently found joint-employer relationships existed between manpower corporations and the corporations for whom they supply labor.

In Manpower, Inc., of Shelby County and Armour Grocery Products Co., Division of Armour and Company, 164 NLRB 287 (1967), the Board found a joint-employer relationship existed between Manpower, Inc., and Armour. Among the factors relied on by the Board in reaching this conclusion was that Armour's dispatcher informed the drivers supplied by Manpower, their starting time, assigned them their runs, supplied them with a manifest which set forth their time of departure, approximate time of arrival, day of return, etc. In addition Armour's dispatcher adjusted grievances. Moreover of the seven drivers furnished Armour by Manpower only one driver had made a trip for another company.

In Manpower, Inc. and Avis Rent-A-Car System, Inc., 226 NLRB 1 (1967), the Board found a joint-employer relationship existed between Manpower and Avis. Among the factors relied on by the Board in reaching this conclusion was that Avis directed, disciplined, and discharged employees supplied by Manpower pursuant to a contract arrangement between the employers.

In both cases, the Manpower companies and their joint employers were separately owned and controlled corporations. There was no common supervision or sharing of office space or equipment. Nor was there any degree of integration between the two corporations.

In view of my conclusion that common ownership, common management, and centralized control of labor relations exist, and that Respondent corporations herein represent a totally integrated operation which share facilities, freely interchange employees and equipment, I conclude that Respondent Trucking, Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, Dynamic, and JHT constitute a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

B. The Economic Strike

There is no dispute that a strike commenced on July 27, 1978, accompanied by picketing. Picketing commenced on July 27 at Respondent's 141 West 35th Street facility and ended July 28. Thereafter, no further picketing took place. There is also no dispute that the strike was an economic strike. The complaint alleged the strike to be an economic strike. Moreover, during the course of the hearing it was stipulated by all parties that the strike was an economic strike. Indeed, the evidence supports the complaint allegation and stipulation. The evidence established that the strike commenced following a conversation between Eason and Thomas Gambino during which conversation Eason asked Gambino to consent to an election or recognize Local 20408. When Gambino declined, Eason urged the employees to go out on strike and commence picketing.

C. The Identity of the Strikers

The complaint alleged that 66 individuals took part in the strike described above. These named individuals are alleged as discriminatees in view of alleged unconditional offers to return to work and Respondent's unlawful refusal to reinstate them. Although Respondent's counsel concedes that the above strike did take place, he does not concede that the 66 individuals set forth in the complaint participated in the strike. Thus, the burden of establishing the identity of the strikers falls on General Counsel. In this connection, Respondent's payroll records establish that during the calendar year commencing in 1978 until the week ending July 28, 1978, all 66 alleged discriminatees worked exclusively for Respondent corporations; namely, Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, and Dynamic. There is no dispute that these employees worked out of the 141 West 35th Street facility. In any event, the testimony of Eason, and employees Tovar, Simon, and Joseph established that all strikers worked out of the 141 West 35th Street facility. Moreover, well prior to the commencement of the strike, 42 of the alleged 66 strikers signed Local 20408 authorization cards and on July 31, 65 of the 66 strikers signed Local 102 authorization cards, all setting forth as the address of their employer the 141 West 35th Street facility. Respondent's records further establish that on July 27 all 66 alleged discriminatees were scheduled to work, but that only 8 alleged discriminatees in fact worked a full 8-hour day.[21] The remaining 58 alleged discriminatees all worked less than an 8-hour day. The payroll records further show that, on July 28, 65 of the 66 alleged discriminatees performed no work for Respondent. The 66th alleged discriminatee, Joseph, worked 3 hours for Respondent that day. Thereafter, according to Joseph's uncontradicted testimony, he ceased work and commenced picketing.

Joseph further testified that he observed approximately 65 employees picketing on that day. Striker Lucien Simon testified that on July 28, approximately 60 to 70 employees working out of 141 West 35th Street facility and alleged as discriminatees picketed. Matthew Eason, Local 20408 president, testified that on July 28 over 60 employees picketed.

The evidence established that on July 31 the strikers met in the office of Local 102 where 65 of the 66 strikers alleged as discriminatees signed Local 102 authorization cards. The only striking employee who did not execute a Local 102 card was Jean-Charles Gesner.

In view of Respondent's payroll records which establish that the 66 strikers were scheduled to work on July 27, that prior to the end of July 28 all of these employees had ceased work, and that no striker resumed work until at least after the week ending August 4, 1978; in view of the testimony of Simon, Ernest, and Eason, which establishes between 60 and 70 employees picketed on July 27; and July 28; in view of the 65 signed Local 102 authorization cards signed by the striking employees; and in view of the fact that Respondent did not submit any evidence to dispute that any of the alleged discriminatees took part in the strike, I conclude that the 66 individuals named in the complaint ceased work on July 27 and concertedly engaged in an economic strike.

C. The Unconditional Offers To Return to Work

The Board law with respect to economic strikers and their right to reinstatement upon making an unconditional offer to return to work is rather well settled. Strikers, whether economic or unfair labor practice strikers, retain their status as employees under Section 2(3) of the Act. See N.L.R.B. v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333 (1938).

An economic strike is deemed to be protected activity under Section 7 of the Act. However, an employer is free in such circumstances to hire permanent replacements for economic strikers at any time prior to their unconditional offer to return to work. It is an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse reinstatement to striking employees following an unconditional offer by the striking employees to return to work, or to discharge striking employees prior to the time their jobs are filled by permanent replacements. N.L.R.B. v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., Inc., 389 U.S. 375 (1967); N.L.R.B. v. United States Cold Storage Corp., 203 F.2d 924 (5th Cir. 1953), cert. denied 346 U.S. 818; Carter Carburetor Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 140 F.2d 714 (8th Cir. 1944).

An employer who refuses to reinstate striking employees upon their unconditional offer to return must establish that his action was based on legitimate and substantial business justification, i.e., where the strikers' jobs have been replaced by permanent replacements or where the job has been eliminated by legitimate and bona fide reasons other than labor relations. N.L.R.B. v. Fleetwood Trailer, supra; N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26 (1967). Moreover, the right to reinstatement does not expire when an unconditional offer is made, although a lawful permanent replacement has been hired for the job in question, or it has been eliminated for some legitimate, bona fide reason. The right to reinstatement continues when the job becomes available and until the striker obtains other regular and substantially equivalent employment. Fleetwood Trailer, supra; The Laidlaw Corporation, 171 NLRB 1366 (1968).

[21] Those alleged discriminatees working a full 8-hour day were Jean Balan, Jean H. Charles, Luma Calixte, Robergeau Duverger, Joseph E. Ernest, Edouard St. Vil, Lucrece Ulysse, and Rigeur Videau.

The issue that must first be determined is whether the strikers made unconditional offers to return to work.

The evidence established that the first offer made on behalf of the strikers to return to work occurred during Eason's conversation with Thomas Gambino sometime in the afternoon of July 28. In this connection, Eason's credited testimony established that he asked Thomas Gambino in front of the premises at the 141 West 35th Street facility, "Why don't you put the workers back to work. . . . They were not aware they had a union. . . . It's not fair to take it out on them. Put them back to work and let it be resolved before the Labor Board." Gambino's response to this offer was to turn and walk away. The substance of the offer sets no conditions for return. For example, the offer is not conditioned on increased wages, benefits, or any other improvement in working conditions. Nor does the offer suggest that it was conditioned on reinstatement of all strikers. Cf. American Optical Company, 138 NLRB 681 (1962). Accordingly, I conclude that the offer by Eason was an unconditional offer made on behalf of all striking employees to return to work.

Respondent's counsel contends that Eason had no authority to make such offer on behalf of the striking employees because they had withdrawn and revoked their membership in Local 20408 at the time the offer was made.

There is no doubt that Eason was authorized expressly or impliedly by the striking employees to make such offer on their behalf. This is established by the evidence that shortly before the strike, 42 of the 66 striking employees, a majority of the striking employees, signed Local 20408 authorization cards. It is further established by the evidence that the strike which commenced on July 27 was organized and supervised by Local 20408. In this connection, every picket carried a Local 20408 picket sign throughout the entire course of the strike. The Board has held that where striking employees have signed union authorization cards, and joined in a strike under union supervision, a general agency is created which empowers the union through its representatives to offer to return to work on behalf of all of the striking employees without obtaining specific authorization from the employees to do so. I. Posner, Inc.; Posner Distributing Corp; and Posner Beauty and Barber Supply Corp., 133 NLRB 1567, 1570 (1961); F. M. Homes, Inc., 235 NLRB 648, 649, fn. 4.

Respondent's counsel bases his contention that the striking employees had revoked their membership in Local 20408 on the testimony of striker Ulrick Tovar who testified in response to Respondent's counsel's questions that following his conversation with Dyer on July 28 it was his intention to be a member of Local 102 rather than Local 20408. However, such revocation was never conveyed by Tovar to Eason. Moreover, there is no evidence that any of the striking employees had effectively communicated any intention to revoke membership in Local 20408 to Eason or other 20408 representatives. Moreover, the striking employees continued picketing with Local 20408 signs notwithstanding their conversations with Local 102 representatives throughout the course of the day. This would negate any subjective intention by the employees to revoke their membership in Local 20408.

Neither does the evidence establish that Local 20408 abandoned the striking employees prior to Eason's offer made to Gambino on July 28, as a result of the strikers' conversations with Local 102 representatives. Rather, the evidence establishes that Eason, at all times during the strike and thereafter, was primarily concerned with obtaining reinstatement of the striking employees, and that, if he was unable to obtain it, he was willing, without abandoning the support or representational claim of Local 20408, to enlist the aid of Local 102 to this end. This is evidenced by Eason's conversation on the afternoon of July 28 with Ted Theus, Local 102 representative. In this respect, Theus told Eason that Local 102 had a contract with Consolidated and represented the striking employees. Eason replied he would let that be determined, presumably, by the pending representation petition filed by Local 20408. Theus asked Eason if he would object if he tried to get the employees back to work and Eason stated that he had no objection. This conversation clearly indicates that Local 20408 had not abandoned its claim for representation. On the contrary, Eason asserted that this was a matter to be determined. Clearly too, the conversation established that Eason was enlisting the aid of Local 102 to obtain reinstatement of the striking employees. This is further established when following his conversation with Theus he spoke to the striking employees and related to them this conversation. It is noted that the present representation petition filed by Local 20408 is still pending as of this date. Had Local 20408 intended to abandon the striking employees or its representational claim, surely a withdrawal of the petition would have been requested.

That Local 20408 had not abandoned the striking employees or its representational claim is further evidenced by Eason's filing the instant charge with the NLRB and by his subsequent offer on behalf of all striking employees to return to work on August 2.

The evidence established that about 5 p.m., on July 28, following the Local 102 representatives' discussions with the striking employees described above, Local 102 Representative McDaniel spoke with Hyman Ruff. The conversation took place in Respondent's office at 141 West 35th Street facility. McDaniel told Ruff that "The men wanted to come back to work." Ruff refused to put the men back to work claiming he had to speak to his attorney. The offer to return to work made by McDaniel was clearly unconditional. However, I conclude that such offer was unauthorized and without any legal effect since the offer was made at a time prior to the striking employees signing Local 102 authorization cards and at a time when picketing was still in progress on behalf of Local 20408. Thus, at this time Local 102 was not authorized to represent the striking employees.

On July 31, immediately following the Local 102 meeting with the striking employees, 65 of the 66 striking employees signed Local 102 authorization cards and specifically authorized Local 102 to request reinstatement on their behalf. Local 102 Representative Rooney met with Hyman Ruff in his office at 141 West 35th Street facility. During this meeting Rooney told Ruff "[T]here [are] men outside. They want to go back to work. . . Would you put them back to work?" Ruff replied he had to see his lawyer first. In view of the authorization cards signed by 65 of the 66 striking employees and in view of the specific authority given by the striking employees to request reinstatement on their behalf, I conclude that Rooney had the authority to request reinstatement on behalf of the striking employees. I also conclude that Rooney's statement to Ruff, described above, was an unconditional offer to return to work made on behalf of the striking employees and that Ruff's reply to Rooney was a refusal to reinstate the striking employees. I. Posner, Inc., and F. M. Homes, Inc., supra.

On July 31, following Rooney's unconditional offer, described above, Thomas Gambino met with Local 102 Manager Sidney Gerstein. During this meeting Gambino admitted that "Gerstein mentioned something about the people coming to work for us. He talked about the people that were on strike. . . ." Gambino later admitted, "In essence he [Gerstein] said the people—he wanted us to put the people to work." Gambino's reply was that it was a legal thing and would have to be settled through a pending National Labor Relations Board proceeding, an apparent reference to the representation petition then pending before the Region filed by Local 20408. Gambino did not question Gerstein's authority to request reinstatement. Based on the same reasoning as applied to Rooney's unconditional offer to return to work, I conclude Gerstein had the authority to make such offer on behalf of the striking employees. I also conclude that Gerstein's offer was an unconditional offer to return to work made on behalf of the striking employees, and that Gambino's response was a refusal to reinstate the striking employees.

A further unconditional offer to return to work was made by a group of the strikers themselves. In this connection, the evidence established that following their meeting at 8:30 a.m. on July 31 at Local 102's office the striking employees in groups of 10 to 15 employees walked from the offices of Local 102 to Respondents' West 35th Street facility. As the first group of striking employees approached the facility, they stated to Joseph Gambino who was standing in front of the facility, "We're coming back. We're coming back to work." Joe Gambino replied, "Wait a minute. . . . I don't want you to come back to work. I don't want you anymore over here." The same offer was made by Tovar on August 1, followed by the same response from Gambino. There is no question that the employees' offers to return to work were unconditional and that Joe Gambino's response was a clear refusal to reinstate and I so conclude.

Gambino's refusal to reinstate the strikers is further evidenced by the testimony of Lucien Simon, striking employee, who approached the facility on July 31 with one of the groups of strikers that followed Tovar's group. Simon testified that when he approached the 141 West 35th Street facility, he observed Joe Gambino standing by the front door and heard him say, "No, no job, I don't want you anymore."

Respondent's counsel contends that all offers to return to work made by Local 102 Representatives Rooney and Gerstein and by the striking employees on July 31 and August 1 were conditioned on reinstatement pursuant to the terms of the Local 102 contract with Consolidated. This contention is based on the testimony of strikers Ernest Joseph, Lucien Simon, and Ulrick Tovar, as well as the testimony of Eason which is all to the effect that on July 28 during the strike, and again on the morning of July 31 during the Local 102 meeting, the striking employees were informed by Local 102 representatives that Local 102 had a contract with Consolidated, that the striking employees were covered by this contract, and that, pursuant to this contract, they were entitled to higher wages and increased fringe benefits and would receive such increases upon their return to work.

Whether the striking employees would have returned to work unconditionally, at the same rates of pay and under the conditions of employment that existed prior to their strike, had Respondent made such offer of reinstatement is conjectural. Such offer by Respondent was never made.

Neither can it be argued that Respondent refused to offer reinstatement because it believed the offers were conditional upon the strikers receiving the Local 102 contract benefits as there is no evidence to establish that Respondent's representatives were aware at any time during which the offers to return to work were made, of the conversations between Local 102 representatives and the striking employees concerning the strikers' expectations as to wages and working conditions upon return to work. Indeed, conditions for reinstatement were never questioned by Respondent's representatives when the offers to return to work were made. For the same reason, it cannot be argued that the offers to return to work were conditioned on reinstatement of all strikers. A reasonable interpretation of the offers themselves does not imply such a condition. If Respondent believed such condition was being imposed he could have questioned Rooney, Gerstein, or the strikers themselves in this regard or offered reinstatement to selected strikers. Respondent did neither. Rather Respondent without discussing the offers to return to work simply refused them. I therefore reject Respondent's counsel's contention that the offers to return to work were conditional.

Finally, a further unconditional offer to return to work was made on behalf of the striking employees through Eason's August 2 mailgram addressed to Consolidated Dress Carriers, Trucking Personnel, 141 West 35th Street, which stated: "Local 20408 represents all of the employees who you have discharged as a result of the work stoppage on July 27, 1978. Alternatively, each of them does individually hereby unconditionally apply for reinstatement." The mailgram was sent by Matthew Eason, president, Local 20408. I conclude that the failure to respond to this offer was a further refusal to reinstate the striking employees following an unconditional offer to return to work.

D. Permanent Replacements

Respondent's counsel contends that as of July 31, 1978, there was a decline in business and no work was available after replacements had been hired.

The Supreme Court has held that an employer who refuses to reinstate economic strikers who make unconditional offers to return to work has the burden of proving that the strikers have been permanently replaced. N.L.R.B. v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., and N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, supra.

Respondent's payroll records and the testimony of Thomas Gambino established that as of July 27 Respondent had work available for all 66 striking employees. Respondent submitted no evidence to establish that permanent replacements were hired. While the testimony of Thomas Gambino and employees Simon and Joseph establish that an undetermined number of individuals were performing work formerly performed by the striking employees, there is no evidence to establish the number of such individuals nor their status as "permanent replacements." Nor did Respondent submit evidence to establish a business decline or an elimination of jobs. I therefore reject Respondent's contention.

Accordingly, I conclude that there is insufficient evidence to establish that Respondent had secured any permanent replacements or that there existed a substantial business justification for denying reinstatement to the striking employees between July 27 when the strike commenced and August 2 when the last offer to return to work was made. I further conclude that in view of the unconditional offers to return to work made by and on behalf of the striking employees Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act when it refused reinstatement following such unconditional offers. N.L.R.B. v. Fleetwood Trailer Corp.; N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailer Inc.; N.L.R.B. v. Cold Storage, Carter Carburetor Corp. v. N.L.R.B., supra.

E. Offers of Reinstatement by Respondent

Respondent counsel contends that as work became available offers of reinstatement to the striking employees were communicated to the employees by mailgrams. The evidence does indeed establish that 53 mailgrams offering reinstatement to the striking employees were sent by Respondent Trucking Personnel during the period of September through November 1978. However, each and every mailgram sent to a striking employee required that he report to work immediately, the day following the day the mailgram was sent. An example of such mailgram is the mailgram sent to Ernest Joseph on October 18 which states, "Report to work at 141 West 35th Street, New York City on Thursday, October 19th at 8:00 a.m." The Board has held that an offer of reinstatement by an employer to an employee must allow a reasonable amount of time to consider whether to accept such offer. Murray Products Inc., 228 NLRB 268 (1977); Harrah's Club, 158 NLRB 758, 759, fn. 1 (1966). There is no per se rule as to the period of time that will constitute reasonable notice to the discriminatee. Penco Enterprises, Inc., Penco of Ohio and Acoustical Contracting and Supply Corp., 216 NLRB 734 (1975). Rather, the Board examines the factual circumstances of the particular case to determine what constitutes a reasonable time. The Board stated in Fredeman's Calcasieu Locks Shipyard, Inc., 208 NLRB 839 (1974), that an offer that demands that an employee accept and return to work on the day he receives it would, except in unusual circumstances, be an unreasonable condition to which we would not require strict compliance by the employee; nor would we find such an offer to have terminated the backpay period. In the instant case, the strikers made several unconditional offers to return to work all of which were rejected by Respondent. For Respondent now to require strikers to return to work the morning after receipt of the mailgram is in my opinion an unreasonable period of time. I therefore conclude that Respondent's offers of reinstatement to the striking employees did not constitute reasonable notice or allow reasonable time for the striking employee to consider whether to accept such offer and accordingly it finds Respondent's offers to be invalid.

If it were ultimately determined that Respondent's offers of reinstatement were valid, then I would conclude that there is insufficient evidence to establish that the mailgrams containing the offers of reinstatement were received by the discriminatees. In this connection, Tovar, Joseph, and Simon all testified that they did not receive the mailgrams purportedly sent to them. Moreover, there is no evidence that the remaining employees did receive such mailgrams. Accordingly, I would conclude that with respect to the issue of whether the offers of reinstatement by Respondent were communicated to the discriminatees, the record is incomplete and that such issue should be left for the compliance stage of this proceeding. Woodlawn Hospital, 233 NLRB 782, 791 (1977); Standard Materials Inc., 237 NLRB 1136 (1978).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, Dynamic, JHT, and Trucking are individually employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 20408 and Local 102 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent Consolidated, Greenberg's, GRG, Clothing, Dynamic, JHT, and Trucking constitute a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

4. On July 27, 1978, the employees whose names are set forth below in Appendix A [omitted from publication] ceased work and concertedly engaged in an economic strike which strike continued until on or about 6 p.m. on July 28, 1978.

5. On July 28 and 31, and August 2, 1978, unconditional offers to return to work were made by and on behalf of all employees set forth below in Appendix A [omitted from publication].

6. Respondent, by failing and refusing to reinstate the employees set forth below in Appendix A [omitted from publication] to the positions held by them prior to the July 27, 1978, strike, has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices have a close, intimate, and substantial effect on the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. My recommended Order will require Respondent to offer each and every employee whose name is set forth below in Appendix A [omitted from publication] reinstatement to their former positions of employment or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges. In addition, Respondent shall make whole the said employees for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the unlawful discrimination or refusal to reinstate them, by paying to them a sum of money equal to the amount they normally would have earned from the date of their initial unconditional offer to return to work on July 28, 1978, until the date Respondent offers them reinstatement, computed in the manner set forth by the Board in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), together with interest thereon, as computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977); see, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Payroll and other records in possession of Respondent are to be made available to the Board or its agents to assist in such computation.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and upon the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[22]

The Respondent, Consolidated Dress Carriers, Inc., Greenberg's Express Inc., GRG Delivery Inc., Clothing Carriers Corp., Dynamic Delivery Corp., JHT Leasing Corp., and Trucking Personnel, Inc., New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discouraging membership in or activities on behalf of Local 20408, United Warehouse Industrial and Affiliated Trades Employees Union, and Cloak & Dress Drivers & Helpers Union, Local 102, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, AFL-CIO, herein called Local 20408 and Local 102, respectively, or any other labor organization; or interfering with, restraining, and coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act by failing and refusing to reinstate its striking employees to their former positions, or to other substantially equivalent jobs for which such employees are reasonably well qualified, upon their unconditional offer to return to work; or by discriminating against employees in any other manner in regard to their hire or tenure of employment or any other term or condition of employment.

(b) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their right to self-organization, to form labor organizations, to join or assist Local 20408 and Local 102 or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, to engage in concerted activities for purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any and all such activities.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer to the employees set forth in Appendix A [omitted from publication] immediate reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs are no longer available, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, time cards, personnel records and reports and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its office located at 141 West 35th Street, New York City, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[23] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by it to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 2, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

[22] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[23] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted By Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Gerson Electric Construction Company and James Jennings. Case 13–CA–20580

December 10, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS JENKINS AND HUNTER

On August 31, 1981, Administrative Law Judge William A. Gershuny issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM A. GERSHUNY, Administrative Law Judge: A hearing was held on July 23–24, 1981, on complaint issued December 19, 1980, alleging a single violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. At issue is whether Respondent unlawfully laid off electrician Jennings because of his efforts to enforce a contract provision concerning starting times on the job.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of witness demeanor, I hereby make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent, an electrical contractor, with annual shipments of goods interstate in excess of $50,000, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 134, AFL–CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

In the relevant period of 1980, Respondent was an electrical contractor with several dozen jobs proceeding concurrently in the Chicago area under a labor agreement with IBEW Local 134. That contract contains a grievance-arbitration procedure, a provision for appointment of job stewards by the Local Union business agent, a provision absolutely banning any discrimination against stewards "for the faithful performance of their duties" to insure compliance with the contract, a provision giving contractors virtually unfettered rights to lay off employees or transfer them from job-to-job within the geographical jurisdiction of the Local Union, and a provision giving no seniority protection to workmen such as those here.

Two of Respondent's jobsites are involved in this case. At the Transportation Building on South Dearborn Street, Respondent obtained permission from a Local Union business agent to vary the contract starting time and begin work at 7 a.m. On September 23, 1980, six electricians, including Jennings, were referred by the Local Union to this job. In his 1 week on the job, Jennings, who was not the steward, complained to another business agent about the starting time and had heated discussions with Foreman Morton as to the availability of toilets and water, the safe use of the staircase and manlift, his right to drink coffee on the job, and his right to leave the jobsite to put money in parking meters. On September 30, Jennings and another employee were transferred to the Hampton House job site in South Chi-

[1] In his exceptions, the General Counsel contends that the Administrative Law Judge failed to make any findings concerning the testimony offered by employee James R. Hicks, which tended to establish that Respondent did in fact plan to rid itself of employee James Jennings for reasons proscribed by the Act, and that the Board should therefore reverse the Administrative Law Judge's Decision concluding that Jennings had not been unlawfully discharged. We find no merit in the General Counsel's contention. Inasmuch as the Administrative Law Judge based his findings upon his "observation of witness demeanor," we conclude that it is implicit in his general statement regarding credibility that he has discredited Hicks' testimony, since it conflicts with the facts as described by Respondent's officials, whose testimony, his Decision makes clear, he has completely credited. Kimball Tire Co., Inc., 240 NLRB 343, 344, fn. 5 (1979). Therefore, in considering the General Counsel's exceptions to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge, we have also reviewed his implicit resolution with respect to Hicks. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

In sec. III, par. 2, of his Decision, the Administrative Law Judge found that Jennings and another employee were transferred from Respondent's Transportation Building jobsite to its Hampton House jobsite on September 30, 1980. The record reveals that Respondent transferred two employees from the Transportation Building, but only Jennings was assigned to the Hampton House site. The error is hereby corrected.

Member Jenkins does not rely on Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). That decision concerns identifying the cause of discharge where a genuine lawful and genuine unlawful reason exist. Where, as here, the asserted unlawful reasons (Jennings' activities) were not to any degree a motiviating factor in Respondent's decision, only one genuine reason remains—the lawful one. The attempt to apply Wright Line in such a situation is futile, confusing, and misleading.

cago. It is noteworthy that counsel for the General Counsel makes no contention here that this transfer was violative of the Act; that no grievance was filed by Jennings; that a discrimination charge was filed by Jennings with OSHA based on his safety complaints; and that Jennings later filed an intraunion charge against Foreman (and Union member) Morton which did not refer to a starting time dispute with Morton.

The Hampton House job, commenced in 1978, but interrupted from June until September 22, 1980, because of a contract dispute with the owner, consisted of the rehabilitation of an occupied apartment building and its conversion to condominium apartments. Between September 22 and 30, the work was performed by Foreman (and union member) Hammersmith and two electricians; on September 30, because of manpower needs, Jennings was transferred to the job where he remained for 3 days until October 3, when the job again was temporarily shut down by Respondent for reasons and under circumstances detailed below. At this jobsite, as in the case of the other, Respondent earlier had obtained permission from a local business agent to begin work at 7 a.m.

Upon reporting late to the Hampton House job, Jennings briefly met with Foreman Hammersmith, was briefed on the work to be done and, in turn, talked about his "problems" with Foreman Morton on the last job. Hammersmith advised Jennings not to be concerned because, here, he started with a clean slate. Jennings met with the two other electricians, who were working as a team installing new metering for each apartment, briefly discussed and agreed to go along with the 7 a.m. starting time and, apparently, was "elected" steward by default. Jennings advised Hammersmith of his intent to raise the starting time issue at the next Local Union meeting. That meeting was held on October 2 and Jennings did not demand an 8 a.m. starting time until Friday morning, October 3, when he met with Hammersmith.

Later, during the morning of October 3, Hammersmith advised Jennings and the two other electricians that the job again was to be shut down and that Respondent's personnel manager had been asked to determine if there were other Respondent jobs to which the three men might be transferred. Jennings complained that Respondent was out to get him and that he wanted a layoff rather than a transfer. Temporary positions were found for the other two, more senior electricians, but none was available for Jennings who, thereafter, was laid off. On the same day, Respondent laid off 10 other electricians from other jobs.

Jennings was aware of the effects of a layoff, as opposed to a transfer. In the former case, he would be entitled to unemployment compensation, but could be returned to work only through the Local Union's referral system. In the latter case, he would continue to work within the Local Union's geographical jurisdiction at the same rate of pay and at the same position and could be returned to work at Hampton House when the job was resumed.

The Friday morning decision to temporarily close down the Hampton House job, as credibly testified to by Respondent's officials, followed discussions on Thursday morning between Hammersmith and Project Manager Sembinini concerning difficulties in gaining access to several occupied apartments at the same time to permit wiring and nondelivery of custom metering and fire-escape lighting materials. It was then decided to shut down the job until the problems could be resolved, despite the fact that the work had only recently resumed and Respondent was anxious to retain the good will of the customer.

Several days later, the apartment access problem was resolved, overdue deliveries were received, and work was resumed on October 8, 1980, the following Wednesday. Because the two other electricians were working for Respondent on another site, they were reassigned to the Hampton House job. Later, five other electricians were put on the job and remained until its completion on February 3, 1981.

Again, it is noteworthy that Jennings did not grieve this layoff, because, admittedly, he felt it was legal.

I am unable to credit Jennings' testimony for a number of reasons. First, I am left with the clear impression that his court room version of the facts was tailored to meet counsel's legal theory as opposed to representing his best recollection of past events. In this regard, it is interesting that, in 1980, he filed no grievance under the labor agreement because he was convinced that the October 3 layoff was "legal," despite the fact that, if, as contended now, the layoff were because of his efforts as a steward to enforce the starting provisions of the contract, it clearly would have violated article VIII of the contract which provides: "Under no circumstances shall stewards be discriminated against for the faithful performance of their duties as such"; that the starting time controversy with Foreman Morton of which much was made at the hearing was not referred to in his written intraunion charge against Morton; and that his OSHA discrimination charge was based on a contention that the layoff was motivated because of his safety complaints at the earlier jobsite. Second, his testimony represents overstatements and exaggerations. In this connection, Jennings went to great lengths to establish knowledge by Foreman Hammersmith of Jennings' safety and contract complaints and his difficulties with Foreman Morton at the first jobsite, testifying that, after arriving 1 hour late at the Hampton House job, he bared his prior work history to Hammersmith for 2 hours before commencing work. This testimony is contradicted not only by Hammersmith, but also by coemployee Hicks and seeks, unsuccessfully, to convince me that a foreman would be so interested in the tale as to permit 3 hours of nonproductivity at $15.15 an hour at a job which recently resumed after a lengthy shutdown over a price dispute with the owner. Third, Jennings sought hard to establish that he was steward on this 3-day, three-man job and had full knowledge of Respondent's access to materials and its ability to continue the job uninterrupted. Of course, on the first day of his 3 days on the job, he was 1 hour late, related his work history to the foreman for 2 hours and apparently spent considerable time away from his work area visiting the other two electricians to discuss appointment of a steward, telephoning the Local Union office and busying himself with the weekly steward report forms. On the third day, he spent part of his day in discussions with Foreman Hammersmith about the starting time, another part in discussion with Hammersmith and Sembinini concerning the prospects of a transfer or a layoff and another part completing a weekly steward report (of which the Local Union has no record), leaving the jobsite 1 hour early. His ability to testify as to availability of materials and Respondent's ability to continue the job is wholly unconvincing.

Assuming without deciding that this slender evidentiary thread satisfies the General Counsel's burden, under Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), of establishing a prima facie case, I nevertheless find and conclude that Jennings' activities were not to any degree a motivating factor in Respondent's October 3 decision and that the job would have been closed down and Jennings laid off regardless of any protected activity on his part.

There is no doubt whatever in my mind that Respondent's operational decisions were motivated solely by business considerations. The apartment access problems and material shortages were real, as were the uncertainties as to the time of their solution. That they came several days after the closure has no bearing on Respondent's motives to close down in the first place. Nor is there doubt as to the bona fides of Respondent's efforts to transfer the three employees to other positions. Here, again, the record clearly portrays that effort, despite the fact that Respondent was in the process that very day of laying off 10 other electricians at other locations.

On the record here, it is impossible to conclude that a contractor of this size would jeopardize its contract with the building owner and its relations with the Local Union which supplies its workmen simply because a steward voiced complaints over a starting time previously approved at both jobsites by the Local Union itself. The complaint must be dismissed.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, the transcript as corrected, and the entire record, including an exceptionally able closing argument by counsel for General Counsel who waived the filing of a post-trial brief, and, pursuant to Section 10(c), I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[1]

It is ordered that the motion of the counsel for the General Counsel to correct the transcript be, and the same hereby is, granted.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be, and the same hereby is, dismissed.

[1] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Kaiser Steel Corporation and International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, District Lodge No. 190, Local Lodge No. 1492. Case 20-CA-15515

December 11, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS JENKINS AND HUNTER

On July 30, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Timothy D. Nelson issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

AMENDED CONCLUSION OF LAW

In accordance with our finding in the second paragraph of footnote 2, supra we hereby amend the Administrative Law Judge's Conclusion of Law 4 to read as follows:

"4. By refusing to permit such striking employees to remove their personally owned tools from its Napa plant in order to impair their ability to obtain other employment during the strike and under circumstances where, absent a strike, Respondent normally permits its employees to remove their tools for their own purposes, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of rights protected by Sections 7 and 13 of the Act, and has discriminated against employees with respect to their terms and conditions of employment in order to discourage membership in, or activities on behalf of, labor organizations, and thereby has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act."

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Kaiser Steel Corporation, Napa, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in said recommended Order.

---

[1] In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

[2] In finding that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by enforcing its policy of refusing to permit its striking employees to remove their personally owned tools from Respondent's Napa, California, facility, we do not rely on the Administrative Law Judge's comment at par. 7 of the section entitled "Analysis and Conclusions" that Fraley & Schilling, Inc., 211 NLRB 422 (1974), is dispositive of the case herein. We regard that case as distinguishable and rely instead on the remainder of his analysis.

We also note that, at par. 6 of the section entitled "Analysis and Conclusions," the Administrative Law Judge inartfully characterized Respondent's policy with respect to the removal of personally owned tools during the course of a strike. The record more accurately reflects that, absent a strike, Respondent normally permits its employees to remove their tools for personal use.

Chairman Van de Water and Member Hunter find it unnecessary to rely on Gary-Hobart Water Corporation, 210 NLRB 742 (1974), inasmuch as there is no "no-strike" clause at issue herein.

259 NLRB No. 85

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

TIMOTHY D. NELSON, Administrative Law Judge: International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, District Lodge No. 190, Local Lodge No. 1492 (herein called Machinists), filed an original and amended unfair labor practice charge on July 22 and August 26, 1980,[1] respectively, against Kaiser Steel Corporation (herein called Kaiser). After an investigation, the Regional Director for Region 20 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing against Kaiser on August 27.

I heard the matter at Vallejo, California, on February 10, 1981.

The General Counsel and Kaiser each filed timely post-trial briefs which I have carefully considered.

Question Presented

Did Kaiser violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, by its admitted actions in prohibiting employees engaged in a protected strike from removing their personally owned tools from its struck plant premises, where its admitted primary motivation was to "pressure" strikers to abandon the strike by making it impossible for them to use their tools to obtain interim employment elsewhere, and under circumstances where Kaiser otherwise permits employees to remove their tools from the plant for their own use?

FINDINGS OF FACT

There are no material disputed questions of fact. The findings below derive from the uncontradicted and credited testimony of the witnesses and the parties' stipulations.

There were four witnesses. Kaiser's personnel manager, Michael Brundy, testified, inter alia, that Kaiser has "a policy during strikes not to allow tools to be removed basically to pressure employees into accepting [Kaiser's proposed] agreement terms and going back to work,"[2]

---

[1] All dates are in 1980 unless otherwise specified.

[2] Brundy also testified that another reason for preventing removal of tools, although of lesser significance to Kaiser, is the desire to minimize and that this policy was implemented during a strike in July, as well as in some individual cases during strikes in 1974 and 1977, but that the policy has never been put in writing nor otherwise generally published. Machinists Business Representative Samuel Willis testified, inter alia, that he had never heard of such a policy until he learned that Kaiser had applied it during the July strike. Employees Robert Martin and James Boyles testified, inter alia, that Kaiser's agent, Brundy, refused to permit them to remove their tools during the July strike. I credit all of that testimony as just summarized in the main text, and make certain supplemental findings below.

Kaiser makes steel products at a plant in Napa, California,[3] where it employs about 850 employees who are represented by 8 craft unions, including the Machinists.

Kaiser requires its 50–70 journeymen machinists to furnish their own tool sets to use in connection with their normal work, just as it does its welders and electricians who are represented by other craft unions. These sets are normally stored in the plant. The tool sets owned by its journeymen machinists have a typical value of at least $2,500 per set. Except when they are on strike, Kaiser permits its employees to take their tools out of the plant. The record does not suggest that Kaiser claims any right to, or does, place any restrictions on, the use to which the employees may put those tools when they are thus removed.

In July, the Machinists and other craft unions including the Boilermakers were bargaining with Kaiser for new labor agreements to replace ones which had recently expired in their respective units. On July 11, the Boilermakers called a strike and established picket lines at the Napa plant. Employees represented by the Machinists honored the picket line and refused to work until the Boilermakers strike was called off on July 24.[4]

On July 14, journeyman machinist Martin located a job with another employer to tide him over during the strike. The job likewise required that he furnish his own tools. He went to Kaiser's plant on the same day to remove his toolset and Personnel Manager Brundy refused to allow him to do so. When Martin pressed the issue, Brundy said to him: "The only way that you're going to get any tools off this yard is if you terminate. That's up to you." Martin told fellow journeyman machinist Boyle about his experience and, together, they returned to the plant for a second try. Brundy again refused to permit either of them to remove their tools. After further discussion, however, Brundy permitted Martin and Boyle to enter the plant to apply a preservative to their toolsets so they would not rust while in disuse.

Analysis and Conclusions

The General Counsel, citing Erie Resistor,[5] argues that Kaiser's admitted actions were "inherently destructive" of important employee rights under Section 7 of the Act, especially the right to strike, which is also the subject of special recognition in Section 13 of the Act.[6]

Kaiser, dismissing the quoted phrase above as mere "buzz words,"[7] argues that Kaiser simply used an "economic weapon" at its disposal by impounding strikers' tools during the strike. Kaiser analogizes its actions to another use of "economic weapons" legitimately reserved to employers—that of the lockout. Kaiser further argues that employees' rights under the Act have never been held to include the "right" to obtain outside employment during a strike without interference by the struck employer. Kaiser thus claims that the Act does not prohibit its tool-impoundment tactic.

Neither party has called my attention to strict decisional precedent. My own research discloses no cases which are factually the same, but I believe that the Board's decision in Fraley & Schilling, Inc., 211 NLRB 422 (1974), is arguably pertinent. In that case, there was a strike by drivers for the employer, including some who were "owner-operators" who had title to trucks sold to them by the employer, but who also had entered into "exclusive lease-back" arrangements with the employer. During the strike, the employer sought to "repossess" the trucks stored by the owner-operators at their homes or at other locations away from the employer's terminal. Other owner- operators who did not join the strike were permitted to keep their trucks where they normally stored them. The Board found that the employer's conduct in this regard violated Section 8(a) (3) and (1) of the Act.

Although it is not clear that the striking owner-operators intended to use the trucks to gain revenues from hauling for other firms, the employer, in attempting to repossess the trucks, told one owner-operator that he would not be permitted "to use the truck elsewhere." Id. at 436.

Although the employer in Fraley & Schilling committed numerous independent violations of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, the Board did not link its finding of a violation in the truck repossession instances to such additional violations. The Board merely concluded that it the possibility of sabotage or theft. I do not find it necessary, in view of my ultimate disposition, to determine whether these latter considerations played any role whatsoever in prompting the development of Kaiser's tool impoundment policy during strikes.

[3] In calendar year 1979, Kaiser sold and shipped from its Napa plant goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers outside California.

[4] Kaiser would characterize the Machinists actions as a direct economic strike; the General Counsel would characterize their behavior as a "sympathy strike"; i.e., a withholding of services calculated to help the Boilermakers achieve their own economic aims. Both parties acknowledge, however, that the appropriate label for the Machinists strike participation is irrelevant to a resolution of the central issue herein since, under either label, the refusal by Machinists to work was concerted activity protected by the Act. See, e.g., Gary-Hobart Water Corporation, 210 NLRB 742 (1974), enfd. 511 F.2d 284 (7th Cir. 1975), cert. denied 423 U.S. 925 (1975).

[6] Sec. 7 of the Act guarantees to employees, inter alia:

> . . . the right to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively . . . and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and . . . the right to refrain from any or all such activities . . . .

Sec. 13 of the Act states:

> Nothing in this Act, except as specifically provided for herein, shall be construed so as either to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike, or to affect the limitations or qualifications on that right.

[7] Kaiser's br., p. 4.

was "discriminatory" to "penalize" strikers in a "term or condition of employment" by repossessing the trucks. Id. at 423. No extended rationale was offered for this legal conclusion and, therefore, its applicability to the instant case is not entirely clear.

The facts in the instant case are seemingly less favorable to Kaiser on the point at issue than those in Fraley & Schilling were to that employer. There, the employer at least had a colorable claim to have the trucks used only in connection with his own work since he had an "exclusive lease-back" arrangement with the owner-operators. By contrast, Kaiser has not introduced evidence which would suggest that the machinists tools were to be used "exclusively" in connection with work at Kaiser. Indeed, to the contrary, the fact that nonstriking employees are permitted to remove their tools from the plant justifies the inference that they may be used by such nonstrikers for other employment.

Accordingly, I would sustain the complaint herein on the strength of the Board's disposition of Fraley & Schilling. My further analyses and conclusions below address Kaiser's arguments on their merits should a reviewing body determine that this is a case of first impression.

Kaiser stresses that its motive was not "antiunion" or "hostile," citing its longstanding "amicable" bargaining relationship with the Machinists. This much may be acknowledged: Kaiser's tool-impoundment actions were not shown to have been part of any broader attempt to "bust" the Machinists and to remove it as a bargaining agent. Cf. Fraley & Schilling, supra. Rather, Kaiser was simply exploiting its position as a de facto possessor[8] of the tools belonging to its employees to make it more difficult for them to obtain employment in their trade elsewhere during the strike—and thus to make them more tractable to Kaiser's bargaining demands.

Kaiser insists on this latter point, characterizing its actions as merely an effort to use "economic weapons" at its disposal to aid in achieving its collective-bargaining aims. And Kaiser places ultimate reliance on the admonition of the Court in Brown Food Store[9] that "the Act does not constitute the Board as an 'arbiter of the sort of economic weapons the parties can use in seeking to gain acceptance of their bargaining demands.'" (Id. at 283.) Kaiser further correctly notes that employers have been sustained in the use of certain "economic weapons" which impinge on the exercise of statutory rights, such as the use of postimpasse lockouts (American Ship Building, supra), and even lockouts while continuing to operate the business with replacements (Brown Food, supra).Thus, Kaiser would apparently have me hold that once an employer's actions against strikers may be characterized as the use of "economic weapons" which are merely employed in furtherance of some bargaining aim, such conduct is beyond the reach of the Act's proscriptions.

I reject Kaiser's position. Neither Brown Food nor American Ship Building took the Board out of the business of performing the "delicate task . . . of weighing the interests of employees in concerted activity against the interest of the employer in operating his business in a particular manner and of balancing in the light of the Act and its policy the intended consequences upon employee rights against the business ends to be served by the employer's conduct." Erie Resistor, supra at 229. Indeed, the Court in Brown Food adhered to the view that the Board must, in the exercise of its proper function, engage in such balancing tasks (id. at 282; see also American Ship Building, supra at 309).

Accordingly, while the Board may not be an "arbiter of the sorts of economic weapons the parties can use," neither may it abdicate its balancing task where, as I conclude below, Kaiser's choice of "economic weapons" conflicts with important employee rights under the Act. As the Court has recognized, this is an "often delicate" task, and it is especially so where the Court has not clearly defined the extent to which the "economic" impact of an employer's actions on the exercise of protected rights by employees may properly influence the "balancing" process.

It is clear, however, that the Board need not be blind to the potential economic impact on the exercise of employees' rights of permitting an employer to wield certain weapons. Indeed, it was with a view to the likely economic consequences that the Court was moved to conclude in Brown Foods that unless employers faced with "whipsaw" strike tactics were permitted to lock out union-represented employees and to continue to operate their business with replacements, they would be virtually helpless to respond to such tactics.[10] Given those unique economic realities, the Court therefore found it "wholly consistent with a legitimate business purpose" for the employer to have locked out nonstriking employees and continued its operations with replacements. Id. at 285.

Accordingly, the question presented here by Kaiser's attempt to prevent strikers from obtaining work elsewhere is not disposed of in Kaiser's favor merely by labeling Kaiser's actions as the use of an "economic weapon," nor by establishing that Kaiser was merely attempting to enhance its relative bargaining strength in its tool-impoundment tactic, and was not trying to achieve a total removal of the Machinists as the employees' bargaining agent. Instead, in assessing the legality of Kaiser's efforts to preclude strikers from gaining other employment during the strike, I must take into account the potential of that action for "creating visible and continuing obstacles to the future exercise of employee rights."[11]

In doing so, I start with the observation—to me an inescapable one—that Kaiser's tool-impoundment was a plain and visible act of discrimination directed against strikers—and only strikers—which would necessarily be viewed by them as punitive. Strikers could draw no other conclusion from the fact that Kaiser permits employees to remove their tools, including for use in outside work, unless they exercise their right to strike. It is further inescapable in my view that such discrimination necessarily discourages or tends to discourage the future exercise of such protected rights—a consequence which it could be presumed that Kaiser intended,[12] even absent the candid concession of Kaiser's agent, Brundy, that Kaiser specifically intended that its tool-impoundment tactic would have a direct impact on strikers' choices whether to remain on strike. See also in this regard Kaiser's acknowledgement on brief (pp. 2-3) that:

[10] Id. at 284–285, in which the Court sympathized with the "dilemma" of an employer-member of a multiemployer bargaining group in such a situation, noting that the whipsaw strike "enjoys an almost inescapable prospect of success" unless a nonstruck employer-member may defensively lock out unionized employees and continue to operate with replacements.

> The primary purpose of this policy is to make it difficult for its striking employees to find interim employment elsewhere during the strike, with the intended result that said employees would be economically induced to terminate their strike on terms more favorable to Kaiser.

Thus, it is evident that if employees whose trade requires them—as the machinists' trade frequently does—to furnish their own tools as a condition of employment, then surely they will be inhibited in future striking by the knowledge that Kaiser will seize their tools and thus minimize their chances of securing outside employment during a strike.

It is properly noticeable in an administrative law system which deals regularly with the phenomena of strikes and other disputes surrounding the collective-bargaining process that strikers normally seek outside earnings during a strike. Thus, it has been observed that "Strikers certainly must support themselves during a strike and other employment is often the best, if not their only means of doing so."[13] It is therefore appropriate to take into account in this analysis the fact that Kaiser's actions, if permitted, would virtually preclude machinists from exercising the traditional option of seeking outside employment in their trade during a strike.

Moreover, I envision a number of additional troubling prospects in giving Kaiser license to impair the outside employment prospects of strikers by impounding their tools. Thus, if Kaiser's position is correct, then it seems equally open to it to use other "economic" measures to prevent strikers' employment elsewhere. For example, Kaiser could presumably use its economic influence in a community to discourage other businesses from hiring employees who have gone on strike against it—in short, to engage in an attempt to "blacklist" strikers in the community.[14] Or, to the extent that it were held that Kaiser may impound the tools which its strikers store in its plant, nothing would then seem to prevent it from sending agents to strikers' homes, garages, or other places where they might store tools in order to seize the tools and hold them hostage as a device to gain bargaining "leverage."[15]

Kaiser also emphasizes on brief (p. 2) that "Kaiser did not prevent employees from removing their tools at the end of their last shift prior to the strike, which many did." The potential legal significance of this information eludes me. If Kaiser's analogy to the lockout in American Ship Building is correct, then the presence or absence of a strike-in-progress is irrelevant; and Kaiser would presumably enjoy the right to impound tools on the eve of a strike—or even sooner; i.e., at whatever point at which a bargaining impasse has been reached and Kaiser decides to "bring its economic pressure to bear in support of its bargaining position." Id. at 308. Accordingly, Kaiser's failure to impound tools before the strike started does not affect the question of the legality of its admitted actions.

Kaiser argues predictably that the legality of its actions should not be determined solely by reference to the economic disadvantage which those actions visit on strikers. And it is true, as the Court observed in American Ship Building, (supra at 313):

> . . . there is nothing in the Act which gives employees the right to insist on their contract demands, free from the sort of economic disadvantage which frequently attends bargaining disputes.

But resort to these and similar comments by the Court, rendered in the context of weighing the legality of an employer's actions taken as part of the exercise of his traditional prerogative to manage his own business, is suspect in the context of this case. In the first instance, as noted above, Kaiser was not performing a traditional business-management function when it told strikers that they could not retrieve their own property from its plant. Traditional business considerations (e.g., prevention of sabotage or theft) were admittedly subordinate to its desire to prevent strikers from working elsewhere. Secondly, as an empirical matter, an employer's effort to interfere with a striker's ability to find interim work elsewhere is not the sort of "economic disadvantage which frequently attend[s] bargaining disputes." Accordingly, the Court's observations in those cases do not dictate the result herein.

While attempts to draw parallels between the rights of strikers and those of struck employers carry with them certain inherent difficulties, it must be recognized that there is a certain one-sidedness in Kaiser's position. At bottom, Kaiser suggests that employers should not only be privileged in continuing to operate with permanent replacements during a strike,[16] thereby maintaining their own flow of earnings, but that they should also be privileged in taking further measures to ensure that strikers not similarly be able to obtain earnings during a strike.

[15] Kaiser nowhere argues that it had some right under property law to refuse to release the machinists' tools upon demand. Indeed, although it need not be determined herein, Kaiser's actions almost certainly involved a tortious conversion of its employees' tools which Kaiser merely held in a form of bailment for their mutual benefit. Kaiser would argue here—correctly, in my view—that its status as a civil or criminal law violator does not, per se, determine whether or not it violated employee rights under the Act. Thus, it would argue equally in the hypothetical situation just posed that nothing in the Act prohibited it from seizing employees' tools wherever they might be found.

In reality therefore, Kaiser seeks recognition of an entirely new arsenal of economic weaponry for use by struck employers. And, unlike the defensive lockout tactics legitimized by the Court in Brown Food and American Ship Building as measures which were appropriately tailored to unique business needs,[17] Kaiser's actions were not developed in response to any extraordinary challenge by the striking union. Neither did its impoundment of tools merely involve decisions about how, and under what circumstances, it would "manage its enterprise." American Ship Building, supra at 311. Instead, Kaiser sought to reach beyond internal management measures to measures designed to harm employees' options in finding other work in their trade during the strike.

It is not easy to discern precisely what "legitimate interest" of Kaiser's in seizing strikers' tools it is that should be "balanced" against the demonstrable harm to employees' traditional striking rights which were occasioned by Kaiser's actions. Kaiser would presumably claim that it is sufficient to show that Kaiser was merely trying to enhance its bargaining position by its actions. This "business interest" is, however, of an entirely different character than the unique purposes which were served by the respective employers' lockout actions in Brown Food and American Ship Building. One need not deny the legitimacy of such an interest as Kaiser rests on herein, but it is clearly one which is common to every struck employer; and it is difficult to assume that the Court intended in the cited cases to give blanket approval to any and all "economic" tactics by employers against strikers, without regard to their long-range potential for discouraging the use of the statutory right to strike.

In the final analysis, if the balancing function of the Board is to have substance, it must include an assessment of the economic impact on employees—and hence on their exercise of protected rights—of "weapons" chosen by employers to achieve for themselves the greatest possible bargaining leverage. If Kaiser may take advantage of the fortuities of its tool-storage arrangement to prevent the removal of those tools from its plant for use by strikers in interim employment elsewhere, there is no obvious reason why Kaiser could not with equal claim of legitimacy under the Act take other measures to prevent strikers from working elsewhere. And, if an employer may impair or frustrate entirely strikers' abilities to find other employment while the employer remains free to operate his business through the use of permanent replacements, then the exercise of the right to strike will be hollow indeed. For the obtaining of other employment by strikers has been the primary means by which they survive a strike of any substantial duration; and they will not exercise the right to strike if it means that they must bankrupt themselves to do so.

Congress, in exhibiting "repeated solicitude" for the right to strike,[18] did not thereby purport to guarantee that strikers would feel no economic pinch, or that they would always be successful in their striking aims, but it was at least contemplated that: "[a] legitimately-employed strike . . . in great measure implements and supports the principles of the collective bargaining system."[19]

The use of "weapons" calculated to render it difficult or impossible for strikers to obtain earnings elsewhere during a strike would render most striking economically futile from the employees' standpoint, and would thus eliminate the exercise of a right deemed important by Congress in "implement[ing] and support[ing]" the goals which Congress had in mind in establishing a national system of collective bargaining. Ibid.

Accordingly, I must conclude that Kaiser's actions were inherently destructive of important rights guaranteed to employees by Sections 7 and 13 of the Act. I must further conclude that Kaiser's claim of business justification—the desire to achieve leverage in collective bargaining—does not outweigh the considerations of public policy which are reflected, inter alia, in the "special deference" Congress gave to the right to strike including by the "positive command of Section 13 that the right to strike is to be given a generous interpretation within the scope of the . . . Act."[20]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Kaiser is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Machinists is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Employees represented by the Machinists were engaged in concerted striking activity protected by Sections 7 and 13 of the Act when, between July 11 and July 24, 1980, they honored a primary economic strike and picketing and refrained from entering Kaiser's Napa plant to perform their normal work there.

4. By refusing to permit such striking employees to remove their personally owned tools from its Napa plant in order to impair their ability to obtain other employment during the strike and under circumstances where Kaiser normally permits its nonstriking employees to remove their tools for their own purposes, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of rights protected by Sections 7 and 13 of the Act, and has discriminated against employees with respect to their terms and conditions of employment in order to discourage membership in, or activities on behalf of, labor organizations, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Kaiser violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by its tool-impoundment tactic against strikers, I shall recommend that Kaiser be ordered to cease and desist from those, or like or related, actions; and that it take certain remedial action, including the posting of a remedial notice to its employees at its Napa plant.

[20] Id. at 234–335.

There is a question whether Kaiser should also be subjected to a "make whole" order. The proof at the hearing revealed that employees Martin and Boyles were prohibited from removing their tools, but Martin further testified that he was able to locate another toolset to use on the interim job which he had secured. Boyles states that he made two unsuccessful efforts to find interim work,[21] but then gave up, "knowing that I couldn't get a job because I couldn't get my tools." The General Counsel's brief is silent as to the appropriate remedy for the violation which he alleged. Fraley & Schilling does not provide clear guidance on this question.[22]

It strikes me as entirely appropriate, in the present circumstances, however, that Kaiser be ordered to make whole any strikers who were impaired in their ability to obtain earnings during the strike by Kaiser's refusal to let them remove their tools from the plant. Neither does it appear to be fatal to the propriety of such a make-whole order that no specific employee was shown at the unfair labor practice stage of these proceedings to have been denied some available job because of Kaiser's unlawful practices, especially where it would have been "futile" for strikers to have attempted to find such work when Kaiser was wrongfully impounding their tools. See, e.g., Pipeline Local Union No. 38, affiliated with the Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL-CIO (Hancock-Northwest, J. V.), 247 NLRB 1250, 1251 (1980), and authorities cited. The complaint attacked Kaiser's general prohibition against removal of tools by strikers, and Kaiser admits that it was acting pursuant to a general policy and not merely withholding tools from particular individuals. Under those circumstances, I would not preclude the General Counsel from showing at the compliance stage, if the facts may so reveal, that strikers, including Boyles and others, were injured financially by Kaiser's refusal to release their tools. I have therefore provided in my recommended Order that Kaiser make any such employees whole, with interest, in accordance with established Board policies for the computation of backpay.[23]

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and upon the entire record herein, I issue the following recommended:

ORDER[24]

The Respondent, Kaiser Steel Corporation, Napa, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Penalizing employees who are engaged in a lawful economic strike by discriminatorily refusing to permit them to remove their tools from its plant in order to prevent them from obtaining interim work elsewhere.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Sections 7 and 13 of the Act, or discriminating against them with respect to their terms and conditions of employment in order to discourage membership in or activities on behalf of a labor organization.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Make whole with interest any employees who suffered losses of earnings during the period July 11-24, 1980, because they were prevented, in furtherance of Kaiser's unlawful tool-impoundment policy, from removing their tools to work at interim jobs.

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, all records which would aid in establishing the identities of striking employees in the period July 11-24, 1980, and any such employees who attempted unsuccessfully to remove their tools from Kaiser's Napa, California, plant.

(c) Post at its Napa, California, plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[25] Copies of the notice, on forms duly provided by the Regional Director for Region 20, after being duly signed by Kaiser's authorized representative, shall be posted immediately in conspicuous places, including in all places where notices to employees are customarily posted, and shall remain posted for 60 consecutive days thereafter. Kaiser shall take reasonable steps to ensure that such notices are not altered, defaced, nor covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 20, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply with it.

[21] Boyles' lack of success in the two job-search contacts he mentioned was because those firms had no openings—not because he had no tools.

[22] In that case, the administrative law judge did not clearly explicate why he found it appropriate that employees Clark and Woods be made whole for losses sustained in connection with the discriminatory repossessions, but not for periods while they were on strike (211 NLRB at 444). It may be that the Board, in adopting this portion of the administrative law judge's remedial recommendations—believed that the employer's "exclusive lease-back" rights would not have permitted striking owner-operators to use the trucks to gain independent earnings.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Van de Water and Members Jenkins and Hunter

On July 28, 1981, Administrative Law Judge James T. Barker issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed an exception.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exception and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.[2]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified herein, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Holiday Inn of Santa Maria, Santa Maria, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(c):

"(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

We will not, by inferring a threat to their job security, instruct our employees not to contact or consult with the Union, or representatives thereof, concerning problems or matters relating to their terms and conditions of employment, without first consulting with supervision or management with respect thereto.

We will not constructively discharge employees for contacting the Union concerning overtime pay or any other matter relating to their wages, hours, or terms and conditions of employment.

We will not in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

We will offer Paul Flores, who was constructively discharged on March 2, 1979, immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if such job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges.

We will make Paul Flores whole for any loss of earnings, plus interest, he may have suffered as a result of having been constructively discharged.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

James T. Barker, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me at Santa Maria, California, on January 20, 21, 22, 28, and 29, 1981, pursuant to an order consolidating cases, consolidated amended complaint and notice of hearing issued on July 22, 1980, by the Regional Director of the National Labor Relations Board for Region 31. The charge in Case 31-CA-8817 was filed by the Culinary Alliance and Bartenders Union, Local No. 703, Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL-CIO, hereinafter called the Union, on March 13, 1979, and was duly served upon Respondent; and the charge in Case 31-CA-9593 was

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to the failure of the Administrative Law Judge to state, in his Conclusion of Law 4, that by constructively terminating Paul Flores on March 2, 1979, Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. The evidence supports the conclusion that Respondent's conduct violated said section, and the analysis of the Administrative Law Judge clearly indicates that his omission was by inadvertence only. We hereby modify the Administrative Law Judge's Conclusions of Law accordingly.

[2] In par. 1(c) of his recommended Order, the Administrative Law Judge included a broad cease-and-desist order against Respondent. We find it unnecessary to impose such a broad order against Respondent. As the General Counsel has not demonstrated that Respondent has a proclivity to violate the Act, or that Respondent has engaged in such widespread or egregious misconduct as to demonstrate a general disregard for its employees' fundamental statutory rights, a broad order is not warranted here. Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). Accordingly, we will modify the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order by substituting narrow cease-and-desist language for the broad language used by the Administrative Law Judge. There is no need to similarly modify the Administrative Law Judge's notice, since it already contains narrow cease-and-desist language.

In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

259 NLRB No. 89

filed by the Union on December 4, 1979, and service on Respondent was duly accomplished.[1] The parties were represented by counsel at the hearing and were provided full opportunity to make opening and closing statements, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to introduce relevant evidence, and to file briefs with me. Counsel for the General Counsel and counsel for Respondent filed briefs with me.

Upon the basis of the entire record, the briefs filed in this matter, and my observation of the witnesses, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

At all material times Respondent has been a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of California, with an office and principal place of business located in Santa Maria, California, where it is engaged in the operation of a hotel providing food and lodging to guests.

In the course and conduct of its business operations, Respondent annually purchases and receives goods or services in excess of $2,000 from sellers or suppliers located within the State of California, which sellers or suppliers receive such goods in substantially the same form directly from outside the State of California. Additionally, in the course and conduct of its business operations, Respondent annually derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000.

Upon the foregoing facts, which are not in dispute, I find that at all times material herein Holiday Inn of Santa Maria has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent concedes, and I find, that at all times material herein the Union has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The consolidated complaint gives rise to the following basic issues:

1. Whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by reducing the pay of Paul Flores on or about February 1, and by constructively discharging Flores on or about March 2.
2. Whether Respondent unlawfully terminated Deborah Mastriano on or about November 28, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and/or (3) of the Act.
3. Whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening to terminate Flores if he took complaints to the Union; by instructing employees in a meeting to bypass the Union and register any complaints directly with management upon threat of termination; and by separately instructing an employee to bypass the Union and take complaints directly to management.

Respondent denies the commission of any unfair labor practices and affirmatively contends, in substance, that Flores' termination was voluntary and not constructively caused. Further, Respondent asserts that Mastriano was terminated because she was grossly insubordinate and, in any event, the General Counsel failed in this proceeding to establish a prima facie showing that Mastriano's protected concerted activity was a substantial or motivating factor in her termination.

B. Pertinent Facts

1. Background facts

Stock ownership of Respondent is vested in seven stockholders, none of whom has professional training or experience in the operation of a hotel or restaurant enterprise. Prior to 1978 management of the Santa Maria facility was vested in a professional manager, with oversight and ultimate operational authority residing in the seven-member board of directors. In November 1978 the professional manager resigned following disclosures of improprieties in the operation of the hotel, including its restaurant and bar facility. In close conjunction with this event three of the stockholders, representing a 64-percent ownership of the total outstanding shares, formed an executive committee to assume control of the enterprise. Roger Ikola, a medical doctor specializing in the practice of pediatrics, became one of the members of the executive committee. Dr. Ikola's stock ownership was slightly in excess of 20 percent of the outstanding shares. For a transitional period of approximately 5 days, the day-to-day management of the hotel was vested in an interim manager. Key personnel had left following the departure of the prior manager and other personnel resigned in the aftermath. Then, the interim manager resigned for reasons of ill health. To conduce to the orderly conduct of business, Dr. Ikola identified the key personnel remaining in the various phases of the hotel operation and met with them. Deborah Mastriano was one of the individuals who attended this meeting at which Dr. Ikola outlined the problems confronting the hotel. He instructed the individuals present to report directly to the executive committee on matters pertaining to the operation of their area of responsibility and to take direction from the executive committee. After the meeting, Dr. Ikola met separately with Mastriano who had been identified to him as a senior employee assigned to the bar operation. Dr. Ikola charged Mastriano with the responsibility of eliminating the theft of liquor and other impermissible practices in the bar which had come to Dr. Ikola's attention. It was in this framework that Bruno Fava was employed to become manager of the Santa Maria facility.

At the time he was selected by the executive committee to become manager of the Santa Maria hotel operation, Fava had completed approximately 18 years of professional training in all phases of hotel management. Prior to assuming managership of Respondent's operations in December 1978, Fava had served approximately 10 years as general manager of the Vandenberg Inn, a principal hotel operation situated in Santa Maria. For approximately 6 months in 1977-78, Deborah Mastriano had worked as a waitress at the Vandenberg Inn.

The members of the executive committee hired Fava with knowledge of his track record of successful management at the Vandenberg Inn. At the outset, the board of directors instructed Fava to bring the operation under control by developing a chain of command, coordinating closely with the owners as a management team, employing good personnel, and running a "tight ship" in order to avoid the breakdown of discipline and proper supervision, which had contributed to the thefts of supplies and other breaches leading to citations and warnings by health authorities and the Holiday Inns of America, Inc., as well as to a substantial diminution in revenues. Union considerations played no part in either the decision of management to employ Fava as manager or in the formulation of instructions to him.

At pertinent times, Respondent and the Union were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement effective from April 1, 1975, until March 31, 1980. The agreement contained a union-security provision. The relationship between the Union and Respondent was a generally harmonious one. The Vandenberg Inn was a party to the collective-bargaining agreement during the period of time Bruno Fava served as manager there and in that capacity Fava had contacts with Ted Zenich, who served as secretary/treasurer of the Union. Bruno Fava assisted in negotiating the collective-bargaining agreement which became effective in 1975 for a term of 5 years, and he became co-chairman together with Ted Zenich of the Health and Welfare Trust Funds created and maintained pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement.

Fava assumed management of Respondent's hotel operation with a commitment to a concept of systems management calculated to assist management in carefully controlling the purchase and depensing of food and beverages; the utilization of overtime or premium hours; and the acquisition and disposition of physical property. In the initial weeks of his tenure, Fava devoted his principal efforts to correcting the most pressing problems constituting a threat to the retention of the franchise. He recruited his uncle, Frank Fava, an experienced chef with approximately 50 years of experience in the restaurant industry, to serve as executive chef and to assume direct responsibility over the operation of the kitchen and restaurant facility. Fava had served in the capacity of executive chef under Bruno Fava at the Vandenberg Inn. Soon thereafter Bruno Fava removed the timeclocks which had been in use under previous management and instituted the use of daily timesheets requiring employees to sign in and out and to receive independent verification from supervision of hours claimed as overtime. Moreover, Fava instituted a system of ticket control in the cocktail lounge and dining room. Fava had a reputation in the community for running a "tight ship" and some of the personnel at Respondent's facility had worked under him at previous times at the Vandenberg Inn. A quantum of job-related apprehension concerning the future course of events existed among Respondent's employee complement during the early days of Fava's tenure as manager, and Fava was aware of this.

During the initial days of his managership at Respondent's Santa Maria facility, Fava looked for departmental leadership to the department heads and senior employees who remained after the transition in management. Thus, Deborah Mastriano served as bar manager, Richard Castaneda as chef, and until October 1979 Constance Antoigue remained as sales and catering director.[2] Antoigue possessed responsibility for booking and catering of all banquets, for hiring banquet personnel and scheduling their work, and for overseeing their performance in serving banquets. Castaneda relinquished his responsibilities as head of the kitchen operation when Frank Fava assumed his duties as executive chef.

In the spring of 1979 Antoigue, Phyllis Slaughter, and Lisa Ziemba conversed together concerning the advantages or disadvantages of continued union representation of the employees. As a result of their conversation, they agreed to speak with employees to determine their reaction. At the time in question Slaughter was serving as the head waitress on the night shift in the dining room and Ziemba was the dining room hostess. She is the daughter of one of the stockholders of Respondent. Antoigue spoke with approximately 10 employees and inquired whether they were satisfied with the Union and whether they desired to continue to be union members. She had received no instruction from Bruno Fava to undertake this endeavor but she did tell him of her activity. Fava neither encouraged nor discouraged the process.[3]

2. The alleged proscribed conduct

a. The employee meeting

During the first week of December 1978, Bruno Fava called a meeting of employees. The meeting was held in one of the banquet rooms and was attended by dining room, kitchen, and bar personnel. Department heads such as Constance Antoigue, Richard Castaneda, and Deborah Mastriano attended the meeting. Prior to calling the meeting, Fava had received information indicating that employees were contacting the investors directly concerning matters taking place in the transition, and he had received information indicating a quantum of employee resistance to his hire as manager and a fear of losing their jobs.

At the outset of the meeting, Fava introduced himself as the new manager of the establishment and informed the employees, in substance, that the operation was in a state of transition and that effort was being devoted to remedying problems and conditions which had accumulated under the previous management. Fava assured the employees that he was making no major changes but asserted that it was necessary for the employees to work as a team. Fava introduced the department heads and stated that he was organizing the operation on a chain-of-command concept which should be followed both in making suggestions for improving the operation and for lodging complaints. Fava admonished the employees to follow the chain of command by communicating first with the department heads. He added that his door was open to employees for discussion and that, if they could not receive satisfaction from their department heads, they were free to consult with him. Fava added that the employees should follow the chain-of-command concept in seeking to resolve their work-related problems and should consult first with him before going to the Union. Fava stated that if the employees did not follow his instructions, their job would be in jeopardy.[4] In this context he stated that he had known and dealt with Ted Zenich for a number of years. Fava added that Richard McGuinness would be limited to 2 days a month in which to collect dues on the premises. The employees posed questions to Fava during the course of the meeting, and he gave answers. The comments made by Fava in the early portion of the meeting followed a format he had used on previous occasions in prior years at other facilities.[5]

[2] The parties stipulated that at relevant times Antoigue was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Prior to becoming sales and catering director in October 1978, she had served as a waitress in the dining room.

[3] The foregoing is based on a composite of the testimony of Diane Antoigue, Linda Stout, and Cheryl Barr. The thrust of Antoigue's testimony is to the effect that this undertaking was a voluntary one and not at the directive of management. The testimony of Linda Stout provides an inadequate basis to support a finding that the activity was undertaken pursuant to instructions from Bruno Fava.

b. Castaneda seeks time off

During the months of December 1978 and January 1979, Castaneda was working long hours. He communicated his desire for time off to Frank Fava who, in effect, requested Castaneda's forebearance. Finally, in late January Castaneda spoke with Mrs. Roger Ikola, the wife of one of the principal stockholders, and stated his desire to take some time off. Mrs. Ikola stated that she would speak with Bruno Fava concerning the matter. The following day Bruno Fava approached Castaneda and told him that he had the following day off and to have a "nice day." A few days later Bruno Fava approached Castaneda and told him not to speak with Mrs. Ikola about time off but to talk with Frank Fava. Subsequently, Castaneda observed Frank and Bruno Fava speaking together in Frank Fava's office. Thereafter, Frank informed Castaneda not to talk to Mrs. Ikola but to speak with him.[6]

c. Flores contacts the Union

Paul Flores was employed in the capacity of a cook in Respondent's operation from June 1977 until March 2, 1979, with an interruption of service between November 1977 and April 1978. Flores was compensated on an hourly basis until May 1978 when he was placed on salary and informed by the then chef that he would earn $700 per month. In the fall of 1978, Flores' salary was raised to $750 per month. Prior to December 1978, Flores occasionally worked overtime, and he was compensated for his overtime work. Flores was a member of the Union.

Incident to Frank Fava becoming executive chef, Flores commenced working a longer workweek than the 5-day week which had previously prevailed. This intensified schedule of work lasted through December and into January and motivated Flores to approach Frank Fava seeking both a reduction in his total hours and Sundays off for religious observance. Flores also informed Frank Fava that his paychecks had not included overtime compensation. Fava told Flores he would look into the matter, but suggested that Flores speak directly to Bruno Fava. Flores did not do so.

On or about January 20 Flores received his paycheck and approached Brenda Guisinger, one of three bookkeepers then employed.[7] He informed Guisinger that his check did not contain overtime compensation which was due him. Guisinger said that she would look into the matter and she informed Bruno Fava of Flores' complaint. Fava examined Flores' personnel file, and Fava noted that Flores was a salaried employee. He asserted that it was not the policy to pay overtime to salaried employees but instructed Guisinger to check with Frank Fava. Guisinger did so, and Frank Fava confirmed that Flores had worked overtime. Guisinger transmitted this information to Bruno Fava and Fava instructed her to pay Flores. Guisinger went to her office and calculated the amount which she believed was due Flores and spoke with Flores informing him of the amount to which she believed he was entitled. Flores became upset and spoke to Guisinger in a loud voice. He claimed that the amount was quite insufficient and that the Union was "going to hear about it." Guisinger responded that she had perhaps miscalculated the amount and noted that she was in the process of learning her job.[8] Guisinger reported to Bruno Fava the fact that Flores was upset and that she had apparently miscalculated the amount due Flores. Bruno became visibly upset and alluded to the fact that salaried employees were not paid overtime. However, he instructed Guisinger to pay Flores. Guisinger took the matter to one of the more experienced payroll bookkeepers who calculated the sum due Flores, and Guisinger learned that she had, in fact, erred in her earlier calculations.[9] [4] Fava had met earlier with department heads and had issued essentially the same instructions to them.

[5] The foregoing is based upon a composite of the testimony of Bruno Fava, Constance Antoigue, Richard Castaneda, Cheryl Barr, Steven Oclaray, Elinor Bewlay, and Linda Stout. I have also considered the testimony of Deborah Mastriano. I credit the testimony of Fava and Antoigue denying the testimony of Mastriano, Bewlay, and Stout to the effect that Fava stated, in terms, that employee resort to the Union would result in their termination. The testimony of Castaneda and Barr supports, by implication, Fava's denial of any statement so explicit in terms or meaning, for their testimony, like that of Oclaray, reveals that Fava appealed to the employees to come first to him with their problems before going to the Union. Nothing in his remarks per se foreclosed resort to the Union.

[6] The following is based upon the credited testimony of Richard Castaneda. I have also considered the testimony of both Bruno and Frank Fava with respect to the series of conversations which they had concerning Castaneda's time off. I do not credit the testimony of Castaneda to the effect that in separate conversations both Frank Fava and Bruno Fava instructed him not to go to the Union concerning time off. In the first instance, I discern no predicate for the instruction which Castaneda asserts was issued to him by Frank and Bruno Fava. Castaneda had not sought to invoke union aid nor had the Union on the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement been alluded to in the conversations between Castaneda and Bruno and Frank Fava. Moreover, Frank Fava specifically and credibly denied his admonishing Castaneda about union contacts, and Bruno Fava impliedly denied having issued such an instruction. I am convinced upon my observation of Castaneda as he testified before me at the hearing that he rationalized that portion of his testimony relating to warnings issued by the Favas against union contacts, and I do not credit it.

[7] Paychecks were normally received on the 5th and 20th of each month.

[8] Guisinger had previously handled accounts receivable and was in the process of learning payroll at the time in question. She also worked at the front desk.

Subsequently, during the height of the lunch hour, between 12:15 p.m. and 1:15 p.m., Bruno Fava went into the kitchen as part of his normal daily routine. As he entered the kitchen, he observed order tickets placed at the cook's station by waitresses awaiting Flores' attention. At the same time, he observed Flores speaking on the telephone and heard him ask for Ted Zenich. The phone at which Flores was speaking was located proximate to the kitchen entrance which Fava had used and, upon hearing Flores speaking, Fava told Flores to put the phone down and go to his work station. Fava added that the kitchen was busy, and he should make his phone calls on his own time. Nothing further was said. Subsequently, at approximately 2 p.m. or soon thereafter, Fava returned to the kitchen and spoke with Flores. He apologized for shouting at him earlier and explained that he had done so because the phone call had taken place during a busy period. Fava asserted that Flores should have waited until the proper time to inform the Union of any problems, rather than celling during the peak luncheon period. Fava then asked Flores if he was satisfied with the overtime compensation reflected in the revised check. Flores stated that he was.[10] At this point in the conversation, Fava told Flores that he was going to have to put him "back on to a contractual wage." Fava stated that he was doing this because it was his understanding, in substance, that the hours of salaried employees tended to offset and balance out and therefore they were not compensated for overtime on those occasions when they worked extra hours. Flores indicated his acquiescence in Fava's decision. As Fava and Flores conversed together they were observed by Castaneda from across the kitchen.[11]

---

[9] The foregoing is based on a composite of the testimony of Paul Flores, Frank Fava, Bruno Fava, and Brenda Guisinger. To the extent that the testimony of Flores departs from that of the other witnesses, particularly Guisinger and Frank Fava, as to chronology of events surrounding his protest to Guisinger over the amount of overtime pay initially calculated, I reject Flores' testimony. Moreover, I specifically credit the testimony of Frank Fava to the effect that he advised Flores to speak directly with Bruno Fava concerning his overtime claim, and I do so upon my conviction that Frank Fava testified accurately and credibly that it was not his practice to become involved in matters of pay and compensation but routinely left those to front office resolution. Additionally, I credit Guisinger's testimony that, in speaking with Bruno Fava, she did not tell Fava that Flores had threatened to contact the Union over the overtime issue. I found Guisinger to have been a credible and reliable witness who manifested no bias by endeavoring to shape her testimony or shade the truth. I am convinced that when she reported to Bruno Fava that Flores was upset over the amount of overtime pay proffered she was concerned not with Flores threat to contact the Union but with the accuracy or inaccuracy of her own computation of the pay figure. She was inexperienced in payroll work and her reaction to Flores' remarks were entirely self-oriented. I conclude that, consistent with Guisinger's testimony, her accounting of her discussion with Flores on the matter was as terse and abbreviated as her testimony would suggest, and that Fava's response was as direct and as instructive as his testimony and that of Guisinger indicate. Contrary to the General Counsel, Bruno Fava's testimony is not devoid of any support for the finding that he instructed Guisinger to place Flores on "union scale." He testified quite directly that when he learned that Flores was on salary he felt a precedent he had established with respect to Castenada was being ignored and decided it was time to put Flores on the contractual rate. While Fava's testimony was sometimes imprecise and conceptual in nature, it is a fair inference, which I have indulged, that, as Guisinger testified, he translated his reaction into a specific directive.

[10] I am convinced that Flores so stated because he felt disinclined to challenge Fava on the issue at that time.

[11] The foregoing is based primarily upon the credited testimony of Bruno Fava. I have considered the testimony of Paul Flores and Richard Castaneda only to the extent that it is consistent with the foregoing findings. I have also considered the testimony of Frank Fava insofar as it serves to fix the time of the directive given Flores by Bruno Fava relating to his use of the telephone. In this latter connection, I specifically reject the testimony of Flores and of Castaneda to the effect that the directive and confrontation transpired prior to the lunch period. With respect to this facet of the case, Castaneda impressed me as a witness endeavoring diligently to assist Flores and the Union in the prosecution of the instant case. As against Flores' recollection of the time sequence, the convincing testimony of Bruno Fava finds credible and persuasive support in that of Frank Fava, and I am convinced that their testimony was not fabricated. With respect to the substance of Fava's remarks, I credit his version for I am unable to conclude that a manager of his experience, sophistication, and long-term involvement in dealing with collective-bargaining representatives would have articulated the direct threat which the testimony of Flores describes. I find that Flores embellished his testimony to serve his own pecuniary interest and that Fava's admonition to him was communicated in the terms which Fava testified it was. Contrary to the General Counsel, nothing in Fava's pretrial affidavit or his witness stand testimony with respect thereto lends credence to the contention that Fava eavesdropped on the conversation before pouncing on Flores with malice of forethought, so to speak. Fava's testimony establishes that his statement to Flores was direct and brief, and Flores' testimony supports this. Moreover, nothing in Flores' testimony suggests that he first dialed information for the number of the "Culinary Union" prior to placing his phone call wherein he requested to speak to Zenich. Upon this record, I am unable to indulge the assumption which the General Counsel requests. Nor do I indulge the General Counsel's interpretation of the reference "reaffirmed" contained in Bruno Fava's pretrial affidavit. The interpretation warranted by the record as a whole, and the one which I apply, is that the reaffirmation alluded to was of his earlier decision and instruction to Guisinger and had no reference to any earlier comment to Flores. In sum, taking into consideration the state of mind of both Fava and Flores at the time the telephone conversation transpired, and evaluating the experience and insight into the areas of permissible dialogue which Fava undoubtedly brought to the instant occasion, I conclude that the testimony of Bruno Fava is a more reliable gauge of the content of the exchange than is that of Flores'.

Moreover, the testimony of Castaneda attributing to Frank Fava a combination of adverse comments concerning Flores' call to the Union and admonitions to Castaneda not to contact the Union is rejected. Fava credibly denied these attributions, and my observations of Fava's personality and nature convinces me that, contrary to Castaneda, Fava did not allude to Flores as "a little bastard" and state that Flores had called the Union.

In crediting the testimony of Bruno Fava with respect to his reapproachment to Flores at approximately 2 o'clock on the afternoon in question, I have evaluated the evidence establishing that Flores was bona fidely convinced that he was entitled to overtime and, in that context, have weighed the acquiescence of Bruno Fava in directing the payment of any proper amount due Flores. In this connection, however, the evidence preponderates in favor of a finding, which I make, that prior to January 20 Bruno Fava had not theretofore been aware of Flores' status as a salaried employee and, as a matter of management predilection, reached a conclusion before the telephone episode that Flores, as a salaried employee, was required either to honor flexibility in the work schedule without resort to overtime or, on the other hand, be treated as an hourly employee and be accorded overtime. In a related sense, I credit Guisinger and the inferences drawn from the testimony of Bruno Fava that Fava spontaneously evinced surprise and dissatisfaction of the concept of compensating on a salaried basis a cook in Flores' job category. In concluding that Fava spoke to Flores in a conciliatory tone on the afternoon of the day in question and on that occasion advised Flores that he was being placed on hourly compensation, I credit Bruno Fava. I base this credibility resolution upon a further finding supported by the credited testimony of Bruno Fava and Brenda Guisinger that before the telephone incident and prior to speaking with Flores in the afternoon Fava had reached the decision to place Flores on hourly wages.

d. The alleged termination of Flores

The contractual wage rates in effect in January and February 1979 provided for compensation of the following classifications at the hourly rates shown:

Dinner cook—$4.25.5
Second cook—$4.04
Broiler cook—$3.82
Fry cook—$3.60

When the telephone incident occurred Flores was receiving a salary of $750 per month, or $4.37 per hour based on a workweek of 40 hours. The paycheck which Flores received on February 5 representing his compensation for the pay period January 16 through January 31 represented compensation at $4.25 per hour. This rate was used by Guisinger in an effort to comply with Fava's instruction to pay Flores at union scale. In checking the payroll on payday Fava noted the rate and called the three payroll clerks into his office and admonished them that he had directed Flores be put on union scale. Accordingly, Guisinger applied the contractual wage applicable to the fry cook classification in preparing Flores' next paycheck. Subsequently, on February 20 Flores received his paycheck covering the 2-week period February 1 through February 15, and it reflected an amount representing an hourly rate of $3.60 per hour. Upon a receipt of his paycheck on February 20, he protested to Bruno Fava who instructed him to speak to Frank Fava. He did so and Frank Fava showed him the contractual rate schedule. Flores protested that he was being given the "bottom figure" which he characterized as "ridiculous" in light of his experience. Frank Fava agreed to pay him $3.75 per hour. Flores walked away.

Soon thereafter Flores, spoke with Frank Fava in Fava's office and told him that he was giving him 2 weeks' notice. Flores stated that he was working too hard, that too much work was expected of him, and that the pay he was receiving as a result of the adjustment resulted in his "not making enough money." Fava responded by noting, in substance, that improvements had been made in the operation and staffing of the kitchen operation and that an employee had been hired to make salads and cold sandwiches, thus easing the work burden for Flores. Fava did not endeavor further to dissuade Flores but advised him that, if a qualified employee became available in the next 2 weeks, he would employ him. He added that if this occurred, he would have to terminate Flores.

On February 27 Frank Fava hired a breakfast cook whom he considered fully qualified. Fava instructed the new employee to commence work the following day, and he told the payroll department to prepare Flores' checks. Flores was compensated at the rate of $3.75 per hour for his work through February 28, and another check was issued dated March 2, 1979, compensating Flores for 16 additional hours of work at the rate of $3.75 per hour.

Flores credibly testified that he gave notice of his intention to resign because he felt that in so doing he could "jar" Fava into raising his wages to an hourly rate more akin to that represented by his previous salary. Fava credibly testified that he hired a replacement for Flores when a qualified applicant presented himself because qualified help was in short supply. When Flores proffered his resignation, he had not secured employment elsewhere, nor had he secured another job on March 2 when he left Respondent's employ.

As found, the three paychecks received by Flores on February 2, 20, and 28, respectively, reflected hourly wage rates of $4.25, $3.60, and $3.75. Upon learning of these variations in hourly pay rates, Bruno Fava verbally chastised the staff, comprised of one experienced payroll clerk and two relatively inexperienced clerks.[12]

e. Mastriano terminated

(1) Employment history

Deborah Mastriano was employed by Respondent from May 1978 until November 28, 1979, when she was terminated. She was employed as a bartender on the day shift and, as found, Mastriano served as bar manager.

[12] The foregoing is based on a composite of the credited testimony of Frank Fava, Paul Flores, Brenda Guisinger, and documentary evidence of record. In crediting the testimony of Paul Flores regarding his motivation in giving his 2 weeks' notice, I have evaluated the suggestive nature of a key question leading to Flores' specification of his rate of pay as a force in his decision. Nonetheless, being convinced that the total context of Flores' testimony is such as to establish his wage rate as a factor in his decision, I have reached the findings of fact above made. However, in all other respects I credit Flores' testimony only to the extent that it is consistent with the foregoing findings. Initially, I became convinced as I observed Paul Flores testify at the proceeding before me that Flores was lacing his testimony liberally with rationalizations and extenuations which he knew to be harmful to the defenses being interposed by Respondent and fully supportive not only of his own pecuniary interest in this matter but also of the rationale of antiunion propensities on the part of Bruno Fava so foundational to the General Counsel's case. Flores' attributions to Bruno Fava and Frank Fava of direct, undisguised, and blatant expressions of hostility toward the Union and union-based motivation for the removal of Flores from salary and a reduction of his equivalent hourly wage rate exemplify the excesses of Flores' testimony, and this testimony is rejected. Moreover, my separate evaluations of Frank Fava and of Bruno Fava, as I observed them testify before me, provides insufficient foundation for the conclusion that either of them harbored resentment or hostilities toward the Union, or toward the concept of collective representation. Nor does this evaluation of them and their sworn testimony support the conclusion that either of them was so naive and lacking in judgment or self-control as to have articulated in specific terms the improper, union-related motivation for their wage actions, as Flores' testimony suggests. Particularly is this so here where Flores has manifested by his own actions a disposition or willingness to seek the assistance of the Union in matters pertaining to his own employment. In crediting the testimony of Frank Fava with respect to the exchange between him and Flores signifying Flores' severance, I do so for the reason that I consider Fava's account both of the conversation wherein Flores gave notice of his intention to quit, and of the severance interview, to be intrinsically credible. Moreover, Fava's accounts comport with the logical realities that then pertained. Fava had worked diligently to improve the operation of the kitchen, and had made demands on himself and other kitchen personnel to achieve the objective of bringing the kitchen into compliance with health codes and the demands of the Holiday Inn International. Further, he had assisted Flores in improving his cooking techniques. Moreover, qualified help was in short supply. I reject Flores' testimony to the effect that, when he proffered his resignation, Frank Fava was virtually unresponsive and merely acquiescent. I further reject the inferences of Flores' testimony that his relationship with Fava became strained due to the fact that Frank Fava had learned that he, Flores, had endeavored to contact the Union concerning his wages. Rather, I credit the testimony of Frank Fava to the effect that Flores advised him of his intentions to resign, that he endeavored to dissuade him and warned him that he, Fava, would hire a qualified applicant if one became available.

This position, which she held from November 1978 until approximately November 19, 1979, required her to schedule hours of other bartenders, order liquor for bar use, and inventory liquor stocks. During her term of service as bar manager, she had occasion to hire one bartender without clearance from her superior. Her duties as a bartender required her to pour drinks and wait on customers, to cut citrus fruits, and to maintain the cleanliness of the tables and bar. When Bruno Fava assumed managership of the hotel facility in early December 1978, he assumed responsibilites for scheduling the hours of work of all bar personnel and rescinded the right of Mastriano to hire. At the outset of her employment in 1978, Mastriano was compensated at a rate of approximately $4.78 per hour and was increased in her hourly pay when she assumed her responsibilities as bar manager. When Fava became manager of the motel facility, he reduced Mastriano's rate of pay to that provided for bartenders in the collective-bargaining agreement. Mastriano learned of this reduction in her hourly rate on December 20, the first payday following Fava's assumption of management of the hotel facility. Fava explained that her previous compensation had been above union scale and that she had been relieved of her responsibilities to schedule work. Fava added that he would wait and see how she performed her duties as a bartender. Mastriano's hourly rate of pay was raised in May 1979 pursuant to her request when she learned that the night bartender was being paid at a rate above her wage rate.[13]

During the period of her employment at the Vandenberg Inn in 1977 and 1978, as found, Mastriano worked first on the night shift as a waitress and then transferred to the day shift in the same capacity. Marlene Perez was serving in the capacity of coffeeshop manager, and Bruno Fava maintained overall supervision of the coffeeshop and restaurant operation. In the spring of 1978, at a time when Mastriano was working on the day shift in the coffeeshop, Perez was made supervisor of the coffeeshop and this distressed Mastriano. Moreover, Perez and Mastriano carried on a dialog for a period of days concerning the timely completion of side work prior to the end of the scheduled shift. For her part, Mastriano communicated her opposition to the installation of Perez as supervisor of the day shift. Perez had worked at the Vandenberg Inn for a longer period than Mastriano.

On an occasion in May 1978, just prior to the commencement of the lunch shift, Mastriano, Perez, and Bruno Fava sat together at a table in the dining area to discuss the matter. During the discussion, Mastriano became suddenly excited and exclaimed that she wanted to quit. Bruno Fava invited her to do so and she arose and threw a set of keys across the table. Her termination was effectuated that day, and other personnel, including Fava, handled the luncheon shift.[14]

Approximately 6 weeks after Fava assumed management of Respondent's operation, he had occasion to complete a verification of employment form on behalf of Mastriano. The form was submitted to Fava by a bank where Mastriano was seeking a loan. In completing the form, which Fava signed, the following remark was entered: "A very dedicated and responsible person. The remark was written on the face of the form by Bruno Fava.

During the early part of 1979, Fava complimented Mastriano with respect to the ease with which she had gained proficiency as a bartender and the good relationships that she had established with customers. In August 1979 Mastriano verbally informed Fava of her intention to leave her job and to move from the Santa Maria area. Fava attempted to dissuade her from this course of action, advising her that it would be a mistake for her to leave her friends. Fava added that she was doing a very good job as a bartender and there were many opportunities available to her in Santa Maria. Fava advised her to stay on. Mastriano took some time off commencing August 10 and went to San Diego for approximately 4 days during which time she looked for a job. She returned to Santa Maria on August 14 to attend the funeral of a very close male friend. Following the funeral, she went to the Holiday Inn and spoke with Fava who advised her to stay in her current position and to report to work the following day. Mastriano followed Fava's advise.[15]

(2) The prelude events

In the summer of 1979 Bruno Fava presented to the executive committee a plan to expend $60,000 in refurbishing the bar and cocktail lounge with the essential objective of improving its ambiance and seating capacity. In addition, Fava recommended that a stage and dance floor be constructed so that entertainment could be featured. The executive committee approved Fava's recommendation, and construction activities incident to remodeling and refurbishing the existing area commenced in early August. Incident to this a decision was also reached to install a computer bar system which metered the pour of liquor and beverages and conduced to the careful control of drink content and ratio of liquor costs to revenues. This concept was adopted by the executive committee and the remodeling effort continued until the end of October. In the interim, a banquet room adjacent to the dining room was set up as a temporary lounge. The grand opening of the new bar and cocktail lounge occurred on November 2, at which time all construction activity had ceased and only the installation of those connections and fittings to the computer bar remained to be accomplished. This involved work in a backroom separated from the bar by a common wall.

[13] The foregoing is based on the credited and undisputed testimony of Deborah Mestriano.

[14] The foregoing is based on a combination of the testimony of Marlene Perez and Deborah Mastriano. In those instances wherein the testimony of Mastriano differs from that of Perez, I have credited Perez. In this aspect of her testimony, as in others, Mastriano impressed me as tending to embellish and extend her account in a manner which would redound strongly to her advantage and to portray Bruno Fava in an unfavorable light. To the extent that Mastriano's testimony suggests that Fava's attitude and directives were the precursor to her own emotional outburst and severance of employment, I reject it.

[15] The foregoing is based on the credited and undisputed testimony of Deborah Mastriano. While I am convinced that Mastriano overstated the effusiveness with which Fava complimented her in her capacity as a bartender, Fava did not testify in contradiction of Mastriano and I am convinced that the essential thrusts of Mastriano's testimony in this regard is accurate.

In the meantime, and in keeping with the decision of management to modify the character and focus of the bar and cocktail lounge operation, a decision was made to purchase uniforms to be worn by the cocktail waitresses and by Mastriano as a bartender. Dr. Ikola, as a member of the executive committee, made the decision because he considered the wearing of diverse types and style of street clothing by bar and cocktail lounge personnel detracted from the quality image management desired to establish.[16] In this connection, Dr. Ikola, accompanied by his wife and daughter, traveled to Los Angeles and visited a uniform supply shop. Ikola had his daughter model the uniforms and he took pictures of the four that he considered the most appropriate. He returned to Santa Maria with a sample uniform and the photographs which he had taken. At least three of the female employees of the bar operation, including Mastriano, participated in trying on and perusing the sample uniform. This was hurriedly done but resulted in the approval of the participants of the uniform modeled. From the photographs submitted to the executive committee a uniform was selected and ordered. In excess of $1,000 was expended in purchasing the uniforms.[17]

The uniforms arrived just prior to the November 2 opening of the refurbished bar and cocktail lounge. Mastriano tried on her uniform at home on November 2 prior to reporting to work and found the uniform too abbreviated and revealing to suit her. She took her uniform to work and in a conversation with Fava and other personnel she lodged her objections. In substance, Mastriano informed Fava that the uniform was too revealing at the top and so abbreviated in length that it inhibited her from stooping or bending over and performing the incidental bar duties required of her. One of the participants in the conversation suggested that a ruffle be sewn to the uniform and Fava acquiesced, believing that the additional ruffle would be applied only at the neckline. In the meantime, the cocktail waitresses wore their uniforms on duty. Linda Low and Jan Kuhule manifested their distress at having to wear them, and did so both to Mastriano and to Antoigue.

In due course, Mastriano wore her uniform, as modified by a ruffle at the neckline and a fringe ruffle applied to the lower portion of the uniform. When Fava observed this, he stated, in effect, that Mastriano had modified the entire appearance of the uniform and that he had given his approval to modifying only the top portion thereof. Albert Lavoie, who at that time was serving as a business agent of the Union and who visited Respondent's facilities frequently in furtherance of his duties, spoke with Mastriano who was wearing her uniform as modified by the ruffles. She took the initiative in informing Lavoie that she objected to the uniform as too revealing. Lavoie suggested that Mastriano speak with Fava concerning the matter, and he stated that he would also talk with Fava. Lavoie did so immediately thereafter, informing Fava that Mastriano had spoken to him and had objected to the uniform as too revealing. Lavoie asked Fava if the uniform were a standard one, and Fava said that it was standard, but had been modified by the ruffles. He further told Lavoie that the issue was essentially moot because he had given Mastriano permission to place ruffles on the uniform.[18]

During the next week on a daily basis, Mastriano communicated to Fava her objection to wearing the uniform. Her objections would be lodged in the form of comments relating to her embarrassment over having to wear the uniform, the unfavorable reactions of her friends and customers, and the fact that the male night bartender did not have to wear a uniform. As a result of these conversations, on or about November 15, Fava instructed Mastriano that she could wear her slacks and blouse, as she had requested. Prior to taking this action, Fava had communicated to Dr. Ikola the complaints of Mastriano and others concerning the uniforms and Dr. Ikola had instructed Fava to make the decision he considered appropriate. He added that he would prefer the uniforms to be worn, if possible.[19]

In the month of October, Fava received reports that Mastriano was rolling dice with customers and that significant amounts of money were changing hands. It had been acceptable practice in the bar and during the luncheon period for customers to roll dice with the cocktail waitress for the tip. The reports which Fava received indicated that Mastriano's dice-rolling activities went beyond this practice. In late October he encountered Mastriano in the bar area rolling dice for substantial amount of money. Later he spoke with Mastriano and instructed her that this was an impermissible practice and directed her to cease. Despite his directive to Mastriano, Fava had the impression that Mastriano continued her practice.[20] [16] Dr. Ikola credibly testified that cocktail waitresses and bar personnel were wearing clothing of their own choice and, in his opinion, this portrayed a "no class" operation.

[17] The foregoing is based upon a composite of testimony, including that of Dr. Ikola and that of Deborah Mastriano. The essential aspects of the above findings are not in dispute.

[18] The findings with respect to the conversation between Lavoie and Mastriano are based on a composite of their credited testimony, but I have principally relied on the testimony of Lavoie. In addition, the findings with respect to the conversation between Lavoie and Fava are based upon a composite of their testimony. I am convinced that Fava was inaccurate in his recollection that his conversation with Lavoie did not take place until on or about November 15 and subsequent to the time when he had instructed Mastriano that she could cease wearing the uniform. Because Lavoie was a frequent visitor to Respondent's facility, I am convinced that the conversation between Mastriano and Lavoie would have transpired at a time earlier than the time fixed by Fava for their exchange. Implicit in this finding is the further conclusion that Lavoie spoke to Fava on the matter immediately subsequent to his conversation with Mastriano.

[19] The foregoing findings are based on the credited testimony of Bruno Fava, as augmented by that of Dr. Ikola. Specifically, I credit the testimony of Fava to the effect that his directive to Mastriano that she could cease wearing the uniform transpired in mid-November. In this connection I have considered and credited the testimony of Lisa Ziemba, Kelly Connell, and Brenda Guisinger to the effect that during the final week of her employment while on duty Mastriano wore street clothes and not her uniform. I credit the testimony of Debbie Mastriano only to the extent that it is consistent with the above findings. Moreover, I reject the testimony of Richard McGuinness and Ted Zenich to the extent that it infers that Mastriano was still wearing her uniform on duty on or about November 27 when they had conversations with her.

[20] The credited testimony of Bruno Fava supports the foregoing. I have considered the testimony of Deborah Mastriano, Richard McGuinness, and Ted Zenich and conclude that their testimony supports the Incident to the installation of the new computer bar, Mastriano expressed her opinion to Fava that the customers would not respond favorably to this method of dispensing drinks. Mastriano expressed the feeling that her customers would prefer to see the bartender physically pour the drink. Fava stated his disagreement.

In mid-November McGuinness visited Respondent's facility in one of his routine visits. He was approached by Fava who showed him a list of bartender duties which he had posted and which he had called to the attention of the bar personnel. McGuinness took no exception to the content of the posting. In the course of this conversation, Fava told McGuinness that Mastriano was failing to cut citrus fruits, prepare juices, stock and rotate liquor, and to maintain the general cleanliness of the area in back of the bar. Fava also noted that Mastriano had complained about her uniform. He emphasized that Mastriano's rolling of the dice was too constant and consistent and that he was going to have to change this. He asked McGuinness as a representative of the Union to speak with Mastriano. McGuinness noted that he felt the construction which was then taking place incident to the installation of the computer bar system rendered it very difficult to maintain the cleanliness of the back bar area. McGuinness agreed, however, to speak with Mastriano and he did so on the same day or the day following. In effect, he summarized the nature and substance of Fava's complaints. Mastriano denied the accuracy of Fava's evaluation concerning the condition of the back bar area and her performance of her bartending duties. Additionally, Mastriano asserted that she had ceased rolling dice a week earlier, and she reiterated to McGuinness her objections to the uniform and requested his evaluation of its propriety. McGuinness stated that he felt the uniform was "very attractive" but agreed that without the lace it "would be just a little bit too revealing." McGuinness added that he wished to maintain harmony between management and the Union and its membership. He counseled Mastriano to do all she could to fulfill her duties. During the conversation, McGuinness formulated the impression that Mastriano was upset and very disturbed about something extraneous to the content of their conversation. Mastriano declined to explicate her feelings in this regard.

Following his conversation with Mastriano, McGuinness returned to his office and communicated Fava's complaints and Mastriano's responses to Ted Zenich. He told Zenich that he had studied the list of bartender's duties which Fava had posted and which Fava had requested the bartenders to sign. McGuinness stated that he considered the list satisfactory. He also told Zenich that there appeared to be something disturbing and upsetting Mastriano which he did not reveal to him.[21]

On Saturday, November 17, Fava called Mastriano at her home and requested her to come to the bar to assist in the installation of the dispensing system of the computer bar. Mastriano countered that the installer was scheduled to come in the following evening. Fava contradicted her and stated that installation was to take place that evening. Mastriano communicated her reluctance to come in as requested, and Fava responded that he and the maintenance man would handle the matter themselves. On Monday, November 19, Mastriano reported for duty and spoke with Fava. She told Fava that she wished no longer to be bar manager and to be expected to report for work on weekends when she was not scheduled for duty. She stated her desire to be relieved of responsibility for ordering supplies and scheduling hours of work. Fava stated he would comply with Mastriano's wishes and would handle these matters. Thereafter, Fava took responsibility for these duties. The schedule which he prepared for November 26 changed Mastriano's reporting time from 10 a.m. to 11 a.m. and she was later told that there was no need to open the bar at the 10 a.m. hour.[22]

In the week that followed, Mastriano noted a cooling of Fava's attitude toward her. For his part, Bruno Fava formed the impression that, following his directive to Mastriano to cease wagering on the roll of the dice, she had became reticent and cool in her attitude, and the frequency of her complaints about work-related matters had increased.

On November 20 Mastriano complained to Fava that she had not been compensated for 3 hours of overtime work. (Mastriano had received her paycheck the previous day.) Fava explained that he had offset the 3 hours of overtime which Mastriano had worked against a like amount of time off which she had taken. Mastriano was not satisfied with this explanation and Fava offered to pay the overtime.

The following day Zenich appeared at Fava's office. He stated that he wished to talk to Fava. Zenich rarely came in person to the facility. At the outset of the conversation, Zenich broached the subject of Mastriano's uniform. Fava responded that that was no longer an issue because Mastriano had been authorized to wear street clothes. Fava was irritated and raised his voice a bit. He asked Zenich the real nature of his business, and Zenich inquired about the 3 hours' overtime. Fava offered his explanation for withholding the 3 hours of overtime pay.

finding that Fava spoke to Mastriano concerning her rolling of dice. To the extent that the testimony of the latter three individuals suggests that Fava's chastisement of Mastriano pertained solely to her practice of rolling dice for tips, I reject it. The General Counsel introduced no evidence to counter the credited testimony of Bruno Fava to the effect that Mastriano was gambling for significant amounts of money in the bar area of the facility. In his pretrial affidavit Fava did not single Mastriano out as the offender among employees in this regard, but notwithstanding, the totality of the evidence establishes that she did gamble on the roll of the dice and Fava admonished her.

[21] The foregoing is based primarily on the credited testimony of Richard McGuinness, as supported by the testimony of Deborah Mastriano. The testimony of Bruno Fava supports in essential aspects the nature and tenor of McGuinness' testimony. In finding that the conversation transpired in mid-November, and not on or about November 27 as the testimony of McGuinness, Zenich, and Mastriano suggests, I do so on the conviction that the incident transpired in the 2-week period when Mastriano was wearing her uniform, as well as the further finding that Mastriano ceased wearing her uniform at least 1 week prior to her November 28 termination.

[22] The foregoing is based on the credited testimony of Deborah Mastriano which is not contradicted. The testimony of Bruno Fava supports the finding that the computer bar installation transpired on the approximate date testified to by Mastriano.

Zenich said that Fava would have to pay it. Fava said that it was his word against Mastriano's but that he would pay the overtime. At this point in the conversation, Zenich alluded to Fava's criticism of Mastriano for rolling dice and failing to properly perform all her bartender duties. Fava responded to these comments and Zenich stated that it appeared to him that Fava was harassing Mastriano. Fava also commented that if Mastriano was going to get upset "about every little problem" that perhaps Zenich should find her a job somewhere else. Following some small talk, the meeting ended.[23]

After his conversation with Fava, Zenich instructed Mastriano to meet with him in his office the following morning. Mastriano met with Zenich at approximately 9 a.m. on November 22.

At the outset of the conversation, Mastriano expressed the conviction that she was "going to get it" because she had come to the Union's office. Mastriano told Zenich that after he, Zenich, had left the Holiday Inn after speaking with Fava, Linda Guisinger and Lisa Ziemba had come to her and told her that following Zenich's departure from the Union Bnuno had gone into the dining room and remarked, "This big-titted broad, all she knows how to do is wiggle her ass and roll dice." Mastriano produced for Zenich's benefit a napkin on which she had entered some abbreviations to assist her in recalling the contents of Fava's alleged statement.[24] In context of this, Mastriano then described in some detail incidents of alleged sexual harassment of her by Fava. She further told Zenich that she had resisted these advances, and she expressed the opinion that her rejection of Fava in this respect had led to Fava's criticism of her work-related activities and conduct.[25] Zenich asked Mastriano why she did not bring these matters to his attention earlier, and Mastriano answered that she was afraid of losing her job if she came to the Union. She expressed her conviction that Fava would find a way to terminate her because she had put a hem on her uniform. Zenich instructed Mastriano to go to work. He also advised her that if Fava did terminate her that she should advise Fava that she had informed him, Zenich, of Fava's sexual harassment of her.[26]

(3) The events of November 28

On November 28 Mastriano worked as a bartender on her normal 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. shift. She was dressed in slacks and a blouse. Brenda Riley came on duty at 3 p.m. on the afternoon of November 28. Her shift overlapped that of Mastriano and continued on into the night shift of Kelly Connell, who relieved Mastriano as bartender at 6 p.m. Riley had had no previous experience as a cocktail waitress when she entered Respondent's employ at the end of September 1979. Riley testified that she experienced criticism and disharmony when working with Mastriano which she did not experience under other bartenders.

On the afternoon of November 28 when Riley reported to work, she went to the back area of the bar and put her coat away and quickly surveyed the bar area. She observed only a few customers and she then proceeded to the restroom. She was gone approximately 3 or 4 minutes. As she returned she was informed by a male member of the band that Mastriano was upset with her. Riley approached Mastriano to explain her absence. Mastriano stated that in her absence she had had to serve some customers. Riley apologized. At approximately 5 p.m., Joaquin (Zorro) Razo and Edith Souza entered the bar and occupied a table proximate to the waitress station located near one end of the bar. Razo and Souza arrived at a time when Riley had left the bar area for the purpose of obtaining fresh coffee. It was Riley's normal routine to obtain a fresh pot of coffee preparatory to the influx of evening customers. At this point in time, approximately 10 or 15 customers were in the bar and cocktail lounge. Razo and Souza sat for a time at the table without being waited upon. Finally, Mastriano went from behind the bar to the table and served a round of drinks to Razo and Souza. She remained at the table talking and rolling dice with Razo and Souza. She sipped on a glass of wine as she did so. When Riley returned with the pot of coffee, she was again told by a member of the band who was seated in the cocktail lounge that Mastriano was upset with her. Thereupon, Riley approached Mastriano and asserted that she had informed Mastriano that she was going to get coffee. At 5:30 p.m., Connell reported to the bar preparatory to commencing his bartending duties at 6 p.m. Upon entering the bar area, Connell walked directly to the waitress station at the bar. As he reached the station, Mastriano approached him from the table area situated in the cocktail lounge proximate to the waitress station. Referring to Riley, Mastriano called Riley a "bitch" and stated that she had been "sitting on her ass." Mastriano appeared to be "upset" or "agitated." Connell detected the odor of liquor on her breath. Riley overheard Mastriano's comments and he thereafter gave her explanation to Connell regarding her absence from the bar area. Connell left the bar and went to the office area to obtain his bank of money for the night shift. This accorded to his normal routine. Connell's departure for the office occurred at approximately 5:40 p.m. In the ensuing several minutes Mastriano intermittently returned to her work station behind the bar and mixed drinks. She would then return to the table occupied by Razo and Souza. On one occasion, she left that table, went behind the bar, mixed drinks, and handed them across the bar to Razo as he stood across the bar near his table. Prior to completing her shift at 6 p.m., Mastriano had taken the proceeds and checks constituting her "bank" from the cash register and had placed the bank on the surface of the working area of the bar near the cash register. Normal routine would have required Mastriano to take the bank directly to the office and deposit it there. When he assumed his bartending duties at 6 p.m., Connell observed Mastriano's bank resting on the work surface where he normally placed his liquor bottles. Mastriano remained in the bar and sat with Razo and Souza at the table they had been occupying. In the interim, however, she received a telephone call from Zenich who asked Mastriano how her workday had gone. Mastriano said that the day had been "hectic" and stated that she "did not know what [was] going to happen" when she turned her bank into the office. After he assumed his bartending duties, Connell observed Mastriano rolling dice. Above the other sounds in the bar, Connell could hear Mastriano's voice and could also hear laughter coming from the table. A round of drinks for Raza and Souza were ordered by Mastriano through Riley with instructions to charge the drinks to Fava's A and P account.[27] Connell was aware that Mastriano was off duty, and in his own mind questioned the propriety of an off-duty bartender seeking to charge a customer drink to Fava's A and P account. Accordingly, he questioned Riley, asking her if the charge was intended to go on "Bruno's A and P account." Riley answered in the affirmative. Connell rang up the order on the ticket. Later, Riley placed another order of drinks for the same customers and, in the process of ringing up the order, Connell detected an error in the key annotation specifying the waitress ordering the drinks. Connell placed the ticket beside the cash register awaiting an appropriate time to discuss the matter with Riley. This transpired at approximately 6:45 p.m. Mastriano remained at the table in the bar and her bank remained behind the bar where she had placed it. Subsequently, at approximately 7:05 p.m., Connell had occasion to discuss the ticket with Riley and in the course of that discussion he observed Bruno Fava enter the cocktail lounge through the main entrance. Fava approached the waitress station as Riley and Connell discussed the ticket in question.[28]

[24] Mastriano testified that Guisinger and Ziemba had reported Fava's alleged statement to her soon after it purportedly occurred. Both Guisinger and Ziemba credibly deny this.

[25] The incidents of sexual harassment alluded to by Mastriano were the subject of her independent testimony. Bruno Fava denies the conduct attributed to him. If it occurred, the conduct would have been substantial and not insignificant in character.

[26] The testimony of Ted Zenich and Deborah Mastriano forms the basis for the findings with respect to the substantive content of the meeting. I do not credit the testimony of Zenich and Mastriano to the effect that this meeting transpired on November 28.

Fava entered the bar area without prior knowledge of Mastriano's whereabouts or presence there. He knew that she had worked that afternoon and that her shift terminated at 6 p.m. Fava entered the bar area at approximately 7:05 p.m. He walked directly to the waitress station where Connell and Riley were speaking together. Fava did not observe Mastriano's presence in the bar. He spoke briefly to Connell and Riley and inquired how the cocktail hour was proceeding. Connell responded and then continued his discussion with Riley concerning the A and P tab. Fava, who was present, noted that the tab had a notation indicating that the charges on the check had been made to his A and P account. He commented, rhetorically, that he had just come in and Connell answered that he did not know anything about it. He said that it was not his and motioned to the table where Mastriano was seated. Fava turned and observed Mastriano seated at a table near the waitress station. He then took the ticket and walked in the direction of the bandstand. Mastriano approached him and asked to speak with him. Fava listened and Mastriano stated that Riley had let some customers wait unattended for 10 minutes and she had purchased some drinks for them. Mastriano told Fava, in substance, that Riley had sat and conversed with a member of the band instead of attending to her tables. She referred to Riley as a "broad" and a "bitch." Fava then went to the far end of the bar. He motioned for Connell to join him there. Connell did so, and Fava asked Connell again for a further explanation. Connell started to comment but was interrupted by Mastriano who walked quickly the full length of the bar from her table to where Fava and Connell were conversing. As she approached she addressed Connell and instructed him to tell Fava what she had told Connell earlier. Connell started to recount for Fava's benefit the statement which Mastriano had earlier made concerning Riley. However, Mastriano interrupted him, and she spoke in a still louder tone of voice. Mastriano repeated the phrase, "Tell Bruno what I told you," several times in progressively louder tones each time. She appeared highly agitated. Connell was unable to complete his statement to Fava. Connell continued his effort to give an accounting to Fava. Mastriano persisted in her loud interruptions and Fava interjected with the instruction to Mastriano to quiet down and permit Connell to explain. Fava stated that he could only listen to one person at a time. Finally, Connell addressed Mastriano and stated that if she would "shut up" he would be able to comply with her request. Customers where in the bar, and Mastriano's voice had reached a very high pitch. Finally, Fava raised his voice and addressed Mastriano. He stated, in substance, that she should keep her voice down and speak when she was spoken to. He added that he wanted to complete his discussion with Connell. At this point, Mastriano repeated several times in a very agitated manner the question, "What are you going to do, fire me?" In the process she touched Fava once or twice on the arm as she spoke. Finally, Fava responded, "Sweetheart, if that is the way you want it, you're fired. Go." Throughout this interlude Riley was standing nearby.[29] Mastriano responded, "I'll get you for this." She repeated this statement and added, "I'll have your ass for this." Fava walked away and as he did so Mastriano shouted that she was going to the Union. Fava responded, "Fine. Go ahead." Fava proceeded directly to his office.[30]

[27] For the purpose of maintaining good customer relations and to serve the business interest of management, an advertising and promotions account was maintained. This account, known as "Bruno's tab," or "the house tab," or the "A and P account," was used for the purpose of expressing gratitude to a good customer, or for the purpose of soothing an irate customer with a valid complaint against the quality of service rendered. Some discretion in this regard resides with the bartender. Off duty bartenders have no authority to charge drinks to the A and P account.

[28] The foregoing is based on the credited testimony of John Kelly Connell, Brenda Riley, and Ray Biggs. I have considered the testimony of Deborah Mastriano and Joaquin Razo and credit it only to the extent that it is consistent with the foregoing findings. I am convinced that Mastriano engaged in liberal rationalization and exaggeration in testifying concerning this event, and I conclude upon my observation of him as he testified that Razo, despite his testimony to the contrary, had only a vague recollection of the precise details of the incidents concerning which he testified. Moreover, I am convinced that, contrary to his testimony, he was fully aware of Mastriano's interest in the proceeding and that he testified in a manner designed to assist Mastriano. I reject his testimony. On the other hand, I am convinced upon my observation of Connell as he testified concerning salient events that he endeavored to recount the incidents in which he was a participant accurately and without bias to the interest of any party. I found him a fully credible and convincing witness. Further, despite his association with Bruno Fava, I am convinced as I observed him testify that Ray Biggs gave an accurate and credible description of the activities of Mastriano and Razo which he witnessed in the time period described above. I credit Biggs. Finally, I conclude that Riley endeavored accurately to recall and describe the events involving her on the evening of November 28. From a compositive testimony, I conclude that her accounting is essentially accurate, although I infer that her absence from the bar area during the time period approximating 5 p.m. was longer than she recalled. Finally, I have considered the testimony of Bruno Fava with respect to the time of his arrival and ingress into the bar area, and as it further relates to the degree of latitude granted bartenders in the use of A and P tabs. I credit him in this regard.

Mastriano walked back to her table and spoke briefly with Razo and Souza. She informed them that she had been terminated. She then went to Fava's office and knocked on the door. Fava was inside the office seated at his desk. He had locked the door. He was upset and was endeavoring to gain his composure. Upon hearing the knock at the door, Fava walked over to the door, unlocked it, and opened it. He observed Mastriano who put her foot in the door in order to prevent Fava from closing it. Through the partially opened door, Mastriano said, "I have now got you." In so stating she laughed. Fava responded, "Get out. Please get out." He was able to close the door.[31]

Soon thereafter, Fava placed a telephone call to the Coachman Bar to determine if Ted Zenich was there. He knew that Zenich frequently patronized the Coachman Bar. He learned that Zenich was at the bar, and he went directly to the Coachman and spoke with Zenich. He gave his version of the events which had transpired earlier that evening resulting in the termination of Mastriano. Zenich expressed skepticism that Fava's explanation represented the true reason for terminating Mastriano. Zenich told Fava that Mastriano had spoken to him about Fava's harassment of her and proceeded to recount several incidents of sexual harassment of Mastriano involving Fava. Fava told Zenich that these claims were preposterous. Zenich interjected, ". . . you've been a thorn in my side all these years." The dialogue continued with Zenich and Fava exchanging recriminations.[32]

Thereafter, Fava returned to his office and spoke with Biggs who had come with his wife to the bar for a drink. In substance, Fava told Biggs that he felt that he was being "setup" in connection with the termination of Mastriano. Biggs was a friend both of Fava and of Zenich. He took it upon himself to contact Zenich and went to the Coachman to converse with Zenich. Biggs communicated to Zenich that he had spoken with Fava concerning the conversation which Fava had had with Zenich. He asked what could be done to resolve the matter. In substance, Zenich expressed resentment over the fact that Biggs would approach him in a bar, during leisure hours, concerning the matter in question. Zenich stated that charges had already been filed, and there was nothing he could do about it. He expressed his opinion that the best thing Fava could do was to pay Mastriano off. He mentioned a figure of $3,000. Zenich recounted to Biggs the information which Mastriano had imparted to him concerning the various instances when Fava had allegedly sexually harassed Mastriano.[33]

IV. CONCLUSIONS

A. Prefatory findings

This cases arises in context of an effort on the part of Respondent's executive committee and of Bruno Fava, the newly designated manager, to resuscitate the floun-

---

[29] The foregoing findings are based on a composite of the credited testimony of Bruno Fava, John Kelly Connell, and Brenda Riley. I have carefully considered the testimony of Deborah Mastriano and of Joaquin Razo as that testimony relates to the above incident. I reject that testimony. Razo was not a credible witness, and Mastriano's recounting of the episode impressed me as grossly inaccurate and carefully tailored to omit details which would redound adversely to her interest. At the same time, Mastriano's testimony contained embellishments which would place her actions in the best possible light and distort the conduct of Fava. I specifically reject Mastriano's testimony on direct examination to the effect that in the presence of Connell and Fava at the end of the bar she endeavored in a totally dispassionate and rational manner to acquaint Fava with the background of the charges made to his A and P account and that he precluded any explanation. Moreover, I specifically reject Mastriano's testimony to the effect that in terminating her Fava said, "Yes, I know you have already been to the union. You're through." To credit this testimony would require a conclusion that Fava, Connell, and Riley joined in a conspiracy to perjure themselves and concoct a tale destructive of Mastriano's interests and supportive of that of Fava. I reject this notion. Nothing in my observation of these three witnesses supports the thesis and much in the category of evidence and the observations of this factfinder is consistent with the conclusion, which I reach, that Mastriano conducted herself in the aberrant, agitated, and angry manner found above. Manifestly, as I observed Mastriano as she testified before me at the hearing, she is a person easily moved to emotion and the verge of tears. If there is present in this proceeding an intentional falsification of testimony to support vested interest, the tendency, if not propensity, resided with Mastriano.

[30] The foregoing is based on the credited testimony of John Kelly Connell and Bruno Fava. I specifically credit the testimony of Connell with respect to the remarks which Mastriano made to Fava in response to his statement signifying her termination.

[31] The foregoing is based on the credited testimony of Bruno Fava. I have considered the testimony of Deborah Mastriano to the effect that she actually entered Fava's office, conversed with him, and heard and observed him place a telephone call to his attorney. I interpret this testimony as a further example of embellishment calculated to place the conduct of Bruno Fava in the most unfavorable light while strengthening the thrust of the case being presented on her behalf.

[32] I credit that portion of the testimony of Bruno Fava and Ted Zenich, which is consistent with the above findings. I specifically reject the testimony of Zenich to the effect that Fava told him in specific terms that he had terminated Mastriano because she had charged drinks to his A and P tab. I credit Fava's testimony to the effect that he summarized for Zenich's benefit the events leading to Mastriano's termination.

[33] The foregoing is based primarily on the credited testimony of Ray Biggs. I have also considered the testimony of Ted Zenich and credit it to the extent that it is consistent with the above findings.

dering Santa Maria enterprise, and to achieve efficiency and cost-effective reorganization of the principal revenue-producing aspects of the operation. The case arises also against the backdrop of our ongoing, essentially arm's-length but generally harmonious relationship between Fava and the principal union officials, on the one hand, and of the Union and Respondent's owners, on the other. No employee or union-sponsored initiative to counter Fava's managerial prerogatives accompanied the transition of Fava from manager of the Vandenberg Inn, a union house, to the Holiday Inn, likewise unionized. Nothing in the background of either Bruno or Frank Fava had revealed a propensity on their part to oppose legitimate involvement of the Union in employment interests; and no evidence of record exists inferring antiunion hostility on the part of Respondent's executive committee, or ownership group. There is no history of unfair labor practices on the part of either Fava or the executive committee, and Fava's management experienoe at unionized enterprises had spanned many years. Explicit in the record is evidence that Bruno Fava expected efficiency and dedication to duty, and desired adherence to the chain-of-command principle, but not to the exclusion of the Union or the contractual and other legitimate visitation rights of union representatives. In his regard, I conclude that Fava's announced intention to limit the daily visits of the Union's business agent, McGuinness, establishes nothing more than a desire on his part to balance management interest in maintaining productivity and work-time discipline against the rights of employees to be collectively represented. Moreover, the evidence developed by the General Counsel revealing activities on the part of some supervisors and leadership personnel to test the depth of support for the Union among rank-and-file employees is insufficient to show antiunion propensities on Fava's part. Not only does the record suggest that this activity was a spontaneous excursion on the part of a segment of the departmental leadership personnel, but the General Counsel appears to have attached so little weight to the evidence that no allegation of unlawful conduct evolving from this activity was included in the complaint.[34]

For his part, Bruno Fava impressed me as a strong, confident manager possessed of firmly held notions of operating proprieties and employee work obligations. At the same time, Bruno Fava impressed me also, as I observed him testify at the hearing before me, as an individual of basic goodwill and candid openness. In tandem, so to speak, his uncle, Frank Fava, impressed me as an essentially genteel man of courtly nature and a deeply held sense of commitment to professional standards in the practice of the cooking and culinary craft. Upon my evaluation of Frank Fava I find him to have been a completely honest witness in terms of recounting to the best of his recollection the incidents to which he was a party, and I am convinced that his essential nature is such as to preclude the likelihood that he would have spoken in the profane manner (suggested by the testimony of Castaneda) or that he would act vindictively in personnel or union matters, as the testimony of Castaneda and Flores would imply.

The initial challenge by an employee through the Union to the "new broom" elements of Bruno Fava's management effort involved Paul Flores and evolved from his honestly held conviction that Bruno and Frank Fava had exploited him in their efforts to modify and improve the kitchen operation to serve their own personal interests and "track record," so to speak. A second challenge, that of the Union relating to the termination of Deborah Mastriano, involves more subtle undercurrents. From the totality of my observation of witnesses called during the 5 days of the instant hearing, I am convinced, subliminally as it were, that there lurks at the foundations of this case a smoldering resentment on the part of Deborah Mastriano relating to elements of her employment experience at the Vandenberg Inn under Bruno Fava and to the delimiting effects of Fava's management policies upon her previous prerogatives, prequisites, and freedoms as a bar manager and bartender at the Holiday Inn, once Fava assumed management of that enterprise. There exists, as well, as an integral element of this case, a well-disguised, carefully controlled dislike of Bruno Fava on the part of Ted Zenich, the Union's principal officer, deriving from their years of association as management-union adversaries. The threshold conclusion in an analysis of this consolidated matter relating to the termination of Deborah Mastriano, and one not lightly articulated, is that Mastriano carefully orchestrated her termination, building the constituent elements of her case through a process of rationalization, exaggeration, magnification, innuendo, and rumor-mongering so as to enmesh allies through a process of encapsulating hearsay. As I observed Mastriano testify before me at the hearing, it became manifest that she was an emotional woman easily moved to tears. I became convinced, upon careful, painstaking scrutiny of her at the hearing, that these traits had generic origins quite separate from the concurrence of her task of testifying concerning alleged sexual harassment of her by Bruno Fava. During her testimony I became convinced also that Mastriano feigned guilelessness, a characteristic belied by reason of her own not unsophisticated maturity; by her experience as a bartender and waitress in an industry involving the continuous and direct exposure of its personnel to influences, interplay, and effects of contemporary morals and mores; and by the calculated skill with which she inserted into her testimony a stream of consciousness embroidery of hearsay and augmentation.

B. Interference, Restraint, and Coercion

At the outset, I conclude, in agreement with the General Counsel, that in speaking to his employees in December, in the course of his first meeting with the employee group following his assumption of managership at the beleaguered Santa Maria enterprise of Respondent, Bruno Fava unlawfully inhibited employees in their right freely to consult with their collective-bargaining representative concerning terms and conditions of employment by instructing them, upon threat of jeopardizing their job, to follow a chain-of-command procedure and to consult first with supervision and management before contacting the Union. This limitation upon the exercise of Section 7 rights violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act even though it did not exclude the Union entirely from the consultative process and doubtlessly was closely related to a perceived need to bring order out of a chaotic situation. See JLG Industries, Inc., 243 NLRB 540 (1979); Interstate Transport Security/ Division of PJR Enterprises, Inc., 240 NLRB 279, 278 (1979).

[34] The conduct was not time-barred by Sec. 10(b) of the Act.

It is on the basis of this impermissible instruction, I conclude and find, that the General Counsel, relying on testimony of witnesses favorable to Flores and Mastriano, endeavored to depict Bruno Fava as an overbearing manager bent on willfully disregarding the representative rights of his employees and the prerogatives of the Union as their chosen collective-bargaining representative. The evidence, as I view it, presents a different focus. At the outset, on the facts as I have found them, I discern nothing impermissible in the conduct or statements of either Frank Fava or Bruno Fava, as they involve Richard Castaneda and/or Paul Flores. Contrary to the General Counsel, the statement forming the basis of the 8(a)(1) allegations of the complaint contained no threats, and no implication of adverse consequence to derive from any contact either Castaneda or Flores might make with the Union concerning their wages, hours, or terms and conditions of employment. The limitation imposed by Bruno Fava upon Flores' use of the telephone during the lunch hour rush was entirely lawful and devoid of coercive effect, within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

C. The Constructive Discharge of Paul Flores

I conclude and find that Respondent constructively discharged Paul Flores by reducing his rate of pay in a manner and to the extent of causing him to proffer his resignation. In this connection I find that the reduction in his hourly rate of pay, disclosed to him on February 20, was the moving cause in Flores' decision to offer his resignation. Finally, I find that Bruno Fava personally intervened in the compensation process on or about February 5 in a manner leading to the reduction in Flores' wage rate to a level below $4.25, the rate at which Flores was initially compensated after being removed from salary. Thus, the evidence establishes that, upon reviewing the paychecks to be issued on February 5, Fava directed payroll personnel to compensate Flores at a rate below $4.25. Fava appears not to have been specific as to the lesser amount intended. Pertinent, however, is the fact that the check representing a rate of $3.60 per hour—a reduction of 73 cents per hour from Flores' previous salary rate cleared—payroll and was issued on February 20 without being countermanded by Fava. The assumption is thus indulged that the $3.60 rate was the one intended by Fava. Fava was a cost-conscious manager keeping a tight rein on wage levels. The inference to be drawn is that, having issued instructions to payroll concerning Flores' rate of pay, Fava scrutinized the February 20 paychecks, or at least Flores', and that he knew the amount being proffered Flores on February 20 but permitted it to issue. I conclude therefore that Fava intended Flores to be compensated at the wage rate of $3.60 contractually accorded fry cooks—an entry level classification. Pointedly, Bruno Fava did not accede to Flores' complaint concerning the extent of his wage reduction, but merely referred him to Frank Fava who, by inference at least, suggested that Flores' proper rate of pay was that paid a fry cook. In due course, Frank Fava relented to the degree of agreeing to effectuate a $3.75 per hour wage rate, a rate 17 percent below Flores' average hourly rate under salary. Flores was not acquiescent and he submitted his resignation, being unwilling to accept the burdens of the job at the substantially reduced rate of pay. Clearly, in my view, the cut in pay was the moving force in Flores' decision to submit his resignation. Despite Respondent's contention otherwise, the entire context of the record establishes to my satisfaction that the substantial reduction in pay was the factor which rendered the terms and conditions of his employment intolerable to Flores.

In conjunction with the foregoing, I further conclude and find that Bruno Fava caused the reduction in Flores' compensation below $4.25 because he knew that Flores had endeavored to contact the Union concerning his dispute over overtime compensation and he invoked his decision to place Flores on hourly wages as a cloak for his retributive reduction in Flores' compensation. The elements of a constructive discharge are thus present because the reduction in Flores' wage rate caused, and was intended to cause, a change in his condition of employment sufficient to force him to resign, and these changes were imposed because Flores had resorted to the Union. See N.L.R.B. v. Holly Bra of California, Inc., 405 F.2d 870 (9th Cir. 1969), enfg. 164 NLRB 1112 (1967); Crystal Princeton Refining Company, 222 NLRB 1068 (1976). Respondent correctly contends that Bruno Fava had reached a decision to withdraw Flores' salary and compensate him on a hourly basis before he became aware that Flores was endeavoring to gain the interposition of the Union. Moreover, the evidence establishes that Fava chastised Flores for using the telephone during the lunch hour rush and not because he was contacting the Union. However, by reason of the telephone interlude, Fava became fully aware that Flores was resorting to the Union in pressing his overtime compensation claim. In the labor market that existed, and in light of Flores' experience as a cook and his demonstrated willingness to take instructions from Frank Fava in the culinary arts, there existed no discernible reason grounded in objective business considerations for Fava to have accomplished the substantial reduction in hourly compensation which resulted. Frank Fava had leveled no criticism against Flores and had not sought Flores' termination. Only Flores' resort to the Union gives rational explanation for the decision of Bruno Fava to reduce Flores' hourly rate of pay and to acquiesce in a reduction to the level accorded new, relatively unskilled cooks.

Upon the foregoing considerations I conclude and find that the evidence preponderates in favor of a finding that Paul Flores was constructively discharged and Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

D. The Termination of Deborah Mastriano

I find that the General Counsel failed to prove by the preponderance of the credible evidence that Bruno Fava terminated Deborah Mastriano because she engaged in union or other protected concerted activities. Rather, I find that Mastriano was terminated for gross insubordination and that Fava acted spontaneously as a consequence of severe provocation provided by Mastriano's loud, repetitive verbal challenges in proximity of customers during business hours. I further find that Fava had not planned Mastriano's termination and that antiunion or legally impermissible motivation arising from Mastriano's involvement in protected concerted activity was nowhere present.

The General Counsel contends that Fava terminated Mastriano because she had complained to the Union on her own behalf, and in the interest of other cocktail waitresses, concerning the nature of the uniforms which they had been instructed to wear, and that these complaints caused Fava to contrive pretexts for justifying Mastriano's termination. I view the record differently and conclude that Fava's asserted anger at Mastriano over the uniform issue was a bogus issue contrived by Mastriano and given credence by Zenich in an effort to launch an assault upon Fava's management techniques and code of discipline which had served to intrude upon Mastriano's past prequisites as a bartender. The record nowhere supports the notion that in Fava's mind the disenchantment of the cocktail waitresses generally, and the complaints of Mastriano, specifically, with respect to the uniforms, had become a matter of cardinal importance sufficient to justify a showdown. Rather, separate from the carefully orchestrated testimony of Mastriano and Zenich, the record reveals that Fava first endeavored to accommodate Mastriano on the issue of modifying the uniform, later experienced transitory anger over the objections being lodged by Mastriano about the uniform, acquiesced in Mastriano's wearing of the modified uniform, and finally permitted her to cease wearing the uniform entirely. Absent in this case is a sufficient showing on the part of the General Counsel that Fava took any exceptional actions with respect to the uniform issue. He advised Dr. Ikola, the stockholder who had initially selected the uniforms, and then communicated to the cocktail waitresses that Dr. Ikola preferred the uniforms to be worn, if possible. Beyond this he responded in a dispassionate manner to union officials who solicited his response. This falls far short of the cause celebre scenario depicted by Mastriano and advanced in support of the complaint by the General Counsel. The purported cooling of Fava's attitude toward Mastriano incident to the uniform complaint has explanation having to do with the self-oriented recalcitrance of Mastriano toward the concept of a computer bar, her refusal to report during a weekend to assist in the installation of a segment of it, and Fava's identification of Mastriano as an employee engaged in gambling on the premises through the roll of dice. In any event, although the record warrants the conclusion that Fava reached a point of exasperation with Mastriano, causing him to welcome a decision on her part to find employment elsewhere, the record, in my view, falls short of establishing that Fava took overt action to bring her employment to an end. Rather, the totality of the evidence establishes that Fava was being very circumspect not to force the issue of Mastriano's continued tenure and may have been influenced in this respect by the fact that he had once before been charged with a violation of the Act in the effectuation of Paul Flores' resignation, and by the active ongoing interest being demonstrated in Mastriano's complaints by representatives of the Union.[35] The relationship in terms of time between the episode involving Flores and the events of November 28 is remote, and supplies no compelling nexus to the action taken with respect to Mastriano. I find on the record as a whole that, on November 28 through words and actions, Mastriano intentionally provoked Fava into terminating her and that Fava responded solely out of agitation and anger generated by Mastriano's conduct during the course of the exchange which took place at the end of the bar in the presence of Connell. I find no violation of the Act evolving from this conduct.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, and upon the entire record in this proceeding, I make the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Holiday Inn of Santa Maria is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Culinary Alliance and Bartenders Union, Local No. 703, Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By instructing employees not to go to the Union concerning work related problems until after they had discussed the problem with their supervisors and management, and inferring that their jobs would be jeopardized if they did not do so, Respondent interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act and engaged in conduct in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By substantially reducing the hourly wage rate of Paul Flores because he had consulted with the Union concerning a dispute over the amount of overtime compensation due him, Respondent constructively terminated Flores on March 2, 1979.

5. Respondent engaged in no other conduct violative of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent constructively discharged Paul Flores on March 2, 1979, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer Flores immediate and full reinstatement to his former position of employment or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of earnings which he may have had as a result of the discrimination against him. Backpay shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[35] Moreover, if Fava had been guilty of a process of sexual harassment involving Mastriano it is doubtful that in the face of union interest in Mastriano's other complaints he would have nonetheless carefully planned her termination thus inviting her wrath and legal recourse.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record herein, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[36]

The Respondent, Holiday Inn of Santa Maria, Santa Maria, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Instructing employees to refrain from contacting or consulting with the Union, or representatives thereof, with respect to problems or other matters relating to their terms and conditions of employment until after they have consulted with supervision or management, and inferring that their jobs would be in jeopardy if they did not do so.

(b) Constructively discharging employees.

(c) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which it is found will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer Paul Flores immediate and full reinstatement to his former position of employment or, if such position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of pay or other benefits he may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against him, in the manner described in the section of the Decision entitled, "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its Santa Maria facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[37] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being duly signed by a representative of Respondent, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by Respondent for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 31, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

---

[36] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections hereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[37] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Bramble's Graphic Center, Inc. and Fred P. Rousseau. Case 7-CA-15118

December 11, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Van de Water and Members Jenkins and Hunter

On May 1, 1979, the National Labor Relations Board issued an Order[1] wherein it ordered Respondent to offer reinstatement to, and make whole, Fred Rousseau for loss of pay suffered by reason of Respondent's discrimination against him. On July 9, 1980, the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit entered a judgment[2] summarily enforcing the Board's Order. A controversy having arisen over the amount of backpay due the discriminatee under the terms of the Board's Order, the Regional Director for Region 7, on October 29, 1980, issued a backpay specification and notice of hearing alleging the amount of backpay due. Respondent failed to file an answer to the specification.

On August 27, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on September 2, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent failed to file a response to the Notice To Show Cause and, accordingly, the allegations in the Motion for Summary Judgment stand uncontroverted.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.54 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> (a) The respondent shall, within 15 days from the service of the specification, if any, file an answer thereto . . . .
> (c) If the respondent fails to file any answer to the specification within the time prescribed by this section, the Board may, either with or without taking evidence in support of the allegations of the specification and without notice to the respondent, find the specification to be true and enter such order as may be appropriate. . . .

The backpay specification and notice of hearing, duly served on Respondent by certified mail on or about October 29, 1980, specifically states that, if an answer to the backpay specification is not filed within 15 days from the date of service thereof, "such allegations shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and Respondent shall be precluded from introducing any evidence controverting them." Further, by letter dated January 23, 1981, Respondent's attorney of record was notified that an answer to the backpay specification had not been filed, that the time for filing had been extended until February 5, 1981, and that summary judgment would be sought unless an answer was filed. Respondent has not filed an answer to the backpay specification or to the Notice To Show Cause and, in accordance with the rule set forth above, the allegations in the backpay specification are deemed to be admitted and are found to be true. Accordingly, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Bramble's Graphic Center, Inc., Detroit, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall make whole discriminatee Fred P. Rousseau by payment to him of $3,550.90, plus interest to be computed in the manner specified in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977),[3] until payment of all backpay due, less tax withholding required by Federal and state laws.

[1] The Order is not included in the volumes of Board Decisions.

[2] N.L.R.B. v. Bramble's Graphic Center, Inc., Case 80-1217.

[3] In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

Weirton Steel, Division of National Steel Corporation and Independent Steelworkers Union. Case 6-CA-12955

December 11, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On March 12, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Thomas A. Ricci issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a brief in answer to Respondent's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions[3] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified and restated herein.[4]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified and set out in full below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Weirton Steel, Division of National Steel Corporation, Weirton, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain in good faith on the subject of its stock investment plan with Independent Steelworkers Union on behalf of employees in the following bargaining units:

> All office clerical, plant clerical and technical employees, including research technician-A, research technician-B, technician-A, technician-B, junior technician, shop technician-A, shop technician-B, storekeeper, junior draftsmen, stenographer, receptionist, typist, typist-temporary-research and development, office girl, senior research technician, senior shop technician, and file girl employed by National Steel Corporation's Research and Development Department at its Weirton, West Virginia, facility; excluding all other employees, employees currently represented by labor organizations, confidential employees, managerial employees, and guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.
> All office clerical, plant clerical and technical employees, including Industrial Engineer technicians, juniors and stenographers employed

[1] Respondent excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's ruling excluding an abstract of its payroll records, contending that the payroll records were voluminous and therefore the abstract should have been permitted under Fed. R. Evid. 1006, 28 U.S.C.A. We find no merit to this exception, noting that, at the hearing, Respondent offered neither to introduce the original payroll records into evidence, nor to demonstrate that these records could not conveniently be examined in the hearing room.

[2] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

In the "Background Facts" section of his Decision, the Administrative Law Judge incorrectly stated that employees could contribute as much as 10 percent of their gross pay to the stock plan. The record reveals that the plan allows them to contribute a maximum of only 7-1/2 percent. Additionally, the Administrative Law Judge referred to the Independent Steelworkers Union as the International Steelworkers Union. These inadvertent errors in the Administrative Law Judge's Decision do not affect his conclusions or our adoption thereof.

Respondent excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Respondent's spokesman McCreary refused even to talk about the possibility of continuing the stock plan for employees in the bargaining unit, contending that this finding is unsupported by the record. On several occasions, McCreary agreed to talk about the possibility of Respondent continuing the plan and provided the Union with purported reasons for its refusal to continue it. However, in light of the Administrative Law Judge's well-documented finding that Respondent's purpose in refusing to consider continuing the plan was to discourage its employees from participating in union activities, we agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent did not bargain in good faith with respect to this issue.

[3] The General Counsel excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's failure to conclude that certain statements made by Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Administrative Law Judge found that on August 8, 1979, McCreary told union negotiators that they could have the stock plan if they forgot about the Union. We agree with the General Counsel that McCreary made this statement in order to dissuade employees from supporting the Union and thereby violated the Act. We shall amend the recommended Order accordingly.

The Administrative Law Judge recommended that Respondent pay $75,000 per month to the credit of eligible employees for the time period in which they were deprived of the stock plan, in order to compensate them for the loss of earnings suffered in consequence of Respondent's illegal conduct.

The Administrative Law Judge found that May 1979, during which Respondent paid $75,000 into the plan to match employee contributions, was a representative period for the purpose of determining Respondent's backpay liability. Review of the record indicates that this issue was not fully litigated at the hearing. Accordingly, we shall leave to compliance proceedings the determination of whether May 1979 was a representative period.

The Administrative Law Judge also recommended that Respondent compensate employees for dividends that would have been earned on National Steel stock purchased by employee and company contributions if Respondent had not unlawfully discontinued the plan. We agree that Respondent must compensate employees for dividends on stock that would have been purchased by Respondent's matching contributions. However, we will not require Respondent to compensate employees for dividends that would have been earned on employee purchases of National Steel stock since this would go beyond our requirement that employees be made whole for losses suffered as a result of Respondent's unlawful action. We shall modify the recommended Order accordingly.

[4] We modify the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order to apply to "employees in the bargaining unit" rather than "salaried employees."

by the Weirton Steel Division of National Steel Corporation at its Weirton, West Virginia, and Steubenville, Ohio, facilities, and National Steel Corporation's Commercial Management Services Departments at its Weirton, West Virginia, facilities; excluding all other employees, all employees currently represented by labor organizations, Labor Relations stenographers and typists, confidential employees, managerial employees and guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Denying employees in the above-mentioned units the continued benefits of Respondent's stock investment plan for the purpose of restraining and coercing them, and other employees of National Steel Corporation, in their union activities.

(c) Telling its employees that they could continue to enjoy the stock investment plan if they forgot about the Union.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain in good faith with Independent Steelworkers Union, as agent of employees in the above-mentioned units, on the subject of Respondent's stock investment plan.

(b) Make whole all of the employees in the above-mentioned units for all economic benefits denied them as a result of its discontinuance of their participation in its stock investment plan for the period beginning September 1, 1979, until such time as Respondent complies with this remedial order, in the manner set forth in the Administrative Law Judge's Decision, as modified herein.

(c) Post at its Weirton, West Virginia, and Steubenville, Ohio, plants copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being duly signed by its representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 6, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with Independent Steelworkers Union as agent of the employees in the units described below, on the subject of our stock investment plan.

WE WILL NOT deprive the employees in the units described below of the benefits of our stock investment plan for purposes of restraining and coercing them in their freedom to engage in union activities or to seek representation by Independent Steelworkers Union.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that they could continue to enjoy our stock investment plan if they forgot about the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole the employees in the units described below for loss of economic benefits resulting from our discontinuing their participation in our stock investment plan.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain in good faith with Independent Steelworkers Union as the agent of employees in the units described below on the subject of our stock investment plan. The bargaining units are:

All office clerical, plant clerical and technical employees, including research technician-A, research technician-B, technician-A, technician-B, junior technician, shop technician-A, shop technician-B, storekeeper, junior draftsmen, stenographer, receptionist,

WEIRTON STEEL, DIVISION OF NATIONAL STEEL CORPORATION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS A. RICCI, Administrative Law Judge: A hearing in this proceeding was held on October 15 and 16, 1980, in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on complaint of the General Counsel against Weirton Steel, Division of National Steel Corporation, herein called the Respondent or the Company. The complaint issued on January 31, 1980, upon a charge filed by Independent Steelworkers Union, herein called the Union, on November 23, 1979. The principal issue of the case is whether the Respondent in truth committed an unfair labor practice by refusing to bargain about, or to continue, an established stock investment plan for the benefit of its employees in order to coerce them in their freedom to engage in collective bargaining through the Union. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent.

Upon the entire record and from my observation of the witnesses I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Weirton Steel Division of National Steel Corporation is a Delaware corporation, engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale of steel and steel products at its Weirton, West Virginia, and Steubenville, Ohio, locations. During a 12-month period ending November 1979, in the course of its business, it purchased and received at its Weirton location goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from out-of-state sources. I find that the Respondent is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

I find that Independent Steelworkers Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background Facts

National Steel Corporation is a large company which produces steel. It operates through a number of subdivisions, one of them, called Weirton Steel, is immediately involved in this case. Generally speaking, the major group of employees working for the entire company fall into two classes: (1) hourly paid production and maintenance workers, who are engaged in the direct production process; and (2) salaried office and technical workers, sometimes called clericals. There are large groups of both categories employed in the many subdivisions of the parent company, located in different cities. The production and maintenance employees have for some years been represented by the Independent Steelworkers Union, under regular collective-bargaining contracts. Up to the time of the events which gave rise to this proceeding, none of the office workers or salaried employees had been represented by any union.

One of the distinctive benefits enjoyed by all the salaried employees as a condition of their employment is the right to participate in what is called the stock investment plan, a fringe benefit not accorded to the production and maintenance employees. The salaried employees can, if they choose, contribute a certain percentage of their pay to this plan for the purpose of purchasing stock in National Steel. They can contribute as much as 10 percent of their gross pay. In turn, the Company is obligated, still under the terms of the plan, to contribute an equal amount—called matching funds—to the credit of each participating employee. What stock, as a result, the individual then comes to own, is determined by adding his and the Company's matching contribution. However, the plan provides that in no event is the Company required to contribute more than 7-1/2 percent of the employee's pay, in the event the employee chooses to contribute up to 7-1/2 percent or more. There are also detailed provisions for permissible increase or reduction in an employee's contribution or participation, withdrawal or reentry into the plan, etc., but these matters are not germane to the issue to be decided here. The overall plan is administered by trustees, under the terms of a written arrangement, and they have the right, clearly stated, to suspend the Company's contributions altogether in the event, in their opinion, the Company's economic condition so requires.

In 1978 the salaried employees—office clericals, plant clericals, technical employees, etc.—at the two locations operated by the Company's Weirton Division—one at Weirton, West Virginia, and one at Steubenville, Ohio--turned to the International Steelworkers Union for representation. In consequence a Board election took place in each of the two groups, as separate bargaining units, and on September 28, 1978, the Union was certified as bargaining agent in each unit. There followed a series of bargaining sessions, 33 of them, starting in January 1979 and ending at the end of August of that year. The Company was represented by one committee, with John McCreary, vice president of industrial relations, as chief spokesman, and an employee committee of nine persons speaking for the Union, with their lawyer, Robertson. On August 30, 1979, the parties signed a comprehensive collective-bargaining contract covering both units.

Beginning with its first reaction to the Union's initial list of demands, and holding firm to the very end of the negotiation sessions, the Respondent adamantly, and without qualification, held firm to a refusal to accede to the employees' request that they be permitted to continue their participation in the stock investment plan. The eventual agreement signed makes no reference to the plan; the understanding was that these people would no longer enjoy that particular employment benefit is clear. Thereafter, the Union filed a charge with the Board, saying that the Company committed an unfair labor practice by withholding that plan from these particular salaried employees and by refusing to bargain in good faith about it.

B. The Theory of Illegality

The complaint speaks of the Respondent's conduct with respect to this stock investment plan fringe benefit as violative of three separate prohibitions set out in the statute. One allegation is that, by telling the employees they would retain the benefit only on condition they rejected representation by the Union, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1). Another allegation is that by denying them that benefit, in the contract as signed, it discriminated against them in violation of Section 8(a)(3). And then the complaint alleges that, by its refusal to bargain about the plan at all as a possible condition of employment throughout the negotiation sessions, the Company violated Section 8(a)(5), refusal to bargain. In the light of the evidence received at the hearing, oral and documentary, I view these as but multiple paraphrasing of a single idea, and it is that the Company illegally coerced and restrained the employees in their right to engage in collective bargaining. In fact, the complaint also alleges, as indeed it must, that by each of the separately articulated unfair labor practices it also violated Section 8(a)(1).

I think that the essential theory of illegality charged to the Respondent, however phrased, is that National Steel passed a message to all its salaried employees—both those at the two locations involved in this case and all those working for it at its many other locations—that if any of them chose to go union—as none had previously done—they would pay a price, and that the Company would see to it that they paid that penalty, by losing the very substantial financial benefit of participation in the stock investment plan.

In denying the commission of any unfair labor practice, the Respondent's principal defense is that the Company is not obligated to yield to any demand of the Union, that in the give and take of the bargaining process it is free to pick and choose among the demands and counterdemands, and that all it did in this case was say no in response to the Union's demand for an economic benefit to the employees. There are other defense contentions. The Company also asserts that it did discuss this particular demand among those of the Union's that it did bargain in good faith, that it gave substantial quid pro quo in return for withholding the plan, that the employees were anyway free to do as they wished. It is also argued that the Union did not have to settle and sign the binding contract finally agreed to, and since it voluntarily accepted the complete terms of a comprehensive agreement, how can it now complain that there was any illegal coercion.

C. The Evidence: Analysis

The confusing use of words in the complaint tends to distort the real issue of the case and therefore calls for clarification at the outset. At one point, the complaint stated that on August 30 the Company "excluded" these employees from further enjoyment of the stock investment plan. This is another way of saying that the Company that day took the benefit away from them, like cutting their pay. At another point the complaint stated that on August 8 the Company "promised to return" that same benefit to the employees on the condition they rejected the Union. How could the Company, on August 8, promise to give back something it never took away until 3 weeks later? Besides, the idea, literally expressed, that the Company "disqualified" these employees from the plan is incorrect. It did not do it as a unilateral act; in fact, as will appear below, its spokesman told the union committee, before August 30, it was up to them, it was for the employees to decide whether they wished to continue enjoyment of that benefit. And in the end, when they voted to ratify the agreement reached by the two committees in the final negotiation sessions, the employees said, "Allright, if we have to we will do without the stock investment plan."

This erroneous language in the complaint in turn tends to lend a certain superficial persuasiveness to some of the defense assertions. By merely pointing to the Union agreeing, as in the end it did, to doing without the stock investment plan, the Respondent effectively destroys, on the face of things, the alleged "discrimination" under Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. And talking between the parties there were, hundreds and hundreds of pages as recorded by the stenographer who were present at 33 meetings. The company spokesman said no a number of times to the Union's demand on this point. The law clearly saying neither party need concede any economic demand, there results a seemingly correct picture. In the circumstances, I think it best to start by stating in very plain English what this case is actually about.

That this stock investment plan has always been a very substantive condition of employment of the salaried employees, and therefore a mandatory subject of collective bargaining, is so clear as to require little citation of authority. Winn-Dixie Texas, Inc. d/b/a Foodway, 234 NLRB 72 (1978). There were about 1,050 employees in the two bargaining units involved. For the month of April 1979 alone, 529 of the employees were contributing 7-1/2 percent of their pay into the fund, an average of $112 per man. This means the Company was paying out to their benefit, under the matching funds system, an equal amount. Even today $25 a week is a good part of a man's pay. There were 298 other employees contributing a lower percentage of their pay, and therefore receiving less cash for work from the Company. All of these employees lost this part of their pay when the union contract was signed. And the reason was because from first to last the company spokesman held firm to a fixed no, refusing time and time again to even consider the possibility of continuing the plan.

Why did the Respondent do that? This is the question in this case. It will not do for the Company now to say no employer is obligated to grant any economic demand by a union. Of course it does not have to concede employee benefits in the bargaining process. It can even insist to impasse upon reducing the established hourly wage rate. It can discharge any employee it does not like, as has been said, for a good reason, for a bad reason, or for no reason at all. But if it reduces the pay, if it rejects a demand out of hand, if it fires a man, all for the purpose of discouraging and, intentionally, putting a stop to union activities, it violates this statute in every instance. That is what this law is all about. This is why every violation of Section 8(a)(2), (3), (4), and (5) of the Act is also a violation of Section 8(a)(1). "It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7." No matter how it is accomplished, be it by threat, creation of an employer dominated group, discharge of a man, retaliation for testifying at a Labor Board hearing, or refusal to bargain in good faith, if the purpose of the activity is to coerce the employees so that they will agree to discontinue attempts at union representation in collective bargaining, the conduct is prohibited, and not permissible at all. Has such an illegal purpose been proved in this case? It matters not how the complaint be phrased, the question remains the same.[1]

A very comparable case is The Kroger Co., 164 NLRB 362 (1967), enfd. 401 F.2d 682 (6th Cir. 1968), cert. denied 395 U.S. 904 (1969). There, a savings and profit-sharing plan was involved, and there too, although the employees involved had previously enjoyed the benefit of the plan while not represented by any union, the company refused to talk about it with their newly chosen union and refused to include it as a benefit in the contract eventually signed. The only difference between that case and this lies in the nature of the evidence proving the illegal purpose. Unlike here, the Kroger plan, as written, in haec verba excluded any and all union-represented employees. It read as follows:

> Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions, any employee who is covered by a limited group pension plan as herein defined shall cease to be eligible hereunder and, if a member of this Plan, shall be considered to have withdrawn therefrom on the date when such coverage commenced. The term "limited group pension plan" means a plan for the payment of pensions or other retirement benefits which (a) is limited in its coverage to a particular group of employees, and (b) is established by or at the request of the covered employees or their authorized representatives. [Emphasis supplied.]

But unlawful motive, or prohibited intent, is rarely proved by explicit and direct evidence. The question is comparable to a charge of hidden unlawful purpose in the obstensibly justified discharge of an individual employee. Therefore, no two cases are alike and none can be determinative precedent for the next; good faith "can have meaning only in its application to the particular facts of a particular case." N.L.R.B. v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395 (1952). While it is true that the statute provides that neither party to the bargaining process need yield its position on any lawful proposal ". . . one must recognize as well that bad faith is prohibited though done with sophistication and finesse. Consequently, to sit at the bargaining table, or . . . to make concessions here and there, could be the very means by which to conceal a purposeful strategy to make bargaining futile or fail." N.L.R.B. v. Herman Sausage Co., Inc., 275 F.2d 229, 232 (5th Cir. 1960).

D. The Evidence

In the case at bar, the proof of illegal motive in what was ostensible bargaining is twofold. Part of it appears in the recorded transcripts of the regular negotiation sessions that took place, where the established committees and their principal spokesmen participated. The second part is oral testimony at the hearing concerning a meeting where no transcript record was made, held shortly before the final collective-bargaining agreement was signed. I find that, viewed in totality, the evidence does prove affirmatively both that the Respondent's spokesman, John McCreary, refused to talk about the possibility of continuing the investment plan for these salaried employees in any form, and that the Respondent's purpose behind such refusal was to discourage both these and all its other nonrepresented salaried employees from any steps towards union representation.

One further detail must be clarified before the evidence is listed. Among its many starting economic and other demands which the Union wrote out and which the Company studied before any discussions took place were several that would have given these salaried employees more, in the stock investment plan, than they were at the moment enjoying. It was proposed that they be able to change their individual participation twice instead of once each year; that the Company match their contributions up to 10 percent of their salary, instead of only as high as 7-1/2 percent; and that the employees be permitted to contribute more than 10 percent into the plan, but with no obligation on the part of the Company to give over 10 percent. The Company rejected all proposals about the plan offhand. In the session there was mention of the fact that some of the suggested improvements in the plan would cost the Company more money. As the early meetings continued, the Union gave up on these suggested improvements and came down to the level where it asked for no more than exactly what the plan had long provided and was being enjoyed by the employees at that moment. The "no" response held firm. With this, clear on the record, the question of the case reverts to its basic form. Why did the Company, even then, and to the very end, refuse to talk about it at all?

[1] The General Counsel's reliance, in his brief, upon N.L.R.B. v. Benne Katz, Alfred Tinkel, and Murray Katz, d/b/a Williamsburg Steel Products Company, 369 U.S. 736 (1962), is misplaced. There the employer acted unilaterally, just gave the employees a raise during the union organizational campaign. The Court held this was coercive, an unfair labor practice, because of the very nature of the act. From this the General Counsel argues that the Company here should be found to have acted illegally "without regard to respondent's subjective state of mind." The logical continuance of this argument is that, when unorganized employees start bargaining through a union, all negotiations must be upward, they must always end up with all they previously had plus what the bargaining process adds to their old quantum of economic benefits. But the General Counsel was careful not to go that far, and correctly so, because the position misconceives this entire case.

Another argument was made by the company spokesman, at certain early meetings, that must be mentioned. The overall, companywide plan is administered by trustees, all pursuant to terms and provisions spelled out in writing and approved by the Internal Revenue Service. As stated above, the trustees have the power to discontinue the Company's matching funds if economic conditions make it advisable. In his constant repetition of the phrase that he would never agree to incorporate the plan in any form in "any bargaining unit," McCreary said there might be the danger that such a contractual obligation on the Company would make it impossible for the trustees to stop the contributions in the event of economic stress. He may have been right on that score. But again the union spokesmen removed that obstacle. The Union's final position was it wanted, or at least was asking the Company to consider the possibility of continuing, the plan in precisely the same form as it was in effect at the time, including any limitations on employee enjoyment as it stood. But still again the answer was "no," without further talk.

There is a significant difference between an employer telling his employees they will not get more if they go union, and telling them they will without doubt lose something they already have if they persist in such activities. An employer has a right to bargain hard, as the cases say, and when that happens and the greater number of as yet unorganized personnel learn that their fellow employees gained nothing by paying union dues, they may well be discouraged from themselves pursuing that course. But when the employer takes pains to assure that in any union contract the employees have to surrender a long enjoyed and established benefit—and reveals its purpose to be that all the unorganized employees understand that—it effectively weakens any thoughts in the larger group to attempt unionization at all. This is what the words "restrain or coerce" mean in the statute.

The written transcripts of all that was said during the 33 meetings between the two committees span over 1,800 pages; all were placed into evidence. The following are pertinent excerpts from those transcripts:

March 22

McCreary: As to your demands relative to a stock investment program, we do not propose to offer it to you. [This was McCreary's initial response to the Union's demands touching upon the stock investment plan.]

April 16

Mr. Bakich [for the Union]: The counterproposal on the stock plan—what is your answer to our counterproposal to the stock plan to have the same system the way it is set up now, that will bind you to no contract whatsoever due to money difficulties within the corporation? Within the corporation, you can stop the existing plan at Weirton Steel. What is your answer to that counterproposal, Mr. McCreary?

* * * * *

Mr. McCreary: The Company's response of 31 through 34 [the four union demands touching on the stock plan] is the same as it was prior to your counterproposal . . . "The demands are rejected."

April 27

Mr. Petrella [for the Union]: I have a couple of questions. One is the company position on the stock. Does it still remain the same?

Mr. McCreary: You may assume, Craig, that all company positions remain the same unless I advise you differently in the course of one of these meetings.

May 18

Mr. McCreary: We never really got to that subject because the position of the management of National Steel Corporation in respect to these negotiations is: (1) No stock investment plan, and (2) no offset or no parody kind of arrangement for the stock investment plan. So, we didn't talk about the possibilities of parody. The stress of the meeting a week ago Wednesday with Mr. Angevine had to do with the potentially unhappy affects of agreeing with the ISU salaried committee on stock investments, primarily, but also some of the other benefits matters which are in issue on the potential for organizing salaried employees at other divisions.

May 31

Mrs. Shawver [for the Union]: You stated that the company is willing to pay for the right to management to run the business and all earlier in your talk there. But are you not willing to talk about the two, the rates of pay and stock program. We can consider these two issues an impasse as far as you are concerned right now?

Mr. McCreary: I didn't say I wasn't willing to talk about it . . . Somebody down at the end of the table asked me specifically about the stock plan, and

I said I was willing to entertain union proposals. I am willing to entertain any union proposals, obviously, for alternatives to the stock plan. Whether or not I can do anything about them at this point, I can't say.

August 13

Mr. McCreary: With respect to the stock investment plan, the Union Demands 31 through 34, the result of the meeting on the 6th of August was to reaffirm the Company's response to this demand dated 3/15/79 . . . The Company will not agree to . . . the Company will, obviously, discuss what the Union wants to discuss, but the Company at this point is not going to agree to any alternate to the stock plan.

* * * * *

Mr. Robertson [the union lawyer]: What is the Company's reasoning in not granting the Union's demand for a plan—first of all, we asked for a stock plan, and then we revised it to indicate that we would accept the stock plan which gave the Company the sole right to terminate the plan at any time they saw fit for economic reasons, to terminate for the rest of the salaried employees of National Steel. What is the reason that that cannot be agreed to?

Mr. McCreary: The reasons are simply-fold. Number one, it is expensive. We are not particularly charged up about the prospect of spending the money, at least not at Weirton at the present time . . . More to the point, I suppose is the prospective effect of giving the stock plan in a collective bargaining negotiation to a one-certified labor organization and the anticipated effect that that would have on other similarly situated groups, both other salaried groups and other production and maintenance groups, both here at Weirton and other divisions. It is the original hole in the dike that we don't want to put in the dike.

Mr. Robertson: You are afraid your other salaried employees will organize?

Mr. McCreary: No. We are afraid our other salaried employees will organize, and we are also afraid our other hourly employees will demand the stock plan.

* * * * *

Mr. Shawver: If we are getting slapped across the fingers, then fine. Let's call a spade a spade and say, "If you guys organize, we are going to take the plan away from you."

Mr. McCreary: Or you can look at it from the company standpoint, and that is there are extraordinary costs and expenses associated with the negotiation and maintenance of the union for salaried non exempt employees which are attempting to recoup or offset by not giving you the stock plan. We are saying the same thing in perhaps slightly less words.

* * * * *

Mr. McCreary: It is an expensive proposition to have a union.

Mr. Robertson: If you did not have these costs, would you be willing to offer the stock?

Mr. McCreary: It depends on why I didn't have the costs, I suppose, David.

* * * * *

Mr. McCreary: It depends on a variety of circumstances. Obviously, if the Company's position is that the stock plan or the absence of the stock plan is an offset for the additional expenses involved in maintaining the relationship with the union, and the company is not required to maintain a relationship with the union, it would have to look at its position with respect to the stock plan.

* * * * *

Mr. Robertson: My question is: Do you intend to provide the stock to the salaried non exempt employees in this union even though it is not a matter of contract?

* * * * *

Mr. Robertson: Your position, John, I guess, is that from the company's viewpoint, they cannot agree to the stock plan because in future organizational campaigns, they wish to be able to cite the fact that the stock plan, historically, is available to unorganized salaried employees; is that correct?

Mr. McCreary: That is correct.Yes.

Mr. Robertson: If you go the way of Weirton salary, you, too, will be faced with the loss of the stock plan.

Mr. McCreary: The possibility of the loss of the stock plan. As I say, elsewhere, as here, it is a mandatory subject of bargaining.

Mr. Robertson: And its omission from this contract shall exists as a veiled threat to other salaried employees of National.

Mr. McCreary: Veiled threats are in the eyes of the beholder. It will exist as a fact which people can view and reach their own conclusion about.

August 14

Mr. Robertson: It is a question of whether you have X number of stewards, and you are creating other positions, and if so, are they all entitled to lost time or is that a liability of the Union?

Mr. McCreary: If you drop your demand to pay them for some or all of this process, you can pick anybody you want to.

Mrs. Shawver: If we do that can we get the stock program?

Mr. McCreary: No.

After a July 27 meeting, the employee members of the union committee, frustrated by the endless talking that was accomplishing little of substance, and fearful of possible decertification of the Union a month later, decided to talk with McCreary without their lawyer, and without the formality of transcript recording. At their request, seven of the nine members met with McCreary and several of his committee group, on the afternoon of August 8, in the regular conference room. All seven of the union men present there testified. From their pertinent testimony:

> Joseph Shawver: . . . we were concerned about the impasse, as far as the stock program was concerned, and we asked him about this program, if there was any way that we could get this into our contract, to bring it back to our people, this was the final stumbling block, that we felt, as far as going back to our people, we could take the contract back and have it ratified, so we brought this up, at which time we were told . . . Mr. McCreary told us again, that there would [be] no stock program, as far as the C and T [clerical and technical] people were concerned, Weirton Steel Company. At that time, he said that there would be no stock program, to take back to our people, and that he had given us a contract that was inferior, and one that we felt that we could not take back to our people and have ratified.

> JUDGE RICCI: Did you say on direct examination that at that August 8th meeting, did you quote McCreary as saying that the reason why the company did not want to give the union that stock plan, was so the employees would refuse to ratify the contract?
> THE WITNESS: Yes, sir, that's what I said.
> Edward Simmons: . . . Mr. McCreary did all the talking, and he said that in no way we are ever going to get the stock plan, and he even talked about some alternative methods of making up a difference in that loss, and he said that we weren't going to make up any sort of a difference, or get the stock plan either . . . he indicated that if he gave us the stock plan, the rest of the National Steel would be organized . . . he made more or less a statement that I can't make any promises, you know that, but if the union would just sort of disappear, you would probably maintain all the benefits that you enjoy now, because the hourly ISU unit down there.

> Q. During the course of negotiations, did any employer representative tell you, or any of the negotiating committee, as to why the employer was not willing to agree to this stock investment plan?
>
> A. If you mean by during negotiations, all the meetings that we attended, I think the only one was that one that you referred to, where our lawyer was not present, there were seven negotiators there, where he was afraid the rest of the salaried in the corporation would be organized, if they saw that we were able to organize and keep all of our benefits, and the stock plan too.
> A. I think I also stated that, he [McCreary] said I can't make you any promises, but if the union was just going to happen to disappear, then you would probably go ahead and enjoy the same benefits that you have enjoyed before the organization of the union.
> Robert Lewis: The nature of the discussion was that if Mr. McCreary did not intend to offer stock plan to any bargaining unit employees.
>
> Q. Did he give any reason for this?
>
> A. Well, not at that meeting though, meetings in the past, to be comparative and stuff with other companies, they did not intend to offer the bargaining unit people the stock plan, because we had become unionized.
> * * * * *
> A. The statement that I can remember was if the Union would walk away, then as long as he was present, we could keep our stock.
> Q. And that occurred at the meeting you recall as being August 8th, 1979?
>
> A. Yes.
> Adam Hudek: . . . the only comments, I believe that I can remember is that, I think Mr. McCreary mentioned that he wanted the union to go away, and some of the other negotiators had questioned him as to what status the stock plan was, and exactly what they were driving at, we never accomplished, or what they personally were driving at, I did not have personal comments with Mr. McCreary at that meeting, but it was not in reference to the stock plan.
>
> Well, he discussed the issue, I believe it was with one of the negotiators, and he said something to the effect that the stock plan, he could not offer it, but obviously we had it before, and more or less that we would keep it, you know, if we did not have a union.
> Q. Now, at that meeting, did Mr. McCreary promise you, that if you ceased supporting the Union, decertified the union, or abandoned your participation in the union, you would receive the stock plan?

> A. . . . my memory on the meeting wasn't the greatest, and I believe that Mr. McCreary said that he wanted the union to go away, somehow, someway, and again, the words he said, I got the impression, he said if the union was gone, we had the stock plan before the union came, and with a shrug of the shoulder or something like that, we will keep it still if the union was gone, that was my impression of the talk, but the specifics, I can't recall.
> Mc Creary: I don't think there was any direct comment.

Against the foregoing there is the following testimony by McCreary:

> He started by describing the meeting as a "bitch session." Then there was a specific question asked to me by Mr. Shawver, and that question was in effect, "Why aren't you giving us the stock investment plan," and my response being, I told him, I've been telling you since this thing started, why you are not going to get the stock investment plan, and he said suppose the union was just to go away, what would happen then, and I said Joe, you know, I can't make you any promises, we are in a bargaining situation here, but I told you before, when we talked about this subject, that the employees' stock investment plan, in its present form, it is available to all salaried employees of the National Steel Corporation. The only thing that can affect that availability is the existence of a collective-bargaining agent, and then it becomes a mandatory subject of bargaining. If there were no collective-bargaining agent, I have no reason to believe that the employees, these employees will not be covered by that stock investment.

McCreary closed with denying having said, at the August 8 meeting, that his reason for refusing the stock investment plan was any fear that by granting it to these people other divisions of National Steel Company would be organized. He also denied having asked the men to decertify the Union. Beyond this, McCreary did not otherwise contradict the testimony of the union committeemen.

Although there were three other persons present at that meeting representing the Company, none of them testified concerning what was said on that day.

As stated above, I think the foregoing evidence proves affirmatively the reason why the Respondent refused to continue the investment plan for these people, or even to talk of any such possibility, was because, and only because, they had taken the first step towards unionization among all the Company's salaried personnel, wherever located. When McCreary talked, during the recorded meetings, about never permitting the plan to be covered by any "bargaining unit," about his fixed determination to give neither the stock plan nor any "off set" or "parody" in its place, he strongly indicated both his closed mind on the bargainable issue and his unlawful motivation. When Robertson, on August 13, asked him was this a "veiled threat" to the as yet unorganized salaried employees elsewhere, McCreary said the outsiders could decide that question for themselves when they looked at the ultimate facts, "reach their own conclusions." In the collective-bargaining process, especially one as long drawn out as this, an illegal motive, if in fact it exists, is rarely articulated in so many words. McCreary's lengthy discourses, appearing both in the minutes of the negotiation meetings and in his extended testimony at the hearing, show a master of words, and a talented skill at speaking indirectly and with obfuscation. But it is the total picture of the events that must be evaluated, not any single phrase or comment. His recorded words must also be taken with the fact—as to which there is no question—that management never varied an iota from its absolute refusal to yield in the slightest on the subject of the plan, indeed, even to talk about any possibility of compromising on the subject.

In giving their recollections of what was said at some of the recorded meetings, several employee-members of the union committee quoted McCreary in more explicit language. At one point Shawver said he heard the statement that the Company was refusing the plan because of "the fact that we had organized," because "these other sister divisions were watching, and if we got a contract and didn't lose anything, then they too, would follow unionization." But this man also admitted this was "probably off the record," "it came from the other side of the table," "I don't know specifically who said that." Hudeck, also of the committee, quoted McCreary as saying "they were worried about other corporations possibly unionizing, if we were given the stock plan as a union." This witness, too, added he did not remember "exact words," "I'm not sure if it was a direct statement," "somehow I came out with the feeling."

Given McCreary's oblique way of talking about this subject during the recorded meetings, it is understandable that some of the listeners would later recall the conversations as much in terms of what impressions were conveyed than in precisely what words were spoken. But because the discussions were recorded by a stenographer, fairness demands that only what was then written be considered now and not the ideas that witnesses think were intended. A more significant example of this is testimony, at the hearing, by the Union's lawyer, Robertson. He recalled McCreary saying that ". . . under a Domino theory, if the Independent Steelworkers Union walked out with the stock plan, that this could create serious organizational problems for them in other divisions . . . ." In fact, the transcripts do not show that McCreary ever spoke of a domino theory in so many words. But he did speak of intending to avoid any single "hole in the dike," "the anticipated effect that that [continuing the stock plan] would have on other similarly situated groups." With this spoken by McCreary, Robertson was not wrong in paraphrasing it as a "domino" basis for refusal.

We come to the unrecorded meeting of August 8. Disturbed by the substantive futility of the long bargaining sessions up to that point, primarily over the imminent loss of the stock investment plan, the employee committee wanted to make a last effort, without the formality of the lawyer or the stenographer, to prevail upon

McCreary to let them keep it. The essence of their testimony is that he made them understand that with a union they were not going to get it, but without a union they could keep it. It matters not who brought up the subject of removing the Union from the picture. I think it clear it was the employees who asked would the Company's position change if the Union were decertified, or otherwise removed from the picture. It was a logical thing for them to inquire about, for they had been listening to McCreary's oblique message that it was the presence of the Union which dictated loss of the plan to these people. I credit their testimony. McCreary's testimony about that meeting is not really in conflict with that of the employees. He said, "It [the plan] is available to all salaried employees . . . . The only thing that can affect that availability is the existence of a collective bargaining agent . . . . If there were no collective bargaining agent . . . ." I find, whatever words he used, that he did tell the union committeemen at the August 8 meeting that if they forgot the Union altogether they would continue to enjoy the benefits of the stock plan.

At the hearing, the Respondent asserted other reasons why it refused to permit these employees to continue the benefits of the stock plan. I find none of them convincing. One idea was that it costs the employer money to have a union represent its employees, paid time for union stewards being a major element. But when McCreary asked Robertson, on August 14, would the Union drop its demand that the Company "pay them [the stewards] for some or all of this process," the lawyer's response was to ask would the Company in that case give the employees the stock investment plan. McCreary's answer again was "no." Among other things which McCreary listed as "benefits" given to the Union as alternative to the stock investment plan were a grievance procedure, checkoff, and union security. It is perhaps best not to comment extensively on such arguments here. Whether McCreary realized it or not, what he was saying in effect is that if employees want to exercise their statutory rights to engage in union activity, they must expect to pay a monetary price at the hands of the Company. He was virtually conceding the merits of the complaint.

McCreary also spoke of having given these employees a raise in return for the stock plan. And it is a fact the contract, as signed on August 30, gave a retroactive cost-of-living raise back to May. The trouble with this defense is that the same cost-of-living raise was given, in May, to all the Respondent's salaried employees in all of its other subdivision plants, but at that time withheld from these salaried people. This means that in their eventual contract all they got was what had been withheld from them, and only from them, all these months. It was therefore not a benefit alternative to the stock investment plan they lost.

For the rest, there is very extended testimony about how the conditions of employment spelled out in the contract, eventually signed, compare with those of all the other unrepresented salaried employees. The contract consists of 100 printed pages, and the testimony seeking to explain its import, both that of the employee witnesses and of McCreary, is uncomprehensible detail and conclusionary words. A number of longtime employees explained how in the practical application of the new contract terms they were no better off than they were before. But their details were not clear, such as to support truly reliable findings. McCreary's lengthy statements as to how, over the long run, the new provisions do favor the employees, are equally devious and obscured. In the circumstances, I cannot say for a fact that the Respondent gave a monetary equivalent, or anything even approaching, the $75,000 a month which McCreary said the stock investment plan cost the Company for that one group among its many and various plants. There simply is no clear and definitive evidence of substantive advantage given the Weirton clericals and technicians which all the others do not also have.

Tied in with this quid pro quo contention defense is the further position that, anyway, the Company could not afford the cost of continuing the stock investment plan for these particular employees. McCreary did say this to the committee more than once; although it must be noted he never suggested in the continuing talk any different, diluted continuance of the plan that might have cost less. But most pertinent of all is the fact that it went right on giving the benefits of the plan to the much larger group of its salaried employees who remained outside any "bargaining unit."

All things considered, I find that by refusing to discuss any possibility of continuing the stock investment plan, and by that technique refusing to continue it to the benefit of these employees, for the sole purpose of discouraging union activity by them and by other employees of the Company, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. The essence of the Respondent's conduct having been to deprive the Weirton salaried employees of the stock investment plan, I also find that it thereby violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, calculated discrimination in employment as a coercive tactic to discourage union activity. This is not a per se finding of illegality, as in its brief the Respondent would characterize it. It is cited authority to the effect that an employer is not obligated either to grant a new, or to continue an old economic benefit, is therefore inapposite. It is the affirmative evidence of unlawful intent in its conduct that proves the unfair labor practice found in this case.

And finally, there remains the contention, as a matter of law, that by signing the contract without the stock investment plan, the employees, or their union, waived any right now to charge that any statutory rights of theirs had been violated. The defense is not supported by the record and I therefore find it without merit. See Kroger Co., supra, 164 NLRB at 374.

IV. THE REMEDY

The Respondent having refused to bargain in good faith on the subject of the stock investment plan for these salaried mmployees, it must be ordered now to bargain with their union, on request, as the statute commands. The unfair labor practice technique having been used to deprive the employees of a direct, monetary benefit, the Respondent must also be ordered to make them whole for what loss of earnings they suffered in consequence of the illegal conduct.

As always the remedial order must be aimed at restoring the status quo; it may neither be punitive nor an unwarranted windfall to the employees involved. The method appropriate in this case will be unusual, because the nature of the economic benefit of which the employees were illegally deprived is a variable under the stock investment plan. It is not comparable to simple calculation of backpay that would otherwise have been earned. In May 1979, 4 months before the effectuation of the unfair labor practice committed, over 500 employees were contributing 7-1/2 percent of their pay into the fund, and therefore receiving a like amount in matching funds paid them by the Company. But the system provided that they could change the amount—reduce it or discontinue it altogether. Two hundred or so others were contributing less, and about 200 more were, at that time, contributing, and therefore receiving nothing. But like the first group, these others too had the privilege of changing their amount, or entering the plan if they wished. Had the Respondent not taken this right away from them, how many would have reduced their contributing percentage, how many would have increased their input, how many would have entered the fund for the first time? There is absolutely no way of answering these questions.

In his brief, the General Counsel asks that the Company now be ordered to pay to the employees who in May 1979 were contributing the permissible maximum, a full 7-1/2 percent of their pay from August 30, when the union contract was signed, to the day the Respondent complies with this Order to cease and desist. He also asks, if I read him correctly, that as to those employees who were then contributing less, or nothing at all, the Company pay to their benefit "the maximum amount each employee could [would?] have contributed." The suggestion is founded upon pure speculation. To order the Company to pay the full 7-1/2 percent to persons who had as yet not decided to contribute anything would be more in the nature of punitive, rather than remedial action. And to order the Company to pay the full 7-1/2 percent to these employees who chanced, in May 1979, to be comtributing that much, means giving them something to which they may not be entitled, because they too might have changed their percentages depending upon economic conditions. Under such a procedure surely the man who was giving nothing, or very little, will say he would have gone up to 7-1/2 percent had he had the opportunity. And as surely the man who was giving 7-1/2 percent will assert he never would have lowered his amount. However the concept be viewed, it would be a guessing game; there simply is, and there never will be, any way of knowing how what did not happen would have happened.

In the circumstances, I think a fair overall make-whole formula will be as follows: A representative period shows on the record that for the month of May 1979 the Respondent contributed a total of $75,000 on behalf of all the employees in the two bargaining units to their credit in the stock investment plan fund. The record also shows—at least McCreary's statement to that effect stands uncontradicted—that in June 1980 the trustees of the fund suspended the Company's matching fund contributions for economic reasons, as the plan agreement provides. Whether the contributions have since been resumed was not shown. Beginning with the month of September 1979 and continuing for every month thereafter that the Company's contributions have been, or will be made, to other salaried employees, the Respondent must pay $75,000 for each month to the credit of these salaried employees. The payments shall be continued until such time as the Respondent complies with that part of this remedy which orders it to bargain with the Union on the subject in good faith. This rational restructuring of the past means that for each of the pertinent months in question $150,000 worth of company stock would have been purchased in the name of the employees. The Respondent must therefore also pay, as part of the make-whole remedy, a sum of money equal to what dividends such stock would have earned between the month involved and the date when it complies with the affirmative bargaining order. The total thus paid by the Company shall then be distributed, for each month involved, equally among all the employees who were working during that month and who were eligible to participate in the plan. It shall be a cash payment into their hands.

This does not mean the Respondent's duty to continue making these monthly payments becomes a contractual obligation. As argued by the Respondent, the Board is without authority to dictate any economic terms to be inserted into a collective-bargaining agreement, even where it has been found there was bad-faith bargaining, as here. In fact, the August 30 contract signed was for a 1-year period; whether it has been renewed this record does not show. But the Respondent must continue making the payments here ordered until such time as it does bargain in good faith. When that point has been reached is a question left to the compliance stage of the proceeding.

It is possible this formula places a liability on the Respondent in excess of what its burden might have been had it not committed the unfair labor practice found. But "the burden is upon the employer to establish facts which . . . would mitigate that liability [N.L.R.B. v. Brown & Root, Inc., et al., 311 F.2d 447 (8th Cir. 1963)]," and there is no way a more reasonable formula could be evolved in this case. Concededly there is an element of uncertainty in this remedy. As precedent holds: ". . . the backpay claimant should receive the benefit of any doubt rather than the Respondent, the wrongdoer responsible for the existence of any uncertainty and against whom any uncertainty should be resolved." United Aircraft Corporation, 204 NLRB 1068 (1973). See also: J. H. Rutter-Rex Manufacturing Company, Inc., 194 NLRB 19 (1971), and N.L.R.B. v. Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Company, 360 F.2d 569 (5th Cir. 1966).

There is another side to this coin. Some of the employees involved, looking to the past, will feel they are getting less than their proper share. Others, no doubt, will receive more than they probably would have benefited in matching funds during the period following the unfair labor practice. It is in the nature of collective bargaining that employees act together, make common cause vis-a-vis their employer. Just as a union may contract to have some employees be paid a higher rate than others, even so, to achieve a workable remedy in a problematic case, the Board may balance conflicting interests among the employees in the interest of all as a total group. Compare: International Association of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Ironworkers, Local 373, 232 NLRB 504 (1977).

And finally, the really coercive effect of the Respondent's unfair labor practice was in denying these employees the cash benefits of the plan, and not in its refusal to talk about it with their union. If the remedy be limited to talking about it all over again, even in good faith, the restraining force upon the employees' prounion resolve—the end object of the Respondent's purpose—will remain a fact of life. This means the Company will continue, as it has since 1979, to enjoy the fruits of its unfair labor practice. It is the Board's duty to avoid such a pointless ending to the entire proceeding, as was the case in the Sixth Circuit Court in the Kroger case, supra. Merely because a more nearly perfect restoration of the status quo would present "complex problems and multiple ramifications" is not reason enough for abandoning justice altogether.

V. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The unfair labor practices of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with the operations of the Respondent described above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By refusing to bargain with the Union in good faith on the subject of its existing stock investment plan, the Respondent has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

2. By denying its Weirton Steel Division salaried employees the continued benefit of its stock investment plan for the purpose of restraining and coercing them, and other employees of National Steel Corporation, with respect to their union activities, the Respondent has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

3. By the foregoing conduct, the Respondent has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The above-described unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Teamsters Local Union No. 515 (Cavalier Corporation) and David E. Barber. Case 10-CB-3391

December 11, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS FANNING AND HUNTER

On September 1, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Hutton S. Brandon issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.[2]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Teamsters Local Union No. 515, Chattanooga, Tennessee, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a):

"(a) Causing or attempting to cause the Cavalier Corporation to unlawfully discriminate against David E. Barber by filing grievances to change his job assignments or duties because of his lack of membership in the Union."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT cause or attempt to cause Cavalier Corporation to unlawfully discriminate against David E. Barber by filing grievances to change his job assignments or duties because of his lack of membership in Teamsters Local Union No. 515.

WE WILL NOT maintain or process any grievance with regard to the job assignments and duties of David E. Barber which was filed because he resigned his membership in the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce employees of Cavalier Corporation in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL notify Cavalier Corporation that we have no objection to its employment of David E. Barber in the same classification with the same job duties he held prior to July 16, 1980.

WE WILL withdraw our grievance and process no further grievances with regard to the job duties and assignments of David E. Barber which were filed and maintained because he resigned his membership in the Union.

WE WILL make David E. Barber whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the unlawful discrimination against him, plus interest.

It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear prepondernace of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] We shall modify par. 1 (a) of the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order to conform more closely to the violation found. We shall also substitute a new notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge, containing language which conforms to par. 2(b) of the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order.

259 NLRB No. 94

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Hutton S. Brandon, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard at Chattanooga, Tennessee, on June 23, 1981. The charge was filed on August 25, 1980,[1] by David E. Barber, an individual, hereinafter called Barber, and the complaint based on the charge was issued on October 6, alleging that Teamsters Local Union No. 515, hereinafter called the Union or Respondent, violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, hereinafter called the Act, by causing or attempting to cause Cavalier Corporation, Barber's employer, to change the job duties of Barber because he had resigned his membership in the Union. The issue presented is whether the Union's action in the filing of a grievance involving Barber's job duties and resolving that grievance to Barber's detriment was motivated by Barber's lack of membership in the Union and in order to encourage membership in the Union.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following:

Findings of Fact

I. JURISDICTION

The Cavalier Corporation, herein called the Company, is a Tennessee corporation with an office and place of business in Chattanooga, Tennessee, where it is engaged in the manufacture of bottle and can vending coolers. During the calendar year preceding issuance of the complaint herein, the Company sold and shipped from its Chattanooga plant goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of Tennessee. The complaint alleges, the Union by its answer thereto admits, and I find and conclude that the Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the Union admits, and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. The complaint further alleges and the Union admits that the Union and the Company have been at the times material parties to a collective-bargaining agreement which was effective from September 1, 1979, to August 31, 1980.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

Barber, the General Counsel's only witness, was employed by the Company more than 11 years prior to the hearing herein. He worked as an inspector in a department usually containing in excess of 30 other inspectors, all of whom were included in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit represented by the Union and covered by the collective-bargaining agreement referred to above and the preceding initial 1-year agreement executed in January 1979, but effective from August 1978.

For several years Barber, in addition to his regular inspection duties, was called upon by the Company to perform additional inspection and repair duties at its warehouse. While the frequency of his assignment to the warehouse duties was not clearly established in the record, it is clear from Barber's testimony that as a result of his assignment to warehouse duties he received an average of 6 to 10 additional hours of overtime pay per month. Time records compiled by the Company, subpenaed by Respondent, and received in evidence,[2] covering an 18-month period beginning January 1, establish that Barber did receive more hours of work, including overtime work, than some more senior fellow inspectors but less than some others.

Barber did not initially join the Union when it became the collective-bargaining agent in 1978. He testified that in view of his reluctance to join the Union, he received pressure from a number of people, including union stewards. In this regard, he testified that union stewards Terry Powell and Terry Cole in September 1978 called him a "freeloader" and a "scab" and related that if a picket line was set up in front of the plant and if he tried to come across, he would be shot or his house would be burned.

In August 1979, according to Barber, Ed Guffey, the union representative responsible for servicing the collective-bargaining agreement with the Company, attempted to persuade Barber to join the Union and in so doing told Barber that if he did not join the Union, he would not remain at work at the Company. In the same conversation, Barber testified, Guffey aggressively inquired of Barber about a prior statement Barber had made to employee Douglas McRoy to the effect that if Guffey ever tried to stop Barber from crossing a picket line, Guffey would look "funny" with a Chevrolet bumper stuck in his posterior. While Barber did not deny having made the comment, he explained to Guffey that he had just been shooting a "bunch of bull."

Barber testified that he and his wife, who was also an employee of the Company, joined the Union in September 1979. Thereafter, Barber had his union dues checked off by the Company.[3] Barber subsequently decided that he did not want to remain a union member and called Guffey in May to ascertain how he could go about getting out. Barber testified he was unable to get any information from Guffey so he contacted an attorney. On May 14 he went to the union hall and filed a withdrawal. He was later told by employee Doug McRoy, who at this time was an alternate union steward, that the withdrawal was a waste of time and that Barber was still in the Union.[4] On June 24 and July 2 Barber sent the Union

[4] The validity of the withdrawal is not clear from the record for while Guffey testified that Barber's withdrawal was effective from May 14 and no further dues were deducted, Guffey also testified that withdrawals were only applicable to situations where employees were on leaves of absence from employment or were terminated. Barber did not fit in either letters resigning from the Union and revoking his dues-checkoff authorization.[5]

Barber went on vacation in late June and returned to work on July 15.[6] On that day Georgeanne Finch, the union steward for Barber's department, asked him who he was going to "roll" and added that he was not going to do warehouse work anymore. Later that same week, Barber testified, he was told by the warehouse union steward, Dorothy Harris, that she had heard that someone else was coming to the warehouse in his place. Still later in the week, according to Barber, Barber asked his foreman, Chuck Lindsey, about the matter and Lindsey told him that a grievance had been filed regarding Barber's warehouse work.

It is undisputed that on July 16 Finch filed a grievance[7] contending that the transfer of Barber on that date to work in the warehouse necessitating the reassignment of someone else to Barber's regular work was a violation of the temporary transfer provision of article 16 of the collective-bargaining contract. As a remedy, the Union sought to have the senior inspector paid for the time that Barber worked at the warehouse. The grievance was resolved on August 5 with the Company agreeing to offer the warehouse work on a regular basis to the senior inspector who wanted it. Phyllis Jones, an inspector senior to Barber, thereafter was given the warehouse work until October when the Company, in a settlement of charges filed against it by Barber with the Board in Case 10-CA-16184, returned the warehouse work to Barber. Barber was still performing the warehouse work at the time of the hearing.

The General Counsel contends that the Union filed the grievance which adversely affected Barber's conditions of employment simply because Barber had resigned from the Union, and in so doing had violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. In support of this contention the General Counsel relies upon the evidence of pressure put upon Barber to join the Union as outlined above, the timing of the filing of the grievance shortly after Barber had resigned from the Union and the fact that after his resignation from the General Counsel also relies on other testimony of Barber regarding comments made to him by union stewards following the filing of the grievance. Thus, Barber testified that after he had been removed from warehouse work alternate steward Doug McRoy told him that if he would be interested in getting back in the Union they would see what they could do about getting his job back at the warehouse for him. Still later, toward the end of August, according to Barber, union steward J. D. Newsome told Barber that Barber might not be paying union dues of $14 or $15 dollars, but "we're getting the amount anyway by knocking you out of going to the warehouse."

The Union's position is that the grievance filed which resulted in Barber's removal from warehouse work had nothing to do with his resignation from the Union, and, instead, was based upon a meritorious claim by various employees that the warehouse work should be awarded in accordance with the contract. More specifically, the Union argued that the warehouse job should have been made a full-time position and, absent making it a full-time position, the Company was violating the temporary transfer provision[8] of the collective-bargaining contract by transferring an inspector into the position sporadically while replacing that inspector on his regular job with another inspector.

To disprove the General Counsel's contentions regarding animus towards Barber because of his lack of union membership, the Union presented a number of witnesses. Terry Cole and Terry Powell both denied making any threats to Barber to cause him to join the Union. Moreover, according to the testimony of Guffey, neither Cole nor Powell was a union steward at the time in 1978 when Barber's testimony has it that they threatened him. Although Guffey admitted that he had talked to Barber in 1979 about joining the Union and had also discussed with Barber the threat concerning the Chevrolet bumper, he denied that he had ever told Barber that he would have to join the Union to work at the Company.

With respect to the filing of the grievance, McRoy testified for the Union that on a Friday while he was acting as steward in place of Georgeanne Finch who was on vacation in early July that a number of employees including inspectors Phyllis Jones, Calvin Dallas, and Gay Kegan complained to him about Barber's work at the warehouse and expressed concern why they could not go over and do the job too.[9] McRoy testified he related the complaint to Finch when she returned to work on the following Monday, July 14, and suggested she file a grievance on it. McRoy admitted that he was aware at the time the complaints were made to him about the warehouse job that Barber had said that he was going to get out of the Union, but denied that Barber's getting out category. Persons who had submitted withdrawal cards remained members of the Union but were relieved from any dues obligations. The fact that the Union honored the "withdrawal" may well have been a result of an administrative snafu in view of the terms of Barber's checkoff authorization. I therefore do not view Barber's early release from his checkoff obligation as evidence of either the Union's generosity or good will toward Barber. This view is further substantiated by Barber's uncontradicted testimony that McRoy told him the withdrawal was a waste of time and he was still in the Union.

[5] The applicable contractual provision on checkoff made checkoff authorizations irrevocable for 1 year or until the contract expired, whichever occurred sooner. G.C. Exh. 2. Barber explained that he sent two resignation and checkoff revocation letters to the Union because of some question of timeliness of the first letter. Apparently, the Union never made any contention that Barber's resignation and revocation was in any way untimely.

[6] While Barber testified he returned to work from vacation on Monday, July 21, the company time records reflect, and I find, he returned on Tuesday, July 15. Resp. Exh. 3.

[7] G.C. Exh. 3; Resp. Exh. 6.

[8] The provision referred to G.C. Exh. 2, art. 16, in pertinent part, as follows:

> 1. In the event it is necessary to temporarily transfer an employee within a department due to vacancies resulting from absenteeism, tardiness, leave of absence, etc., the department supervisor will determine which job or jobs can be discontinued or reduced in order to transfer the employees to fill the vacancies. Such employees will be removed in the reverse order of seniority and returned in the order of seniority. If more than one employee is to be transferred such employees will be given the opportunity to fill the available vacancies by seniority provided they can perform the job.

[9] The Company's time records listing the inspectors in the order of their employee or clock numbers, and thus in seniority order, reveal Jones and Kegan were above Barber in seniority while Dallas was below him.

of the Union had anything to do with his suggestion to Finch that a grievance be filed. Further, McRoy denied making the statement attributed to him by Barber to the effect that if Barber got back in the Union, they would see about getting his warehouse job back.

Finch testified that 2 months prior to the time the grievance was filed regarding warehouse work she had met with Bob Niswonger, the Company's vice president on a number of matters and the subject of the warehouse work came up. At that time, according to Finch, she argued that the warehouse job should be a permanent job and that it was violating the temporary transfer clause of the contract. Discussion on the subject was inconclusive and the matter was passed with Finch remarking that they would leave the situation like it was unless somebody complained. Finch testified that after she returned from vacation she got complaints from McRoy, Phyllis Jones, and Clara Moran, who was not an inspector, regarding the unfairness of Barber's warehouse work, and after unsuccessfully attempting to resolve the matter with Personnel Manager Brad Hillman and Foreman Lindsay went ahead with the written grievance. Finch conceded that she knew that Barber had gotten out of the Union but testified she pursued the grievance because "the people was on my back."

Finally, J. D. Newsome testified for the Union and admitted that he was a job steward for the Union during the period from July 1980 to March 15, 1981, but serviced a department other than Barber's. He denied that he had ever discussed with Barber his removal from the warehouse work. In addition, he denied that he had ever told Barber that while the Union was not getting union dues from Barber they were getting more than that by keeping him out of the warehouse job.

Discussion and Conclusions

A conclusion as to the Union's motivation in filing the grievance which adversely affected Barber is necessary to a determination of the existence of the violation of the Act alleged by the General Counsel. If the Union's motives were pure in the sense that the filing of the grievance was solely to enforce applicable provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement, then no violation has been established. It is well settled that the Board accommodates its enforcement of the Act to the right of persons to litigate their disputed claims in court rather than to condemn such action as an unfair labor practice. See Clyde Taylor, d/b/a Clyde Taylor Company, 127 NLRB 103 (1960). It goes without saying that a similar accommodation extends to the no lesser right of a union to enforce collective-bargaining agreements even though certain employees may be adversely affected by such action. However, the Board has held that where a union's processing of a grievance adversely affecting an employee or employees is prompted by an unlawful and discriminatory objective rather than by a genuine concern over the merit of the grievance or the integrity of the collective-bargaining agreement, its conduct falls within the proscriptions of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, District 227, AFL-CIO (The Kroger Co.), 247 NLRB 195 (1980).

A determination of the Union's motivation in the instant case must be based on facts established by the record, and such facts turn on which witnesses are to be believed. I found Barber to be a generally straightforward, candid, and generally accurate witness. However, his identification of Cole and Powell as being among those who tormented him in early 1979 regarding his lack of union membership is suspect because, contrary to his specific recollection at the hearing, his prehearing statement to the Board expresses some doubt as to the identity of those "union officials" who were harassing him. Nevertheless, he had named, with some uncertainty, Cole and Powell in his prehearing statement, and I am persuaded that his testimony, which was much more positive, was the product of genuine recollection rather than prevarication or contrived reconstruction. Moreover, I was unpersuaded by the denials of both Cole and Powell that they uttered the threats attributed to them by Barber. It is not at all unreasonable that they would urge Barber into union membership, nor is it unlikely that they might have referred to him as a "scab" or a "freeloader." Powell's denials that he ever had discussions with Barber about joining the Union were particularly hollow and unconvincing. And Cole's concession that he did talk to Barber about union membership lends no credence to his denial of any threats to Barber in view of his equivocal "not to my knowledge" response to the question of whether he had referred to Barber as a "scab."

Considering the foregoing and crediting Barber's testimony, I conclude that threats were made to Barber by Powell and Cole. The threats and comments of Powell and Cole clearly reveal that animosity towards Barber among the employee union members existed because of his lack of union membership.[10]

It is not disputed that Guffey attempted to persuade Barber to join the Union in 1979. It is also not disputed that Guffey confronted Barber about Barber's threat regarding the automobile bumper. It is clear that there was no love lost between the two men. However, I am unable to credit Barber's claim over Guffey's clear and specific denial that Guffey told Barber if he did not join the Union, he would not be working for the Company. Barber failed to include in his prehearing statement to the Board any reference to the alleged threat by Guffey, although he did refer to the confrontation with Guffey. There was no indication that Guffey's alleged threat was revealed by Barber to the Board prior to the hearing. Under these circumstances, and because Guffey's denial that he made such a remark was emphatic and convincing, and although Guffey may well have used persuasive arguments to insure Barber's joining the Union, I am not convinced that Barber's recollection of the alleged remark was reliable, and I credit Guffey over Barber in this instance.

[10] I find it unnecessary to decide whether Cole and Powell were union stewards and agents of Respondent at the time of the threats made to Barber. It is sufficient that I conclude that animosity between them and Barber existed as a result of his lack of union membership, and such animosity would not likely be diminished at any subsequent time when they became stewards while Barber was not a union member.

Barber also failed to include in his prehearing statement to the Board the remark he attributed to Newsome to the effect that while Barber was not paying dues, the Union was getting even by knocking him out of going to the warehouse work. Nevertheless, Barber did subsequently prior to the hearing relate the matter to the Board attorney. Newsome, whose stewardship did not extend to Barber's work area, denied in his brief testimony that he had even talked to Barber about Barber's removal from the warehouse work. I am not convinced that Newsome's remark was the figment of Barber's imagination. Accordingly, and because on balance I found Barber a more believable witness than Newsome, I credit Barber on the matter.

I likewise credit Barber's testimony that alternate union steward McRoy told him that if Barber was interested in getting back in the Union, the Union would see what it could do to get his warehouse assignment back for him. McRoy generally was not impressive as a witness. Moreover, contrary to previous assertions made to Board investigators, McRoy conceded in his testimony he had at least once solicited Barber to join the Union. His testimony with respect to prior complaints by other employees about Barber's warehouse work and resolution of such complaints was confusing, contradictory, and unsubstantiated. Accordingly, and for other reasons cited below for not believing McRoy, I find that McRoy did make the statement attributed to him by Barber.

It is clear that Newsome was a steward and McRoy was an alternate steward during that period of time immediately surrounding the events on which the charge herein is based. Indeed, McRoy was the acting steward during the absence of Finch when the employee complaints regarding Barber's warehouse work were allegedly made. And, while Newsome was not the steward in Barber's area, he was acting within the scope of his stewardship authority in commenting upon the basis for the filing of a grievance, and any listening employee could reasonably believe that he was an authoritative source of information relative to grievance initiation and processing. The comments of Newsome and McRoy were directly related to the processing of the grievance which had been filed and which adversely affected Barber. Under the applicable collective-bargaining agreement, stewards had the authority to investigate and present grievances to management. They further were authorized conduits of union messages.[11] Thus, I conclude that in making the statements to Barber, Newsome and McRoy were acting within the scope of their authority and I conclude that their comments are imputable to Respondent, and Respondent is responsible therefor. See International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Dallas General Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers Local 745 (Transcon Lines), 240 NLRB 537 (1979); International Brotherhood of Teamsters, General Drivers, Chauffeurs and Helpers Local Union No. 886 (Lee way Motor Freight, Inc.), 229 NLRB 832 (1977), enfd. without opinion, Docket No. 77-1629 (D.C. Cir. 1978).

The statements of Newsome and McRoy to Barber clearly revealed an ulterior motivation in the initiation and processing of the grievance affecting Barber. On the testimony of McRoy and Finch, Respondent would have me believe that the grievance on Barber's warehouse work was employee initiated and not instigated by the Union. Although Finch and McRoy support each other in certain respects, there was no employee corroboration on the point of the initiation of the grievance. Such employee corroboration would appear to be an important part of the Union's defense, and the failure to produce the named employee complainants suggests the absence of any such complainants. See Local 138, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL-CIO (Building Contractors' Association, Inc.), 233 NLRB 267 (1977). Such employee complainants would apparently be available to the Union since they were, according to McRoy, union members and supportive of the Union's position with respect to Barber. Moreover, it is undisputed that the grievance was not filed by an employee, but by Finch, the steward acting within the scope of her authority and, I find, like Newsome and McRoy, an agent of the Union.

I have already indicated my disbelief of McRoy. His testimony is rendered further incredible by records received in evidence as accurate company records of hours worked by the inspectors during the relevant period.[12] McRoy testified that inspectors Calvin Dallas, Gaye Kegan, and Phyllis Jones complained to him on Friday (July 11) about Barber's warehouse work while Finch was still on vacation, and he did not report the matter to Finch until her return on July 15. The company time records show, however, that the inspectors were all on vacation through July 14. It is thus incredible that Dallas, Kegan, and Jones came to McRoy during their vacation time to complain about Barber who was also on vacation at the time.

Finch was no more credible than McRoy in demeanor nor was the content of her testimony persuasive. Finch did not impress me as completely frank.[13] Moreover, her testimony was not consistent with McRoy's. Thus, in contradiction of McRoy's contention that the inspectors had always complained about Barber's overtime at the warehouse, Finch's testimony was that she had not heard of any complaints until July 14 even though she had been the steward in Barber's department for 2 years. Moreover, Finch's testimony was contradicted by other aspects of McRoy's testimony. McRoy contended that the issue of Barber's warehouse assignment had been in issue much earlier, but was resolved by then steward Powell working out an agreement that the job would be assigned on a rotating or seniority basis. Finch testified, however, that without any prior complaints she broached the subject of Barber's warehouse work to Bob Niswonger, the vice president of manufacturing, during a discussion with Niswonger on other problems about 2 months prior to filing the grievance regarding Barber. However, in that discussion Finch said she was merely complaining that the warehouse job should be made a permanent position and that Barber's use violated the temporary transfer clause. Since the discussion was inconclusive, Finch testified she was content to leave the matter as it was if there were no complaints, with the intention of subsequently negotiating the warehouse position into the next contract.

[11] See G.C. Exh. 2, art. 5.

[13] Finch's tendency to exaggerate is shown by her testimony, clearly rebutted by the company time records, that Barber's warehouse work gave him overtime every day.

I find Finch's unsupported testimony regarding the discussions with Niswonger incredible and improbable.[14] First, in the absence of a complaint, it is unlikely the subject would have been broached with Niswonger. Secondly, if Finch had considered Barber's warehouse work to constitute a clear and serious breach of the temporary transfer clause as the Union now claims, it is much more likely that she would have insisted on a remedy at that point and, in the absence of immediate remedial action, would have filed a grievance.

The timing of the filing of the grievance regarding Barber's job also strongly indicates, as urged by the General Counsel, that such action was discriminatorily motivated. Barber had been doing the work for a number of years without prior complaint from fellow inspectors. Indeed, it appears that the other inspectors were not qualified for the work since Jones, who replaced Barber in the warehouse work as a result of the Union's grievance, had to receive special training. Furthermore, the filing of the grievance followed within 1 week after the Union admittedly received Barber's letter revoking his membership and checkoff authorization on July 7[15] when complaints allegedly began to be made about Barber's warehouse assignment. And, although the complaints were claimed to be predicated on Barber's opportunity to make substantial overtime through his warehouse work, the company time records reflect that Barber had worked only 6-1/2 hours of overtime between May 1 and the date the grievance was filed.[16] This compares with 11-1/2 hours in April, 14 in March, none in February, and 2 in January. Thus, and assuming that all of Barber's overtime could be attributable to his warehouse assignment, it is clear there was no significant increase in his overtime work around the time of the filing of the grievance which would serve to attract attention and provoke discontent among his fellow inspectors who had tolerated Barber's assignment for so long before. In short, aside from Barber's withdrawal from the Union, which was admittedly known to Finch when the grievance was filed because "he told everybody," nothing had happened to trigger the employee complaints on which the grievance was based. Under these circumstances and considering the statements of McRoy and Newsome to Barber, and discrediting Finch's and McRoy's testimony to the contrary, I conclude that the grievance on Barber was not employee initiated and, on the contrary, was initiated by McRoy and Finch as union representatives.[17]

Finally, contrary to the Union's contention, the merit of the grievance on Barber's job is not so clearly meritorious insofar as it relates to the temporary transfer clause as to preclude the existence of discriminatory motivation on the Union's part in the filing and processing of the grievance. Of course, it is not necessary for the Union's defense that its interpretation of the temporary transfer clause be correct. It is only necessary that the Union not act unreasonably, arbitrarily, unfairly, or without legitimate purpose in taking its position on the contractual clause. Wanzer Dairy Co., 154 NLRB 782, 793 (1965). The unreasonableness of the Union's interpretation of the provision would, however, tend to reflect ulterior and discriminatory motivation. Here, Barber had been doing the warehouse work for several years prior to the advent of the Union and the Union contract. He had continued to do it for three years following the advent of the Union and under the Union contracts. In view of this history, his customary and frequent assignment to the warehouse is more consistent with the existence of a permanent job category rather than a series of temporary transfers. Moreover, putting the job up for bid did not, insofar as this record shows, resolve the temporary transfer contention of the Union. Thus, Finch had argued that Barber's warehouse work had violated the temporary transfer clause since the Company did not leave Barber's regular position vacant at the times when he went to the warehouse and instead filled that position with another inspector. Yet, the record does not show any change in this procedure simply because someone more senior than Barber, in this case union member Jones, bid on and was subsequently assigned Barber's work. Presumably, someone else would have had to take Jones' regular work when she performed warehouse work. The record, therefore, shows no change which would appear to resolve the Union's complaint under the temporary transfer clause. Accordingly, I conclude the Union's reliance on the temporary transfer clause is not so reasonable as to escape the conclusion of the Union's unlawful motivation in processing the grievance that the record otherwise dictates. On the contrary, the failure to resolve the underlying concern relative to the temporary transfer clause while at the same time removing Barber indicates the Union's unlawful motivation.

Considering all the foregoing, and having credited the testimony of Barber over that of McRoy and Newsome, I conclude that the General Counsel has established a prima facie case of a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by the Union in its filing of the grievance adversely affecting Barber. See Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). The General Counsel contends that the Union's action herein with respect to Barber was not predicated on mixed motives in any respect so that Wright Line, supra, is inapplicable. The Union, on the other hand, argued that even if the General Counsel established a prima facie case of a violation and that there was some unlawful motivation in its actions, the case is one of dual motivation and Wright Line, supra, requires further inquiry into whether the Union would have taken the same action against Barber notwithstanding the existence of discriminatory concerns. I have found the Union's actions here were pretextual, but, assuming that a dual motivation situation existed, i.e., discrimination and a legitimate concern over enforcing a contract clause, I am persuaded that the Union failed to demonstrate that it would have taken the same action against Barber even in the absence of Barber's resignation from the Union. Since I discredit that testimony of McRoy and Finch that the grievance was employee-instigated, and because the Union knew of the alleged contract violation for years but failed to grieve the matter until immediately after Barber, to the admitted knowledge of Finch and McRoy, had resigned from the Union, I conclude that the grievance would not have been filed had Barber not resigned. Accordingly, I conclude that the Union failed to rebut the General Counsel's prima facie case of a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2).

[14] Finch's testimony regarding the conversations with Niswonger was not contradicted. However, a trier of fact is not required to accept uncontradicted testimony as true if it contains improbabilities or there are reasonable grounds for otherwise concluding that it is false. Operative Plasterers' & Cement Masons' International Association Local 394 (Burnham Brothers, Inc.), 207 NLRB 147 (1973). Moreover, as I have already related, on demeanor I did not find her altogether credible.

[15] The Union did not acknowledge receipt of Barber's first letter dated June 24.

[16] The records do not show whether Barber's overtime actually resulted from his warehouse assignments, but it is reasonable to infer from Barber's own admissions that he averaged 6 to 10 hours a month overtime at the warehouse and that such overtime was attributable to his warehouse work.

[17] I am cognizant of the fact that subsequent to having been awarded Barber's warehouse work and then removed from it as a result of a Board settlement with the Company, Jones filed a grievance and a charge with the Board against the Company. However, Jones' interest in the job shown after training for the position and occupying it does not establish the initial interest in it sufficient to initiate a grievance particularly where no previous interest was shown by Jones in the position for several years.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Cavalier Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union, Teamsters Local Union No. 515, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By attempting to cause, and causing, Cavalier Corporation to change the job duties of its employee David E. Barber because of Barber's lack of membership in the Union, the Union has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(2) and 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Union has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that the Union be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

Since I have found that the Union attempted to cause, and caused, Cavalier Corporation to change the job duties of David Barber because of Barber's lack of membership in the Union and to this end filed a grievance discriminatorily seeking to adversely affect the job assignment of Barber because of his lack of membership in the Union, I find that in order to dissipate the effects of the Union's unfair labor practices, it will be necessary to order the Union to cease and desist from processing any grievance initiated or instigated by it seeking Barber's reassignment from the position he held prior to July 16, 1980.[18] Furthermore, it shall be recommended that the Union be ordered to withdraw its grievance regarding Barber's job assignment and duties as they existed prior to the filing of the grievance. It shall also be ordered that the Union notify Cavalier Corporation that it has no objection to the employment of Barber in the same position with the same assignments that he occupied prior to the filing of the July 16, 1980, grievance. Finally, I shall recommend that Respondent make Barber whole for any loss of earnings suffered by him by reason of the discrimination against him. The backpay obligation shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[19]

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and upon the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[20]

The Respondent, Teamsters Local Union No. 515, Chattanooga, Tennessee, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Causing or attempting to cause the Cavalier Corporation to change the job duties or assignments of employee David E. Barber because of his lack of membership in the Union.

(b) Maintaining or processing grievanances with regard to the job duties or assignments of employee David E. Barber which were filed and maintained because he resigned from membership in the Union.

(c) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees of Cavalier Corporation in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Notify Cavalier Corporation, in writing, that it has no objection to the utilization of David E. Barber in the same position with the same job duties that he possessed prior to July 16, 1980.

(b) Withdraw its grievance and process no further grievances with regard to the job assignment and duties of David E. Barber which were filed and maintained because he resigned his membership in Respondent.

(c) Make whole David E. Barber for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the unlawful discrimination against him in the manner set forth in the section above entitled "The Remedy."

---

[18] This order shall be construed as being applicable to the processing of any presently existing grievance relative to Barber's job assignments and duties as they existed prior to July 16, 1980, including the grievance filed by Jones on October 20, 1980. (Resp. Exh. 8.) Jones' grievance resulted from the Union's initial grievance on Barber's job assignments and was clearly tainted by it. This order shall not be construed, however, as prohibiting the filing of any subsequent grievances on Barber's job assignment which are not discriminatorily initiated or instigated by the Union.

[19] See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[20] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided by Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(d) Post at its business office, meeting halls, or other places where it customarily posts notices copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[21] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative of Respondent, shall, be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Furnish the Regional Director for Region 10 signed copies of said notice for posting by Cavalier Corporation, if willing, in places where notices to its employees are customarily posted. Copies of said notice, to be furnished by the Regional Director, shall, after being signed by an official representative of Respondent, be forthwith returned to the Regional Director for disposition by him.

(f) Notify the Regional Director for Region 10, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

---

[21] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Harvard Folding Box Co., Inc. and Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC. Case 1-CA-17917

December 11, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on October 2, 1980, by Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL-CIO, herein called the Union, and duly served on Harvard Folding Box Co., Inc., herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 1, issued a complaint and notice of hearing on November 17, 1980, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), (4), and (5) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. On May 28, 1981, an amendment to the complaint issued, alleging additional violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. Copies of the charge and complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge and amendment to the complaint were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that on September 11, 1980, following a Board election in Case 1-RC-16868, the Union was duly certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate;[1] and that, commencing on or about September 25, 1980, and at all times thereafter, Respondent has refused, and continues to date to refuse, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative, although the Union has requested and is requesting it to do so. It is further alleged that since on or about September 23, 1980, Respondent has failed and refused to supply information requested by the Union regarding the names, addresses, classifications, dates of hire, and wage rates of unit employees.[2] On December 24, 1980, Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint. On June 3, 1981, Respondent filed an answer to the amendment to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the amendment to the complaint.

On September 16, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on September 22, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

In its answer to the complaint and response to the Notice To Show Cause, Respondent admits its refusal to bargain but challenges the Union's certification on the basis that the Board erred, first, in certifying the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent's employees and, second, in failing to review an affidavit which was taken by the Regional Director during his investigation, but was not forwarded to the Board as a part of the record. Respondent further argues that granting of the General Counsel's motion will result in a duplication of effort because additional allegations in the complaint, not at issue in the General Counsel's motion, require a hearing and will also be subject to court review. In the Motion for Summary Judgment, counsel for the General Counsel alleges that Respondent seeks to relitigate issues previously considered in the underlying representation case, and, also, that no factual issues warranting a hearing are presented in this case concerning the issues which are the subject of his motion.

Our review of the record herein, including the record in Case 1-RC-16868, discloses, inter alia, that pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election, an election was conducted among the employees of the stipulated unit on May 29, 1980, and that the tally of ballots furnished the parties after the election showed 52 votes cast for and 38 votes cast against the Union. There was one challenged ballot, an insufficient number to affect the results of the election. Respondent filed timely objections which alleged that a campaign leaflet distributed by the Union contained material misrepresentations concerning the wages paid to employees of a competitor. On July 3, 1980, the Regional Director issued his Report on Objections and Recommendations in which he recommended that the objections be overruled in their entirety and that the Board issue a certification of representative. In so doing, he found that the Petitioner's leaflet was an accurate recitation of a listing of wage rates paid under certain of the Petitioner's area contracts, and of the wages paid to employees in the Petitioner's bargaining unit at Lawrence Packing Corporation (one of the Employer's competitors). He further found that, even assuming a material misrepresentation was made, the Employer had sufficient time to reply. Respondent filed timely exceptions to the Regional Director's report reiterating the contentions set forth in its objections and arguing, inter alia, that the Petitioner's leaflet was an incomplete disclosure and a half-truth. On September 11, 1980, the Board issued a Decision and Certification of Representative adopting the Regional Director's findings and recommendations (not reported in volumes of Board Decisions).

[1] Official notice is taken of the record in the representation proceeding, Case 1-RC-16868, as the term "record" is defined in Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended. See LTV Electrosystems, Inc., 166 NLRB 938 (1967), enfd. 388 F.2d 683 (4th Cir. 1968); Golden Age Beverage Co., 167 NLRB 151 (1967), enfd. 415 F.2d 26 (5th Cir. 1969); Intertype Co. v. Penello, 269 F.Supp. 573 (D.C.Va. 1967); Follett Corp., 164 NLRB 378 (1967), enfd. 397 F.2d 91 (7th Cir. 1968); Sec. 9(d) of the NLRA, as amended.

[2] The General Counsel moves for summary judgment solely on these allegations of the complaint. He moves that the remaining allegations in the complaint, as amended by the amendment to the complaint, be considered at the scheduled hearing before an administrative law judge. We find that the remaining allegations of violations of Sec. 8(a)(1), (3), (4), and (5) of the Act raise genuine issues of material fact. We therefore shall remand the issues raised by those allegations of the complaint to the Regional Director for hearing thereon.

Respondent then submitted on September 29, 1980, a request for reconsideration of the Board's Decision and Certification of Representative. Its request was found to be untimely filed and was not considered. On October 8, 1980, Respondent again submitted a request for review seeking to overturn the ruling as to the untimeliness of its earlier request. On October 23, 1980, the Board reaffirmed its rejection of Respondent's request for reconsideration stating again that it had been filed in an untimely manner. On April 26, 1981, Respondent filed a "Motion To Reopen the Record and a Request for Oral Argument" alleging, inter alia, that prior to April 1, 1981, it was not aware that the affidavit of Respondent's president, Melvin Ross, taken by a Board agent during the investigation, had not been forwarded to the Board by the Regional Director as part of the record. It maintained that failure to consider the affidavit resulted in a denial of Respondent's due process. By telegraphic order of May 11, 1981, the Board denied Respondent's motion without prejudice to raising the issues of the contents of the record and the right to a hearing in the election objections proceeding in the unfair labor practice case.

In its answer to the complaint, as amended, Respondent admits that it refused to bargain collectively with the Union and that it refused to furnish the information requested by the Union, which Respondent concedes would be relevant and necessary for the Union's performance of its function as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees if the Union were the lawful bargaining representative. Respondent denies that the Union is the exclusive representative of its employees and seeks to have the election results set aside based on the alleged misrepresentations that were the subject of the objections.

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[3]

The issues raised by Respondent in this proceeding concerning the merits of its exceptions to the Regional Director's Report on Objections were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, and Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege that any special circumstances exist herein which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding.

Further, we find no merit to Respondent's contention that it was denied due process because Melvin Ross' affidavit was not transferred to the Board as part of the record. First, statements of witnesses which were before the Regional Director in his disposition of election objections and challenged ballots are not part of the record in a representation case as provided in Section 102.69(g) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended. Indeed, such affidavits are expressly excluded from the definition of "documentary evidence" in the September 9, 1981, amendment to Section 102.69. (See Sec. 102.69(g)(1)(ii).) Second, Respondent has not been prejudiced by the Regional Director's failure to transfer the affidavit to the Board. The affidavit was attached to Respondent's "Motion To Reopen the Record" and to its "Opposition to Motion for Summary Judgment and Request for Transfer to the Board." Although such an attachment is normally part of the record only when it has been timely submitted to the Regional Director, we shall consider it part of this record in light of Respondent's assertion that it was unaware that the Regional Director had not forwarded the Ross affidavit. Accordingly, we have reviewed the affidavit and we find it raises no material issues of fact or law which warrant a reversal or modification of our previous Decision and Certification of Representative in Case 1-RC-16868. We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant summary judgment with respect to the allegations of the complaint that Respondent refused to bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and that Respondent refused to furnish certain information requested by the Union, relevant and necessary for the Union's performance of its function as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative.[4] We find, however, that genuine issues of material fact exist as to the remaining allegations of the complaint, as amended. We therefore remand those issues to the Regional Director for hearing before an administrative law judge as scheduled.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Harvard Folding Box Co., Inc., a Massachusetts corporation, with an office and place of business at 71 Linden Street, West Lynn, Massachusetts, is engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of folding boxes and related products. Annually in the course and conduct of its business, Respondent causes large quantities of cardboard and other materials to be purchased and transported from and through various States of the United States other than the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Respondent also causes substantial quantities of folding boxes to be sold and transported from its plant to points outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. In addition Respondent annually sells and ships quantities of folding boxes valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside Massachusetts.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Harvard Folding Box Co., Inc. at its plant located at 71 Linden Street, West Lynn, Massachusetts, including truckdrivers, but excluding office clerical employees, sales employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. The certification

On May 29, 1980, a majority of the employees of Respondent in said unit, in a secret-ballot election conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 1, designated the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent.

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit on September 11, 1980, and the Union continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Request To Bargain and Respondent's Refusal

Commencing on or about September 16, 1980, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit. Commencing on or about September 25, 1980, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in said unit.

Commencing on or about September 23, 1980, and at all times thereafter, the Union, by letter, has requested Respondent to furnish the Union with names, addresses, classifications, dates of hire, and wage rates of all the employees in the bargaining unit. This information is necessary for and relevant to the Union's performance of its function as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees. Since on or about September 25, 1980, Respondent has failed and refused to furnish the Union with the information described above.

[4] See pars. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19, and 20 of the complaint, as amended by the amendment to the complaint, and pars. 23 and 24 of the complaint, insofar as they relate to the above-noted paragraphs.

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since September 25, 1980, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of certification as beginning on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Company, Inc., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Commerce Company d/b/a Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817; Burnett Construction Company, 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Harvard Folding Box Co., Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its plant located at 71 Linden Street, West Lynn, Massachusetts, including truckdrivers, but excluding office clerical employees, sales employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since September 11, 1980, the above-named labor organization has been and now is the certified and exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing on or about September 25, 1980, and at all times thereafter, to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees of Respondent in the appropriate unit, and by refusing to furnish the Union with the information it requested in its letter of September 23, 1980, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Harvard Folding Box Co., Inc., West Lynn, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its plant located at 71 Linden Street, West Lynn, Massachusetts, including truckdrivers, but excluding office clerical employees, sales employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Refusing to supply the aforesaid labor organization with information necessary for collective bargaining, including the names, addresses, classifications, dates of hire, and wage rates of all the employees in the bargaining unit.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Upon request, supply the above-named labor organization with information necessary for collective bargaining, including the names, addresses, classifications, dates of hire, and wage rates of all the employees in the bargaining unit.

(c) Post at 71 Linden Street, West Lynn, Massachusetts, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 1, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that this proceeding be, and it hereby is, remanded to the Regional Director for Region 1 for the sole purpose of holding the scheduled hearing before an administrative law judge to resolve the issues raised by those allegations of the complaint upon which summary judgment has not been granted.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL NOT refuse to supply the above-named Union with information necessary for collective bargaining, including the names, addresses, classifications, dates of hire, and wage rates of all the employees in the bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain with the above-named Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Harvard Folding Box Co., Inc. at its plant located at 71 Linden Street, West Lynn, Massachusetts, including truckdrivers, but excluding office clerical employees, sales employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL, upon request, supply the above-named Union with information necessary for collective bargaining, including the names, addresses, classifications, dates of hire, and wage rates of all the employees in the bargaining unit.

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On July 20, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Frederick C. Herzog issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Walter Carpet Mills, Inc., City of Industry, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election and held in Case 21-RC-16127 be, and it hereby is, set aside, and that said case be, and it hereby is, remanded to the Regional Director for Region 21 to conduct a new election when he deems the circumstances permit the free choice of a bargaining representative.

[Direction of Second Election and Excelsior footnote omitted from publication.]

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt, pro forma, the Administrative Law Judge's analysis and conclusions concerning the discharge of employee Ameliz Salazar and the Administrative Law Judge's conclusions concerning the speech given by Respondent's vice president, Donald Kuhn.

259 NLRB No. 96

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

FREDERICK C. HERZOG, Administrative Law Judge: On October 3, 1979, Building Material and Dump Truck Drivers Local 420, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America,[1] filed a petition in Case 20-RC-16127 seeking certification as the exclusive collective- bargaining representative of the production and maintenance employees of Walter Carpet Mills, Inc.,[2] located at City of Industry, California. Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election an election was conducted on November 30, 1979. The results were that, of approximately 424 eligible voters, 188 cast votes for the Union and 209 cast votes against it, with the 10 challenged ballots being insufficient to affect the results of the election. The Union thereafter filed objections to the conduct of the election, but failed to present evidence in support of the allegations made in the objections. Accordingly, the Regional Director for Region 21 recommended that the Union's first four objections be overruled. The fifth, and last, objection was dealt with as follows.

On October 9, 1979, the Union filed a charge in Case 21-CA-18257 alleging the commission by the Company of unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. A complaint was issued based hereon. Subsequently the Regional Director issued his report on the election objections, as mentioned earlier herein, and, noting that the findings of his investigation into the charge underlying the complaint in Case 21-CA-18257 demonstrated to him the sort of conduct alleged by the Union's fifth objection to the election, he concluded that the allegations made in Objection 5 could best be resolved in a hearing in conjunction with the complaint allegations of Case 21-CA-18257. Accordingly, he ordered the cases consolidated for hearing.

On April 10, 1980, the Union filed a second charge, in Case 21-CA-18926, against the Company, alleging that employee Amelia Salazar was discharged by the Company on April 9, 1980, because of her prior activities on behalf of the Union. The Regional Director subsequently issued a complaint based on this new charge, and consolidated its allegations for hearing with those of the cases previously mentioned.

These were heard by me at a hearing conducted in Los Angeles, California, on June 3, 4, 5, and 6, 1980. All parties were present and were afforded full opportunity to participate, to adduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Based on the record thus compiled, my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, and my consideration of the arguments advanced in the post-trial briefs filed by the parties, I make the following:

[1] Hereinafter referred to as the Union.

[2] Hereinafter referred to as the Company.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE COMPANY

The consolidated complaint alleges, and the Company's answer admits, that the Company is a California corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing carpet at its facility located in City of Industry, California. Further, it was alleged and admitted that the Company annually purchases and receives goods and products valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside California.

Based on the pleadings I find and conclude that the Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE UNION AS A LABOR ORGANIZATION

The consolidated complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find and conclude that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE COMPANY'S SUPERVISORY HIERARCHY

The consolidated complaint alleges that the following named individuals occupied the positions set opposite their names, and, further that they are, and have been at all material times herein, supervisors and agents of the Company within the meaning of Section 2(11) and (13) of the Act: Donald Kuhn, vice president of marketing and administration; Sandy Morales, personnel director at the New Braunfels, Texas, facility of Westpoint Pepperell, a parent corporation of Respondent; Derek Davis, director of employee relations for the carpet and rug division of Westpoint Pepperell, a parent corporation of Respondent; Jim Laney, industrial relations director; Homer Frausto, department head of tufting department; Joe Ruiz, supervisor, carpet repair and final inspection; George Dewsnap, chief industrial engineer; and Samuel P. Ortiz, supervisor, shipping department.

While the Company's answer initially denied certain of these allegations, the Company did ultimately admit that each person named above was a supervisor and agent of Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(11) and (13) of the Act. Accordingly, I so find and conclude.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES AND OBJECTIONABLE CONDUCT

A. Background

The Company, Walter Carpet Mills, Inc., was owned by Ludlow Corporation until its acquisition by Westpoint-Pepperell in August 1978. Since its acquisition it has apparently continued to operate essentially as it did previously, manufacturing carpet, but now as 1 of some 50 such facilities owned by Westpoint-Pepperell.

The record here reveals nothing to suggest that its labor relations history has been marked or typified by acrimony, unfair labor practices, or other illegal conduct. By all that appears, the organizational campaign undertaken by the Union herein may have been its first contact with a labor organization at the facility located in City of Industry, California.

It is clear, however, that the facts having direct bearing on this case began to unfold in late August and September 1979, when the alleged discriminatee, Amelia Salazar, and two fellow workers, Hilda Leonard and Elena Melendrez, contacted the Union. They then proceeded to enlist the support of other workers by means of personal conversations and solicitations and by distribution of cards and newsletters. All of this led to the election, the results of which are set forth above.

The election petition was filed on October 3, 1979, at 9:07 a.m. The election was conducted on November 30, 1979. Thus, the Union's objection that the Company engaged in a concerted campaign of harassment, coercion, intimidation, surveillance, and threats designed to impair the rights of the employees to exercise their right to vote in a free and fair election must be examined by me with a view toward determining, not only whether such conduct occurred, but also whether it occurred within the "critical period" preceding the election. The Board has long held that, absent exceptional circumstances not present in this case, the critical period is limited on the one end by the date that the petition was filed and on the other by the date of the election. The Ideal Electric and Manufacturing Company, 134 NLRB 1275 (1961).[3] The "critical period" has been held to include the day on which the petition was filed, rather than running "from" that date. Kenworth Trucks of Philadelphia, Inc., 229 NLRB 815, 822 (1977).

B. The Issues

Speaking generally, the allegations against the Company herein raise issues in only four categories:

(1) Whether or not the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and interfered with the election by holding meetings of large groups of employees both before and after the filing of the petition (it was asserted that the Company created the impression among employees that their unionizing efforts would be made futile, promised them benefits and threatened employees with discipline).

(2) Whether or not the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and interfered with the election by conducting a campaign of individual interviews with employees in which employees were led to believe their unionizing efforts would be made futile and in which employees were interrogated about their own and others' union activities.[4]

(3) Whether or not in various specific instances supervisors of the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and/or engaged in objectionable conduct.

[3] The Union's assertion that I should find that the Company's conduct was "aggregious" [sic] and that the critical period began sometime before the filing of the petition is unpersuasive, and its citation of Lyon's Restaurants, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Consolidated Foods Company, 234 NLRB 178 (1978), is inapposite, as that case dealt with a narrow exception to the Ideal Electric rule, having to do with a type of pre-petition conduct peculiar only to unions.

[4] At the hearing the General Counsel unsuccessfully sought to amend the complaint to allege that the Company also solicited grievances during these interviews. While the issue raised by such an allegation seems closely related to another complaint allegation, i.e., promising benefits, it must be borne in mind that the allegations having to do with promises of benefits rose out of a different factual setting, the large group meetings referred to in sec. IV,B(1), above.

(4) Whether or not the Company discriminated against Amelia Salazar when it discharged her from her job on April 4, 1980, of her having engaged in union, or other protected concerted activities.

C. The Group Meetings

The Company learned that an organizing campaign was underway no later than mid-September 1979, when union authorization cards were discovered in one of the Company's restrooms. Therefore, the Company's vice president and general manager of Walter Carpet Mills arranged to and did conduct a series of group meetings with employees. The employee complement of approximately 400 workers was split up into 6 to 8 groups, with roughly 60 to 70 employees in each group. Kuhn testified, at variance with his investigatory affidavit, that the meetings were begun on the night of October 1, 1979, and continued through the day of October 2, 1979, concluding before midnight. He was corroborated in this testimony by Morales, director of personnel at a company plant in Texas; Morales' testimony was similarly at variance with an affidavit he had provided to the General Counsel during the investigation.[5]

Based on an amalgam of the testimony concerning these meetings a general picture emerged, as follows. Kuhn was accompanied by Morales, Don Hartline, personnel director, and a Mr. Kelehear, director of personnel industrial relations for Westpoint-Pepperell's carpet and rug division. The meetings were begun, after employees were assembled by their supervisors, with Kelehear making introductory remarks. Then Kuhn read a prepared speech, with Morales interpreting for him as he went along. During his speech, Kuhn referred to two large pieces of cardboard, which displayed blown-up versions of union authorization cards, in both English and Spanish.

Kuhn's speech, as written, advised employees that he had learned the Union was trying to get union cards signed, that the Union was after their money, that employees had not needed to pay anyone previously to get fair treatment, that the Company was opposed to the Union coming into the plant, that employees need not join or pay dues to a union to keep their jobs, and that employees would get no special treatment for having joined the Union. He went on to stress that selecting a union by signing authorization cards might have greater consequences than employees realized because it might enable the Union to circumvent the process of a secret election. He told employees they could not rely on assurances that their cards would remain confidential, and illustrated his point by means of a story about employees being subpenaed to testify in a previous hearing despite earlier assurances against such disclosures. He urged employees to give "very serious thought to this matter" and not sign away their "job rights" in reliance on promises made by the Union. He followed by telling them of his belief that the Union would not accurately advise them of its dues, or its history of long and bitter strikes, or the fines it levied on its members. He then told the employees of a union campaign at another of Westpoint-Pepperell's plants, noting that many employees had lost their jobs after 4 years of negotiations led to a collective-bargaining agreement of no value to employees. Kuhn reiterated that the Union was interested in the employees only in an effort to get money from the employees. He urged employees to be careful about what they signed, and encouraged them to "discuss this matter freely with . . . supervisors." He closed by reminding them that the Union could not force the Company to agree to anything, and might call them out on strike, thereby causing all employees to have economic hardship. Kuhn closed by calling for employees to continue working directly with the Company, and telling employees that they could come to their supervisors, or anyone in management, to get straight answers to their questions.

Counsel for the General Counsel's witnesses recalled the speech essentially as outlined above, although with certain additions and variations. For example, Salazar and employee Silver recounted that they heard that employees will lose rights. Employee Alvarez heard that there would be strikes. Employee Gonzalez heard that the Union could not give employees anything and that Kuhn would try to resolve employees' problems without the intervention of a third party. And employees Leonard and Casillas heard that the Company would solve employees' problems if only it were given a chance. Moreover, Salazar heard a threat to discipline any union people found to be bothering employees, while Leonard recalled that it was stated that anyone taking union cards around for signatures, or going around from one department to another to talk, would be disciplined. And, finally, employee Monje heard Kuhn promise employees better benefits and salaries, if only given the opportunity.

As a result of such testimony I am urged to find that (a) employees were promised improved benefits, (b) employees were threatened with discipline, (c) employees were threatened with disclosure of their union sympathies, loss of their rights, strikes, and loss of work, and (d) in their entirety, the speeches conveyed to employees a sense of futility in their efforts to select a collective-bargaining representative. Counsel for the General Counsel failed to cite any case in her brief supporting these propositions, however. The Union's brief makes no mention of these matters.

I am unpersuaded that Kuhn or any other official of the Company actually made the types of threats or promises attributed to them by the General Counsel's witnesses. For while it is admitted that Kuhn, and his assistants, did say something more to the employees than is shown by the text of Kuhn's speech, it seems likely that such statements were insignificant and nothing more than perfunctory openings and closings to the various meetings, or that they were in response to isolated and uninvited questions. I am persuaded in this by the testimony of the Company's witnesses that the text of the speech was, in the main, closely adhered to. And, while the text does, indeed, contain ominous though oblique, references to such dire consequences as "loss of rights," "strikes," and "discipline," etc., as well as optimistic allusion to improvements in the future, it seems not to have crossed the line into violative threats or promises. That employees hearing such a speech might, as it appears to me they did, later recall a threat or a prediction in somewhat stronger terms than it was made is not surprising.[6] For, clearly, the speech was designed to evoke strong emotions among the employees, and to arrest their movement toward the Union. As such, the speech serves as evidence that the Company harbored strong sentiments against the Union.

[5] Counsel for the General Counsel urges that these variances should lead me to discredit the testimony of Kuhn and Morales. She also urges me to credit the testimony of employees Casillas and Alvarez, who testified to having attended such a meeting as early as September 27 or 28, 1979. The point is not viewed by me as an important conflict, but I resolve it in favor of the version given by Kuhn and Morales, notwithstanding the variance between their testimony and their respective affidavits. There appears to be no reason why either would benefit from fabrication about the matter. And here, as in numerous other instances during the hearing, their testimony seemed to be more precise and accurate than that of the witnesses offered by counsel for the General Counsel. While I do not believe that either Casillas or Alvarez was fabricating while testifying, neither do I believe that either was capable of recounting a detailed actual scenario with accuracy.

But that is not the question at issue. For it has been long settled that Section 8(c) of the Act affords protection to an employer's expression of opinion concerning unions so long as the expression remains free of threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit. Instead, since the Supreme Court's decision[7] in N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575 (1969), the Board has developed specific guidelines for distinguishing between protected speech and proscribed threats or promises of benefit. In making such distinctions the Board regularly cautions that it involves an examination of all the circumstances surrounding the employer's speech. The inquiry encompasses not only what the employer intended to imply, but also what its employees reasonably might have inferred from these remarks. Thus remarks, relatively innocuous in themselves, may be considered violative when considered in the totality of the employer's conduct.

Moreover, if the subject matter discussed by the employer is one peculiarly under his control (e.g., closing the plant, moving the plant, loss of wage increases, loss of benefits) the speech will be very carefully scrutinized by the Board. In election situations an employer may make such statements only if they are made on the basis of objective fact to convey his belief as to demonstrably probable consequences beyond his control. Honeywell, Inc., Photographic Products Division, 225 NLRB 617 (1976), quoting Gissel, supra at 618.

Here the allusion to strikes seems permissible. The speech did not depict strikes as inevitable, or within the control of the employer. Compare Thomas Products Co. Division of Thomas Industries, Inc., 167 NLRB 732 (1967).

Nor was the possible loss of "job rights" presented as a factor within the control of the Company, any more than the disclosure of names relating to the signing of authorization cards in the event that litigation should ensue.

As to the threats to discipline employees for going around with union cards, or going from one department to another, I simply find the testimony of Salazar and Leonard lacking in credibility. No other witness was called to support their testimony of any such bald threats. I believe that the two leading adherents of the Union were perhaps so apprehensive concerning their exposure to reprisals as a result of their leadership that they imagined somewhat more than was actually said. Moreover, Leonard exhibited a high level of partisanship in her testimony, thereby detracting from her general credibility. And, as will be seen at a later point, Salazar's overall credibility was badly strained by her inconsistent testimony.

The allegation that benefits were promised in this speech must fail, since no words were spoken which might reasonably lead employees to believe that benefits would be conferred. Instead, the expression of hope that they could continue to work together (for their mutual benefit presumably) seems sufficiently ambiguous to prevent its being labeled as a promise, whether of benefit, or anything else.

In sum, I find and conclude that the evidence has failed to prove any of the allegations made in paragraph 7 of the complaint. I shall, therefore, dismiss these allegations.

D. The Interviews

When Westpoint-Pepperell acquired the Company from Ludlow in August 1978 it noted the need to establish its own policies there, this was accomplished in part by conducting numerous meetings and training sessions among the supervisory and management hierarchy at the Company. But also, so it claims, the Company made plans, as early as February or March, to conduct what it refers to as "in depth interviews" among the employees.

The Company's evidence was generally to the effect that its standard policy of some 11 years' standing calls for such interviews to be conducted on a routine basis at each of its facilities about once every year to year and a half. Its practice is to have such interviews carried out by management officials from another of its facilities. Thus, Davis explained, that though he did not even begin to work for Westpoint-Pepperell in Georgia until June, he learned thereafter that he was to conduct such interviews at the Company according to a plan set up months before. Moreover, despite the testimony of several employees that they were given no prior explanation or notice of the Company's plans, I credit Kuhn's testimony that such notices were placed on the Company's bulletin boards, in both English and Spanish, on September 20, a full week or more before the interviews began.

[6] In this connection, it must be noted that most of these witnesses, like several of the Company's, exhibited a lack of fluency in the English language. Based upon my observations at the hearing I am convinced that much of what is disputed in this case is bottomed upon mere misunderstanding, rather than conscious fabrication or deceit on the part of witnesses. Nevertheless, I have evaluated the relative credibility of witnesses with this factor in mind, attempting to gauge the degree to which precision and accuracy seemed either possible or of importance to each witness, taking into account each witness' apparent language difficulties on fluency.

[7] The Court set out a distinction between lawful predictions and unlawful threats or promises as follows:

> [A]n employer, who has control over that relationship [with employees] and therefore knows it best, cannot be heard to complain that he is without an adequate guide for his behavior. He can easily make his views known without engaging in "brinkmanship" when it becomes all to easy to "overstep and tumble [over] the brink" . . . . At the least he can avoid coercive speech simply by avoiding conscious overstatements he had reason to believe will mislead his employees. Id. at 620.

The interview format appears to have been fairly standardized. Over the course of a few days, beginning on September 27 and continuing through the forenoon of October 3, Davis and Morales each conducted about 70 individual interviews with employees. Each interview was conducted in private, with only the employee and the interviewer present. Generally the interviewer awaited the employee in an office near the plant's nursing station, and caused the desired employee[8] to be sent in to him. However, as the interviews progressed, some employees not scheduled for interviews heard about them and requested that they be interviewed; some, if not all, such requests were evidently honored, even though doing so meant that interviews continued past their scheduled ending.

Both Davis and Morales followed a format in which they introduced themselves to the employees, assured the employee that their conversation would be treated as confidential, talked with the employee in an effort to put him or her at ease, and then asked questions concerning the employee's feelings about the employee's job title, the employee's level of satisfaction with his job, and his level of satisfaction with his supervisor. The interview was generally closed by asking the employee if he had any questions.

Neither Davis nor Morales admitted that they asked employees anything about the Union. But since some of the interviews took place shortly following employees having heard Kuhn's speech, some were asked their feelings about the speech. And Morales routinely[9] told employees of the Company's "philosophy" about unions, i.e., it is the Company's policy to treat employees fairly and consistently so that they would feel no need of a union.

The General Counsel's witnesses tended generally to corroborate the testimony of Davis and Morales as to the basic mechanics of the interview process. However, a number of these witnesses testified to additional matter. Their testimony is discussed below.

1. Salazar, for instance, testified that Morales, in an interview of October 1, 1979, told her that he knew there were problems in the plant and that he wanted to know their nature. She also testified that he said he had heard rumors that a union was trying to come in. He went on to say that a union would not help her and would simply take her money.

Morales denied talking to Salazar about unions, except, as he had testified, about the Company's "philosophy." However, Salazar also testified apparently in connection with his assertions to her that the Union was merely after her money. Morales asked why she should give the money she made working for the Company to a union when she could keep it for herself. She went on to say that when she responded that the Company was not, in her opinion, going to give her "a dollar,"[10] he stated, "Well, changes will come, but they will come without a union."

As noted earlier, Morales generally denied talking to employees about the Union, but he admitted that he had no recollection of any conversation with Salazar about "a dollar." I find Morales' recollection to be superior to Salazar's, notwithstanding his inability to recall every point raised by her testimony. Indeed, I found that his unwillingness to claim that he was able to recall each detail of this conversation (or even some of the General Counsel's witnesses in general) enhanced his appearance as a truthful witness, making sincere attempts to refute charges he believed to be unfounded. However, he was unwilling to refute such charges by attempting to appear that he recalled more than he actually remembered. Accordingly, this allegation shall be dismissed.

2. Leonard also testified about her interview with Morales, which she recalled as having occurred in late September or early October 1979. Morales testified that he simply had no recollection of his talk with Leonard. However, Leonard's testimony was that Morales said he had been sent there from Texas to solve employee complaints because the Company was good and was out "looking to make [employees] happy." She said that he denounced the Union, claiming it was only interested in her money, and saying that she would be throwing her money away, as well as losing her freedom to speak directly to management regarding problems.[11] In response to his question she denied having any problems. Despite the fact that Leonard's testimony stands unrefuted in its specifics, I find Morales' general denial more persuasive than Leonard's testimony, which appeared tainted by extreme partisanship. Accordingly, I find this point to be unproven by either counsel for the General Counsel or the Union.

3. Employee Mendoza asked for and secured an interview with Morales on October 9, 1979, the day following the end of the interview program. Mendoza testified that he went to Morales for help in securing a transfer. He testified that in the interview "the union thing came up," and that Morales, who had come from Texas to help solve the problems employees had as a result of ill treatment by the Company, had been thinking of returning to Texas when the union problem came up, and so Morales had stayed on to "help [employees] about the transfer and all of that. He stated in essence that Morales asked his help in persuading anyone who had not yet signed an authorization card to give him time to solve the problem.

While Morales had no recollection of talking about the Union with Mendoza, he generally denied saying anything about the Union, aside from his standard message regarding the Company's "philosophy." Instead, so Morales claims, it was Mendoza who injected the Union into the conversation by volunteering that he was not in favor of the Union but felt bound to go along with the prounion sentiment of a friend.

[8] Apparently interviews were conducted with about one-third of the employees at the plant. These employees' names were selected at random, months before, though the list thus compiled was checked and augmented with other names in an effort to assure that a reasonable sampling of employee opinion from every department would be obtained.

[9] Morales testified that he refrained from stating the Company's philosophy in instances where the employee volunteered the expression of sentiments similar thereto.

[10] Evidently she took Morales' words to mean that he was assuring her of a raise sometime in the future.

[11] Such statement constitutes objectionable conduct, if credited, and if shown to have occurred within the critical period. Armstrong Cork Company, 250 NLRB 1282 (1980).

I have considerable doubts about whether Morales and Mendoza ever truly understood one another's words. But I found Mendoza's testimony credible when he spoke of Morales' attempt to enlist his aid in preventing employees from signing authorization cards, and in holding out the implied, albeit vague, promise of a benefit (i.e., help of an unspecified nature in securing the transfer sought by Mendoza).

Thus, I find that Morales' conversation with Mendoza was both violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, and, inasmuch as the conduct occurred within the critical period, also objectionable.

4. Jose Avila testified that, as he requested, he was interviewed by Morales in "early October." Among other things Avila claimed that Morales asked him if he had signed a union card and why he had done so. Avila went on to testify that Morales stated that he was there to resolve the employees' problems.

Morales testified that he did, in fact, interview Avila, but that all he did was listen while Avila blurted things out.

Avila showed a strong animosity towards the Company, apparently over having been fired. I was not persuaded that he testified accurately and have determined to credit the testimony of Morales. Accordingly, this matter stands unproven.

5. Maria Monje testified that she was interviewed on or about October 5, 1979, by Morales at her own request. She recited problems to Morales and, according to her, he responded by saying he would try to solve them. She also recalled that he asked her opinion of the Union.

Morales acknowledged that he interviewed Monje, but stated that he was unable to recall anything they said to one another.

I found Monje to be a truthful witness but, like others, her demeanor caused serious doubts as to her accuracy and precision. Nevertheless, despite my misgivings, I do not believe there is adequate reason to discredit her uncontroverted testimony. Accordingly, I find that Morales violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating her about her union sympathies, activities, and leanings, and impliedly promised to grant her benefits by remedying the problems she brought up regarding her salary and other matters. I also find that this conduct constituted a valid objection to the election.

6. Hector Gonzales testified about his interview with Morales on October 3, 1979. Gonzales recalled that, among other things, Morales asked him what he thought "about the problems with the Union."

Morales denied having asked the question attributed to him and insisted that he never mentioned the Union except in connection with his usual explanation of the Company's "philosophy." I credit Morales' recollection, as Gonzales impressed me as an angry and highly biased witness. As a consequence, I find that no violative or objectionable conduct has been proven regarding this incident.

7. Annie Alvarez testified that she was interviewed by Davis on or about October 3. She complained to him about the temperature in the plant and about her pay scale. She recalled him saying that he would "check it out." She also testified that he asked her what she had thought of the meeting (conducted by Kuhn), and what she thought about the Union. However, on cross-examination she admitted that she could not exactly recall just what Davis had asked her, or just what he had said he would do about the problems she had mentioned.

Davis admitted that he asked her how she liked Kuhn's speech, but denied any other comment or question about the Union, or his intentions regarding any remedy for Alvarez' complaints.

Based on the demonstrated uncertainty in Alvarez' testimony I have no hesitancy in crediting Davis' denials and finding that this matter stands unproven.

8. Carmen Silver testified that she was interviewed by Davis "a couple of days after this big meeting" (conducted by Kuhn). She recalled him asking her thoughts about the speech by Kuhn, and her response that it seemed unfair to talk about the Union without having a union representative present to answer the Company's claims. She recalled that he told her that if the Union came in everyone would have to belong to it.

According to Davis he merely asked Silver her thoughts about the speech as a sort of "icebreaker" in their conversation. He stated that Silver then went on and volunteered a great deal more.

I credit Davis' account, as Silver's demeanor demonstrated a strong bias against the Company.

Accordingly, this matter stands unproven.

9. In light of my findings above, I also find that the General Counsel's assertion that such interviews are violative of Section 8(a)(1) in their entirety cannot stand.[12] While the timing of these interviews seems suspiciously contrived, I also find that the evidence supports no more than two isolated violations. Certainly, there has been no proof of a pattern of illegal conduct when the evidence supports such a relatively small number of violations considering the large numbers of employees interviewed. It seems illogical to infer that the nature of the interviews was tainted by illegality when only 1 witness, from among roughly 190 employees interviewed, testified convincingly regarding these allegations, for it should be recalled that Silver's testimony was credited only because it was uncontroverted.

E. The Various Specific Incidents

1. It is alleged that Supervisor Ruiz created the impression of surveillance and interrogated Salazar.

Salazar testified that in early November 1979 she had a brief verbal encounter with Ruiz in the Company's parking lot. She testified that he told her then that everyone he met told him that she was working for the Union. She also recalled him going on to say that he was sure she would not be so dumb. She made no response.

---

[12] I note further that no party has either argued or shown that the interviews were violative because of factors such as, for example, the location in which they were conducted, or because the questions asked by Davis about the employees' views of Kuhn's speech might have been a calculated ruse to compel employees to disclose their sentiments for or against the Union, or because of any seeming infirmity in the assurances of voluntary and confidential participation afforded employees who were interviewed.

Ruiz testified that he did not have any such conversation with Salazar. Instead, so Ruiz testified, he simply congratulated or sought to console her, shortly after the Union had lost the election, by commenting to her that she had tried her best.

I credit Salazar's testimony regarding this incident, as each of the two accounts shows that there was an encounter between them and that the Union was mentioned. It seems implausible that Ruiz would have uttered words so sympathetically as he testified.

Accordingly, I conclude that the Company created the impression of surveillance of Salazar's union activities, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and that this was an instance of objectionable conduct to the election.[13] The allegation that Ruiz interrogated Salazar has not been proven and shall be dismissed.

2. It is alleged that George Dewsnap, the chief industrial engineer and a supervisor, telephoned Salazar at her home in early November and interrogated her about her union activities, sympathies, and membership.

Salazar testified that around November 10, 1979, while home on a leave of absence, she received a phone call from Dewsnap. According to Salazar, during this conversation between old friends, Dewsnap asked if he could ask a personal question, and upon receiving her assent, Dewsnap asked if she belonged to the Union. She recalled that she responded affirmatively and the conversation then turned back to personal matters, primarily concerning the state of health of Salazar's daughter.

Dewsnap denied that he had asked the question, though he did recall telephoning Salazar. He recalled that he called to let her know that, though she was gone from the plant for a while, she was not forgotten. He claimed that he understood the reason for her absence was related to Salazar's health, not that of Salazer's daughter. He also testified that he had once, a month or two prior thereto, attempted to tell Salazar his own feelings about unions, but that he had been abruptly cut off by her.

I credit Salazar's account of this incident. While I have doubts about the accuracy of her testimony in many other respects, those doubts do not go to her essential truthfulness. In so simple a factual scenario as this, involving a friend, it seems unlikely that her account would have been either inaccurate or unduly enlarged.

Accordingly, I find that by this conduct the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfered with an employee's free choice in the then-upcoming election.

3. It is alleged that on or about November 9, 1979, Samuel Ortiz, a supervisor, threatened employees and promised benefits for keeping out the Union. The General Counsel's evidence was that in early November Salazar and Ortiz happened to be leaving the plant simultaneously and, as they walked across the parking lot, Ortiz began to tell her that the Union was no good, that the Company was a good one, and that she would get good benefits (such as increased medical benefits) if the Union were not brought in. Though Salazar expressed doubt about his accuracy, he pointed out that he knew these things to be true because he had been present in management meetings. Ortiz also told her that the Union was no good, and claimed that some of its people were involved in criminal activities. He told her to wait and see if the Company did not, in weeks to come, "almost beg" employees for another chance. He told her that things would be better if the Union were not brought in. And, finally, he told her that if she became a shop steward for the Union she would probably be beaten up.

Ortiz admitted that he talked to Salazar, but denied making any threats or implied promises, saying that he was friendly with Salazar and merely sought to respond to her complaints about the Company.

Ortiz, though apparently well motivated toward Salazar, was not credible. He demonstrated a high degree of bias against the Union. Accordingly, I credit Salazar's account of this incident and find that Ortiz committed the violations as alleged, and that such conduct also interfered with a voter's free choice in the upcoming election.

4. It is alleged that on January 18, 1980, Homer Frausto, a supervisor, threatened employees if they supported the Union.

Salazar's version of these facts was as follows:

On January 18, 1980, she was called to attend a company meeting. This meeting, with about 20 employees present, was conducted in the tufting department, with Dan Hartline presiding. He explained the Company's disciplinary policy to the assembled employees. At one point Salazar, in requesting clarification of a point, implied that the Company practiced favoritism.

Later that day she was called into the office of Frausto. Upon her arrival he complained that she had been making false accusations about management and he asked her if she had any proof. She responded negatively, implying at the hearing that he did so because of a desire to protect the sources of her information. He told her that her accusations were serious. She said that Hartline had misunderstood her, but added that if the Union had come in they would not have such problems. At that, so she testified, Frausto stated that he had do anything to keep the Union out.

Frausto, in his version of this conversation with Salazar, conceded that he had asked for whatever evidence she might have to support what he regarded as a serious attack upon the Company, and, apparently, his own integrity. However, he testified that as soon as she told him she could not support her allegations with evidence the conversation was soon ended without mention of the Union.

While I have no doubt that Salazar did, in fact, protest what she regarded as unfair treatment of employees, and that she and Frausto later had a discussion about it in which he asked her for the basis for her accusation, I do not credit her further testimony. I found Frausto to be a straightforward and earnest witness, whose testimony seemed to be careful, honest, and sincere. Additionally, it struck me as somewhat implausible that Salazar would have made her alleged comment to the head of her department about the need for a union over a month and a half after the election, with nothing to indicate that Frausto had ever been previously involved in any conversation which might logically lead into the remarks she claimed to have passed with him. And, finally, bearing in mind my previously noted dubiousness about the precision to be attributed to Salazar's recollection, I find myself reluctant to base a finding of a violation upon a remark which is, to say the least, somewhat ambiguous.

[13] No finding is made herein with respect to Salazar's testimony that Ruiz talked to her on December 3, expressing surprise that she was present (in view of his expectation that she would be with her union friends). This matter is neither alleged nor argued by counsel for the General Counsel as an unfair labor practice. And, since it falls outside the critical period, it cannot serve as a basis for a finding of objectionable conduct.

This allegation is unproven and is dismissed.

F. Salazar's Discharge

1. Facts

Salazar began working for the Company on January 1, 1968. Aside from a couple of leaves of absence, each of which lasted about 3 months, she worked at the Company until April 4, 1980. On that date she was fired.

For some time preceding her discharge Salazar worked in the tufting department. During much of her career with the Company she had done "re-work," or mending, upon carpets which were manufactured with a flaw. During the time immediately preceding her discharge she had worked as an "Inspector/Mender" on machine no. 11, where her primary duty was to note any flawed material being turned out and to notify the machine operator to stop the machine. Her leadman was Alfrreo Nereo, her supervisor was Manuel Martinez, and the manager of the tufting department, including all three of its shifts, was Homer Frausto.

Salazar's work reputation was good and she had no history of problems with discipline, quality, or attendance until the time she began her activities on behalf of the Union, in August or September 1979. Indeed, during the hearing she repeatedly and adamantly testified that even up to the time of her discharge she had never been warned or disciplined.

As noted earlier in this Decision, Salazar, along with Hilda Leonard and Elena Melendrez,[14] contacted the Union in late August 1979. They sought the Union's help because Frausto told them they would no longer be allowed "clean-up time." The Union gave them a supply of authorization cards and literature. They began soliciting fellow employees to sign authorization cards and distributing the cards and literature throughout the employee complement. Salazar personally approached and solicited approximately 60 to 70 employees in efforts to persuade them to sign cards during September and October 1979. Generally she carried out her organizational activities in the Company's parking lot after her work shift concluded in mid-afternoon. Ultimately Salazar was designated by the Union to serve as an observer in the election of November 30, 1979.

Obviously, such activities could scarcely go forever unnoticed by the Company. So, the Company stipulated at the hearing that it was aware of her sympathies for the Union when she was designated as an election observer, a week or so before the election. While it seems more likely that the Company gained knowledge about Salazar's sympathies and activities considerably earlier than late November, it remains unclear whether such knowledge was gained at or before the time she began to have disciplinary problems.[15]

It cannot be said with certainty that the Company viewed Salazar as a prime adherent of the Union until early November 1979 when the incidents with Ruiz, Dewsnap, and Ortiz occurred.

In any event, the election campaign was conducted throughout October and November and the Union seemingly lost the election conducted at the end of November. Salazar, however, continued her regular work for the Company throughout the fall and winter of 1979 and the spring of 1980.

But, on April 1, 1980, a Tuesday, Selazar was assigned to work on machine no. 11 as an inspector/mender. The operator assigned to the machine was Jose Martinez. Such machines are approximately 15 feet across with 1,160 lines of material, called "ends," being fed down from creels situated on the two floors above. The material is woven into a carpet, complete with texture and pattern, as it feeds through the machine. As it feeds out of the machine on the side opposite where the operator normally stands the inspector/mender is supposed to be stationed on the catwalk and observe whether there are defects. If the inspector spots a defect the inspector notifies the operator, who stops the machinery.[16] On some machinery the inspector/mender must not only spot defects but must also mend them as they come out of the machine; toward this end a small, hand-held "gun" is used by the inspector/mender. But on machine no. 11 defects, or "mends" as they are called, were simply noted and the material was diverted to the rework frame where four employees were constantly stationed to attend to repairing defects. However, generally speaking, the longer the "mend" the less the chance there was of mending it so successfully that the carpet would not be downgraded and sold at a discount price, as a "second." The Company oonsidered any "mend" over 3 feet in length to be very long.

During the day on April 1, 1980, Salazar's leadman, Nereo, happened to pass by machine no. 11 and noticed that it was turning out defective carpet. He noticed, too, that Salazar was not at her appointed place[17] on the opposite side of the machine from the operator. So he stopped the machine and waited for her to return. He asked the operator about Salazar's whereabouts and was told that the operator had not known she was absent. Though he had just seen Salazar talking to another employee, he had not known then that she was not on an authorized break. When she came back about 5 minutes later, he told her of his observations. Then he reported the incident to Department Manager Frausto and Supervisor Martinez. Among the items he had noted, and which he reported, was that machine no. 11 had run some 60 to 70 feet of defective carpet before being stopped.

[14] Melendrez was evidently discharged by the Company on or before Labor Day 1979. Though the point was not established, the record contains at least the hint that she was not thought to be a good enough worker to survive her probationary period. There is no evidence that her discharge was violative of the Act.

[15] Counsel for the Union failed to follow up her own questions and inquire of Leonard about the dates of certain incidents about which Leonard testified, evidently to demonstrate that supervisors and a forelady had knowledge of Leonard's, and perhaps Salazar's, union activities.

[16] When the machine is stopped in this fashion it leaves a mark on the carpet. Such "stop marks" are horizontally embedded in the carpet and are sometimes of such severity as to cause the material to be downgraded as a "second." Such marks are the sort of defect referred to by Leonard in her testimony to the effect that, after Salazar was fired, Hartline told a group of employees that machine no. 11 had been turning out defective carpet because of mechanical problems. However, such defects are not the sort which preceded Salazar's discipline, and ultimate discharge; those defects were vertical and were caused by tufts of material having been omitted or skipped.

On the next day, April 2, a Wednesday, having checked into the matter sufficiently to be satisfied that he knew what had happened, Martinez spoke to Salazar and Jose Martinez, the operator. He verbally warned them to use care, so as not to cause "seconds" produced. But no disciplinary, or even counseling, action was taken against either employee.

And that is apparently how matters would have remained had there not been another incident on Thursday, April 3. This time, however, Martinez saw for himself that Salazar was again absent from her assigned post, which again happened to be as inspector/mender on machine no. 11. And, he saw that she was talking to other employees. As he testified, "She knew, because she saw me and right away she saw me, she run away." And "I told Mr. Frausto, Homer, it is too much; she don't want to stop doing that." Accordingly, he decided to recommend that a written warning be issued to her and that she be discharged. He did so and turned the matter over to Frausto, who agreed and, in turn, submitted the issue to Dan Hartline, the personnel director and the official responsible for authorizing personnel actions such as discharges.

Thus, on Good Friday, April 4, 1980, Hartline sent for Salazar and called her into his office, with Frausto and Martinez present. He testified that he reviewed her record with her, including the fact that this incident constituted her third warning. And, so the Company contends, its policy was that any employee receiving a third warning in any 12-month period was to be automatically terminated. As a consequence, Hartline testified, he had no alternative but to discharge Salazar.[18] He did so, and issued her final paychecks to her. Salazar, although refusing to sign any of the documents proffered her by Hartline, claimed that the accusations against her were untrue, but to no avail.

The essence of the case of the counsel for the General Counsel appears to rely heavily on the leadership role of Salazar in the organizational campaign during the fall of 1979, and the suspicious timing of warnings which the Company claims were given Salazar near the time of the campaign's outset. Additionally, the fact of the prior existence of a formal disciplinary system at the Company is called into question, as well as whether Salazar was ever afforded any notice of her jeopardy thereunder. And, finally, the General Counsel contends that the evidence demonstrates harsh, disparate treatment toward Salazar, with inadequate and unreliable documentation of the reasons underlying the seemingly sudden change in the Company's view of Salazar's worth as an employee.

2. Discussion and conclusions

Neither the leadership role of Salazar in the organizational campaign, nor the suspicious timing of disciplinary actions taken against her at that time can be seriously contested.

But the remainder of the counsel for the General Counsel's contentions cannot withstand close scrutiny.

The existence of the Company's policies regarding employee discipline is not, in my view, successfully attacked by the testimony of Salazar, and other witnesses, that they had no knowledge of such policies before their explanation by Hartline at a meeting called for that purpose on January 18, 1980. For, as demonstrated by the previously noted failure of communication regarding the notices of the Company's intent to conduct individual interviews, the fact that certain employees may testify, with evident veracity, as to their complete ignorance about a particular policy does not necessarily establish the previous nonexistence of the policy. For it ignores the plausible, and credited, testimony of Hartline that following the Company's acquisition by Westpoint-Pepperell, each policy required discussion and promulgation among the Company's supervisory personnel, that a series of meetings was held toward that end, and that the Company's policies on discipline were explained or reinforced at small group meetings of employees, as questions arose, as well as in the larger employee meetings during the week of January 18, 1980. And nowhere is there direct evidence that the meetings during the week of January 18, 1980, were called to announce new policy, as opposed to an ongoing program of explaining or reinforcing all policies, whether new or old. To the contrary is Hartline's credited testimony. Further, as shown elsewhere, the testimony of Salazar that she had previously known of no such disciplinary system is demonstrably unreliable, for it became clear during her cross-examination in the General Counsel's case on rebuttal that she must have had at least rudimentary understanding of the very existence of the Company's disciplinary system, for she admittedly had been its subject more than once, her previous denials notwithstanding.

[17] The operator is capable of running the machine alone, at least for relatively short periods of time, by utilizing a remote-control switch to stop the machine. However, he would not resort to this if the inspector left the area without first telling him that she was leaving, since, due to the intervention of the carpet and the machine, he would not be able to observe that the inspector was absent.

In this case Jose Martinez claimed not to have known that Salazar was going to leave on April 1, thereby accounting for his failure to come around to the other side of the machine and operate it with the remote-control switch pending her return. As a consequence, he had no way of observing the flaw in the carpet as it was produced, since the defect was visible, not from the operator's normal position, but from the inspector's catwalk on the opposite side of the machine.

Salazar acknowledged that she was aware of a company policy requiring that an inspector first notify an operator before leaving the assigned post for a break, or to go to the restroom. She also acknowledged her understanding of the purpose behind such policy, i.e., to allow the operator to be on notice that he would be required to go to the opposite side of the machine and operate it by means of the remote switch while doing double duty as an inspector during the inspector's absence.

[18] Another incident on April 3 and 4 clearly infuriated Martinez against Salazar. This had to do with his apprehension that she was undermining explanations he had made to employees about working only 4 hours on Good Friday, and being paid for only 4 hours. However, I have concluded that Salazar's fate was already sealed by the time this incident occurred, and that it therefore played no part in her discharge.

The Company's evidence was to the effect that Salazar was the recipient of a "counseling report"[19] for having left her work station without permission and having interfered with the work of others on September 4, 1979. Then, on September 24, 1979, she received a written warning for having left her work station and interfered with other employees' work by stopping to talk with employees instead of returning promptly from a permissible break. And, finally, on October 1, 1979, Salazar received a second "warning notice," for having punched another employee's timecard, in violation of company policy; of particular interest in the context of this case is the language on the face of the "warning notice" to the effect that Salazar was given explicit warning of the jeopardy she faced; i.e., that a third warning would require her discharge.

The General Counsel's attacks upon the validity of these documents are not persuasive.

The suspicions raised by the timing of the warnings of September 24 and October 1, 1979, are diluted by the fact that Salazar's next warning was not issued for over 6 months after the issuance of the second warning. It seems illogical to infer on the basis of such timing that the Company made hasty efforts to grease the skids beneath Salazar's employment and yet, without apparent reason, failed to play its trump card, a third warning, until the passage of over 6 months. For this theory flies in the teeth of the contention that the Company harbored animus toward her activities throughout October and November, 2 crucial months of the election campaign, but failed to find a pretext to be rid of her influence.

Nor do I believe that warrant exists for a conclusion that the warnings issued to Salazar are so lacking in good cause, or are so tainted by evidence of disparate application, as to bespeak discriminatory motivation hidden by pretext. For it is clear that "[t]he Act . . . recognizes the employer's right to terminate employment for normal reasons." N.L.R.B. v. Waterman Steamship Corporation, 309 U.S. 206, 218–219 (1940). As we are frequently reminded, employers may discharge employees for good cause, bad cause, or no cause at all. And "Board law does not permit a trier of fact to substitute his own subjective impression of what he would have done were he in [the employer's] position." Grand Auto, Inc., d/b/a Super Tire Stores, 236 NLRB 877 (1978). Even "[w]hile the discipline may seem extreme, it does not follow that the ascribed reason for the discharges is pretextual." J. Ray McDermott & Co., Inc., 233 NLRB 946, 952 (1977). In short, unless unlawful motivation is shown, the Board cannot substitute its judgment for that of an employer as to the grounds for punishment, or the type of punishment, unless the punishment administered is so harsh as to itself bespeak a discriminatory motivation. As stated above, I do not believe that to be the case here.

For Salazar was ultimately compelled to concede in her testimony that she did, contrary to her earlier repeated and vehement denials, receive notice regarding the counseling of September 4, 1979, the warning of September 24, 1979, and the warning of October 1, 1979. While she disputed the conclusion drawn by the Company regarding the September 4 incident, she ultimately admitted, "There was an incident discussed." And, regarding the September 24 warning she finally admitted "Yes, I did [have a conversation with Frausto and Martinez], "and she went on, "There was an incident." And, with respect to the October 1 matter, she eventually conceded, "Some of the incidents were discussed." In fact, regarding still another incident which occurred on February 9, 1980, she stated, "Manuel did mention something about being more careful." And, if more is needed to establish that she did have notice of the Company's warnings to her (and, therefore, of its disciplinary policy's existence), it seems that had she in fact been ignorant of the notices outstanding against her record she would have protested the evident inaccuracy of Hartline's statement to her in the termination interview, that she had three warnings in her file. She did not. Instead, she but unpersuasively stated that she failed in this respect because she was upset.

Contrary to my findings regarding Salazar's testimony, I found that Frausto and Martinez, the Company's key witnesses regarding Salazar's discharge, were quite credible. While each was shown to have erred in his testimony in minor ways, this failed to detract from the overall favorable impressions they made. That is not to say that Martinez did not show unmistakable signs of being a harsh and judgmental supervisor. But I am unable to conclude that he was untruthful based on my assessment of his demeanor and testimony. To the contrary, even if harsh, Martinez was shown to be a man determined to do what he thought to be right.

And, finally, the counsel for the General Counsel's own evidence tended to disprove the critical element of disparate treatment. For Hector Gonzales testified that he, like Salazar, received warnings, without notice, for leaving his post and interfering with the work of other employees.

For all the reasons mentioned above I find and conclude that the General Counsel has not proven a prima facie case based on substantial and credible evidence. I shall, accordingly, dismiss this allegation of the complaint.

G. The Objection

By soliciting an employee's aid in preventing other employees from signing union authorization cards, by impliedly promising benefits to employees, by interrogating employees concerning their union sympathies, activities, and leanings, by creating the impression that employees' union activities were being kept under surveillance, and by threatening employees with physical harm, all of which occurred within the critical period, the Company engaged in conduct sufficient to warrant overturning the election and requiring that it be rerun. In this regard I specifically reject the Company's argument that whatever conduct was objectionable here was isolated and/or de minimis. Compare Robert King d/b/a Regency at the Rodeway Inn, 255 NLRB 961 (1981), and Caron International, Inc., 246 NLRB 1120 (1979), and cases cited therein.

[19] "Counseling reports" were placed in an employee's file, but did not serve to trigger a penalty, unlike "warning reports," which caused automatic discharge upon the accumulation of three in a 12-month period.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of the company, set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with the operation of the Company described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commence.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that the Company has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting the aid of employees in preventing other employees from signing union authorization cards, by impliedly promising benefits to employees, by interrogating employees concerning union sympathies, activities, or leanings, by creating the impression that employees' union activities were being kept under surveillance, and by threatening employees with physical harm.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

5. Except as is set forth above, the General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the credible evidence that the Company has violated the Act.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and upon the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[20]

The Respondent, Walter Carpet Mills, Inc., City of Industry, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Soliciting the aid of employees in preventing other employees from signing union authorization cards.

(b) Impliedly promising benefits to employees in order to induce them not to support a union.

(c) Interrogating employees concerning their own or others' union activitles, leanings, or sympathies.

(d) Creating the impression that employees' union activities are being kept under surveillance.

(e) Threatening employees with physical harm for engaging in union activities.

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights under the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action:

(a) Post at the City of Industry, California, plant of Walter Carpet Mills, Inc., copies of the notice attached and marked "Appendix."[21] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being duly signed by Respondent, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to its employees customarily are posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material. The notices shall be posted in both English and Spanish, as translated by the Regional Director for Region 21, or his agents.

(b) Notify the Regional Director for Region 21, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the election of November 30, 1979, be set aside and a new election directed.

[20] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[21] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Halo Lighting Division of McGraw Edison Company and Independent Radionic Workers of America, affiliated with National Federation of Independent Unions of America and International Brotherhood of Electrical workers, Local 134, AFL–CIO, Party in Interest. Cases 13–CA–18948 and 13–CA–19105[1]

December 15, 1981

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On January 30, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Abraham Frank issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel, Respondent, and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 134, AFL–CIO (hereafter IBEW), filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the General Counsel, Respondent, and the IBEW filed briefs in response to opposing parties' exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs, and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith.

The General Counsel excepted to the failure of the Administrative Law Judge to find that statements made by Respondent's president, Thompson, and several of Respondent's supervisors, to various employees, that if the IBEW, the incumbent Union, lost the impending election installation electricians represented by that Union would refuse to install Respondent's products which would cause a loss of sales for Respondent and a resultant loss of work for the employees. We find merit in this exception.

Respondent is a manufacturer of lighting fixtures which it sells to distributors and contractors mainly for installation in commercial buildings. It began operations in 1955 and, since shortly thereafter, has been party to collective-bargaining contracts with the IBEW covering its production and maintenance employees. In 1979,[3] a number of Respondent's employees including IBEW stewards became dissatisfied with IBEW's representation, and contacted the Independent Radionic Workers of America (hereafter IRWA), and, on June 8, an election petition was filed.

Throughout the vigorously run campaign, Respondent supported the reelection of the IBEW through a series of written communications to the employees and a preelection speech by Thompson. It stressed its concern over the possible loss of the use of the IBEW label on its product, and predicted a refusal by electrical installers represented by the IBEW to handle the product, which in turn would result in the loss of sales and the loss of a great number of jobs. Although the General Counsel did not allege that the written communications and Thompson's speech were violative of the Act, it did allege that the same message conveyed by Thompson and several supervisors in conversations with employees threatened employees with loss of jobs in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

The Administrative Law Judge dismissed the 8(a)(1) allegations concerning these statements by Thompson and the supervisors, although he did find that predictions as to the loss of specific numbers of such jobs were unlawful. Relying on the doctrine enunciated in the Supreme Court's decision in N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575 (1969), that a company may predict the precise effect unionism will have on it if the prediction is based on objective fact "to convey an employer's belief as to demonstrable probable consequences" beyond the employer's control, the Administrative Law Judge concluded that the evidence presented by the Employer in support of its belief that the loss of the IBEW label would have such a detrimental effect on its business was substantial, and unrebutted by any evidence presented by the General Counsel that such an effect would not result.

The evidence presented by the Employer in support of its predictions included an incident which occurred in Missouri in 1956 when electricians refused to install Respondent's incandescent lighting because it did not have the IBEW label, an incident which caused Respondent to seek out the IBEW and initiate its contractual relationship with that Union; testimony that Respondent's major competitors all have the use of the IBEW label; that 90 percent of Respondent's sales are in the United States and that 95 percent of its sales are to distributors or contractors for use in large commercial construction; that on occasion Respondent's product has gone out without the label, resulting in its sending the labels to follow the product, or confirming that it was still affiliated with the IBEW; that Respondent's eastern regional sales manager, in sales presentations, lets the customers know that Respondent is an IBEW company, and that in his past experience as a journeyman electrician he looked for the IBEW label on products, and he did not recall seeing other union labels on electrical products; and testimony of the business representative of the IBEW that it was normal for journeymen electricians to check to see if an electrical fixture bore the label of an AFL-CIO affiliate and, if not, to call the union hall to see if the manufacturer was a union company. The company would then be notified to send the labels to the jobsite.

[1] By telegraphic order dated October 23, 1981, the General Counsel's motion to sever Case 13–RC–15139 was granted and that case was remanded to Region 13 for further processing.

[2] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

We agree with the General Counsel that the notice to employees should be posted in both English and Spanish at Respondent's facility, and we shall order such posting.

[3] All events occurred in 1979.

259 NLRB No. 86

Noting the failure of the General Counsel to refute the foregoing testimony or to present evidence that journeymen electricians would be willing to install fixtures without the IBEW label, or that any of Respondent's competitors used a label other than that of the IBEW, the Administrative Law Judge found Respondent's evidence sufficient to support its belief on which it based its predictions.

Contrary to the conclusions reached by the Administrative Law Judge, we do not beleive that Respondent's evidence constitutes objective fact supporting the belief that the election of IRWA rather than the IBEW by the employees would bring about the dire consequences predicted by Respondent, i.e., the loss of the employees' jobs.

The only direct evidence relating to the refusal of electricians to install Respondent's product concerns an incident which took place in Missouri 25 years ago, an event we find too remote in time to support Respondent's stated belief. We realize, however, that Respondent has since that time had a bargaining relationship with the IBEW. The remainder of Respondent's evidence on this issue may indicate Respondent's belief in the advantages of having a contractual relationship with the IBEW; the loyalty of IBEW members to their Union and their concern for the protection of the organizational gains made by it; and the success the IBEW has had in organizing the electrical industry, but it does not show that journeymen electricians as a group will refuse to install the product of a company which does not have a contractual relationship with the IBEW, or that the IBEW would act contrary to the Act by inducing its members to refrain from handling the products of such a company. Thus, we find that Respondent's evidence does not demonstrate an objective basis to support Respondent's predictions that the loss of the IBEW label will cause IBEW installers not to handle its product, cause a substantial loss of business, or result in a substantial loss of jobs.

These unsupported predictions made by Respondent were serious in nature in that they posed a threat to the very livelihood of the employees. In such circumstances, an employer who wishes to predict such consequences based on the outcome of a Board election must use care to assure that its predictions are based on objective fact concerning matters beyond its control, and will not convey the impression that it will take steps on its own to adversely affect the employment status of its employees. We find here that the Employer failed to use such care in that its prediction had no sufficient basis in fact. Further, in the context of other preelection conduct engaged in by Respondent in violation of Section 8(a)(1), including, inter alia, threats of discharge, loss of benefits, plant relocation, reduced wages, and threats to report employees to the Immigration Service if they supported the IRWA rather than the IBEW, we find that Respondent made its predictions relating to job loss in a conscious effort to further instill fear in its employees. This infringed upon the employees' rights to freely engage in Section 7 activities protected by the Act. We therefore find that the statements made by Thompson and Supervisors Lizordi, Monaco, Hueuink, Orabutt, Baez, Saez, and Jeffress concerning the refusal of installers to handle Respondent's product, which would result in a loss of business and loss of jobs, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

We find merit also in the General Counsel's exception to the failure of the Administrative Law Judge to find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by focusing the blame for the cancellation of the company picnic on the IRWA.

The Company had planned its second annual fiesta day, a picnic expected to attract about 700 employees, for July 7. During the last week of June, Supervisor Hueuink began receiving reports that there might be violence at the picnic between the IRWA and IBEW supporters, instigated by some of the internal organizers for IRWA. Respondent decided to cancel the picnic in light of these reports and, on July 5, it issued a memo announcing the cancellation of the picnic containing the following language:

> Information has come to our attention that the organizers for the Independent Radionic Workers of America (IRWA), the independent union that is attempting to become the bargaining agent for our plant production employees, although not invited to our picnic, > have made known their intentions to appear there. Recent incidents related to their organizational activities have created increased tensions and aroused feelings among our employees. We believe the picnic would be used by them as a forum to pursue further organizational activities, and if that happens, it would only interfere with the purpose of our picnic. Since adequate security to deal with such a condition is not available, we believe it is in everyone's best interest to avoid such an incident; and, as a precaution, we are cancelling the picnic.

The Administrative Law Judge found that although Respondent's information concerning nonemployee organizers' plans to attend the picnic may not have been accurate, Respondent did have legitimate concern based on the reports of possible violence to cause it to cancel the picnic, and that its purpose was not to interfere with the rights of its employees. He therefore found no violation of the Act.

We agree that based on the reports of possible violence Respondent was justified in canceling the picnic. However, the memo announcing the cancellation unjustifiably placed the blame for the cancellation on the IRWA, particularly the nonemployee organizers of that Union. The evidence shows that Respondent had no cause to believe that these organizers had planned to attend the picnic. Rather it shows that the information received by Respondent pertained only to the possibility of employee organizers causing confrontations, not to persons "not invited to our picnic," as stated by Respondent in its memo. Although Respondent may have feared a confrontation between supporters of the two Unions at the picnic, it is clear from the memo that Respondent used its announcement to place the blame for this loss of a benefit on the Union it opposed in the election without any basis in fact. This we find interfered with the employees' Section 7 rights, and violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Halo Lighting Division of McGraw Edison Company, Elk Grove Village, Illinois, its officers, agents, sucessors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Promising employees benefits and wage increases if they vote for International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 134, AFL-CIO, in a Board-conducted election.
